Eben, in his wanderings in the neighborhood, was speedily attracted to a hollow in the neighboring moorlands, which might be considered as the only place within several miles presenting the least charm for the eye; a brook, fringed by a line of willows and a strip of green, formed the simple elements of the scene, and from its situation it had a look of seclusion and warmth. He was led, by what he saw here, to surmise that elevation is not an insuperable difficulty in cultivation, provided there be shelter; and soon becoming convinced of the fact, his active mind in no long time conceived that he might employ himself worse than in endeavoring to clear a little possession for himself, at a nominal rent, out of the neighboring lands. He looked around but, excepting the few patches in the neighborhood of the village, the region was one either of unbroken health or of moss of great depth, broken into pits, and filled with water even at midsummer. Nothing, therefore, could seem more hopeless. On the left only, as he looked northward, a large flat, lying far beneath him, and black and barren, or covered with brown heath, but looking to the sun, seemed to offer the semblance of a cultivated field, and he determined to visit it. He did so, but found it very unpromising. The surface, though apparently smooth at a distance, was rough and uneven; the soil was either stony and shallow, or a deed quick moss, wet every where even in summer, and with no fall by which it might be drained. A rivulet skirted it on the east, and was the natural boundary in that direction; but a swell many feet in height rose on the bank, and closed in the surface of the proposed farm from almost the possibility of being drained; and there were similar embankments on the north and west. Still it was a large surface, not materially uneven; it lay beautifully to the sun, and he could not but think that, if drained, and sheltered, and cultivated, here might be an extensive, perhaps a valuable farm. It would not require deep cuttings, as in moss-flows, nor extensive, levellings, as in very unequal surfaces. He determined to think farther.

He spoke of his purpose to no one, but he brooded over it for days, again and again visiting the ground, and at last he waited on the agent of the proprietor. Even from him he exacted a promise of secrecy, if nothing should follow upon his offer; and then, for a lease of thirty years, offered a shilling an acre for four hundred acres of that unbroken waste, with power to renew his lease for thirty years more, if he should so incline, at five shillings per acre; but with liberty, also, to quit at the end of five years, without being liable in damages from any cause.

Many landlords seem to fancy that though land is of no value in their hands, they have yet a right to be sharers in the profits produced by the intelligence, labor, and capital of others; and that they are extremely liberal in forbearing to share for a few years in what had never existed for them, and yet will, at the end of those few years, be a valuable inheritance to them and their heirs forever. The landlord in the present case was wiser. He saw that he was about to receive immediately, for a small portion of this moor brought as an inferior sheep-walk, and that at the end of thirty years it would exceed the original income of the entire possession; while this attempt at cultivation, if successful, would be an example of the utmost value, and might give his village that neighborhood which it so much required. Not only, therefore, was the offer of our friend accepted, but wood for buildings was voluntarily offered, and a propper allowance for useful and well-constructed drains.

The villagers were astounded to hear that they were to obtain such a neighbor, but happy even in the hope of it. Enclosed as the place was by banks, which, instead of admitting it to be drained, would, if broken down, inundate it with water, it looked to them like a huge frying-pan, and of course there was no abstaining from some little quiet jokes. This last was indeed the worst aspect of the affair. There was a fall for draining within the farm, but not without it; there was no final outlet. Still, our friend determined on pursuing his experiment; and, as a first measure, determined to give his possession a good name: he called it Glen Eden!

He next marked off the site for his steading on a very slight but bare and valueless knoll, being desirous at once to sit dry and spare his good land if there were any. As he felt that nothing would be more apt to encourage him than the comfort of his home, as soon as his turf-cottage was roofed in, he had a floor laid down in one end of it, and raising up slight ribs of wood by the walls, and continuing them overhead, had the whole neatly covered by a thin boarding, which, with the addition of a little carpet and a slight curtain festooned over his couch—made his end of the tenement seem a palace, and enabled him to look on the storm or the sunshine with equal consciousness of snugness and security to health. Good fires soon made the other end very tolerable to his servants; and being washed with lime, though not plastered, it formed a very cheerful temporary residence. He had the rankest of the heath pulled and secured for thatch or fuel, intending to burn the rest on the ground as soon as the ground should be dry. He next laid out the fields, and ordered them to be cleared of stones—an operation that covered them in some places to the depth of several feet; and finally, he set himself to endeavor to lay the land dry.

> A couch ordained a double debt to pay;
> A couch by night a sofa, all the day—

For this last purpose, at the lowest part of the farm, but where the surrounding wall, as it may be termed, was highest, (and this was on the east,) he ordered a bank of moss to be dug out, and placed in a situation convenient for being dried and burned. In the course of this digging he came upon both stones and clay, treasures of great value in his circumstances; and lest the winter, by filling the pond with water, should render further digging impossible, he pursued his labors with great assiduity. His determination was, that this reservoir should afford him an opportunity of draining the land: and should it prove unequal to this, that a pump or pumps, to be worked by a small windmill, should raise the water to a height enabling him to send it off his territories. In the mean time he knew what ridicule the suspicion even of such a project would draw upon him, and therefore he gratified inquirers by informing them that he was forming a fish-pond for the residence, and even expected to draw profit from the ice in winter, by letting it out for curling, though the game was not then known in that part of Scotland; and the parties, breathing softly, turned from him, and gently lifting up their hands and eyes, departed. Meantime he was intersecting his fields in numerous directions by drains, leading them into one another, diverging, branching, and every way varying them according to the inequalities of the ground; and after proving their running, carefully filling them with the stones taken from the surface, and all tending at last to the general reservoir. Even in winter therefore, the land became drier and drier, and people now began to see the use of the pond. By the return of spring he had effectually drained a large space in front of his residence, and generally prepared it for the operation of the plough. And even in this, by a sort of natural instinct, he differed from the accustomed mode. Aware that oxen draw most gently and steadily, he had secured the temporary use of a strong yoke of these, to be tried in all such portions of the soil as seemed likely to be capable of being opened up by the plough. People from the village had been engaged to attend at the same time to complete, with the spade and other implements, what the plough might leave imperfectly done, and give him, if possible, a field; and they had by this time so entered into the spirit of the thing, that the attendance was large, and in many cases gratuitous. He had no lime for the present, but he had been scavenger to the vilage during the winter, and he had secured all the runnings from his own cattle in a great tank. He now set to burning, in close kills, all the turf he had been able to accumulate during the summer; and between these and the refuse of the few cattle for which he had been able to find food, he was enabled to plough and manure some twenty acres of land, which he sowed and planted with the usual crops, accompanying all the white crops with sown grass. To complete his experiment, he had procured a cask to carry out the runnings of his stables, &c; and having placed it on a cart, and fitted it with a tail-box pierced with holes, such as is used for watering streets and roads, he, as a last operation, sprinkled this liquor, so far as it would go, over the ground that had been dressed with ashes, at night, that no portion of it might be wasted by the sun; and so closed the labors of his first spring.

Science had not then disclosed to us, what is now known to be true, that the terms good and bad land, as generally understood, are expressions without meaning, as almost every species of land requires some culture to make it productive; and by suitable means much may be made of almost any kind of land. Neither was it then known, as it now is, what are the precise ingredients necessary to the production of the various crops, and to which the soil is a mere matrix or receiver; and that burned earth or lime, and ammonia or the runnings of stables, and other usual manures contain many of those ingredients. But by instinct or accident, by reasoning from what he had noticed, or heard, or read, and perhaps so far experimenting without much knowledge or expectation, our friend had hit upon many things now known to be useful, and the result surprised many. Not only was there no failure in the crops of Glen-Eden, (as they now began seriously to call it,) but they were rich and beautiful. The oats, standing upon moss of great depth but drained—and that but for the draining and manure would not have borne a green leaf—were as luxuriant as if the depth of the moss had been the cause of their excellence. The other soils, lately so thin and dead, were now deep and dry, and bearing excellent barley, with a flush of clover about its roots. Potatoes, the gift of a warm and distant region, were flourishing in their little beds on this lately cold and barren moor, as if it had been their native and appropriate soil; and, in short, industry and intelligence had in a few months triumphed over the ignorance and neglect of centuries.

Till these things became apparent, however, our experimenter kept in the shade. He had dismissed all his workers, except his hind, whom he termed his "resident manager," and his wife, who was his sole servant, and a Gibeonite of a boy for looking after his sheep. As the crops began to show themselves, his hind urged upon him the beauty of their appearance, and the almost certain success of his experiment, and consequently the duty of resuming operations. According to all appearances, his first crop would more than pay the expense that would give him a permanent and valuable possession; and as Eben inclined to this opinion, he determined to resume. As a proper preparative to this, he allowed his mother and sisters to visit him; and though they were shocked with the outward aspect of his residence, a black and cheerless-looking turf-hut, in the midst of a comparative wild, and guarded by a pet sheep and her lambs, that, as they approached, patted the ground in a very menancing manner, yet when they entered it, and found the servant cheerfully preparing for them a meal in the one end, while in the other was a little parlor such as a gentleman might inhabit with rest and enjoyment, they were not only surpsised and pleased, but would gladly have protracted their visit, and were delighted to understand that they were speedily to join him.

Of course, from greater experience he rose to greater success. Even his laborers worked more cheerfully from seeing the success of what had been done. Moss that had hitherto seemed a nuisance was to him a treasure, and husbanded accordingly; and stones that, above ground, were such an encumbrance, were, when placed in drains beneath it, of the utmost value. He became perfectly happy in his labor of improving and almost regretting to think that one day it must have an end. Thirty years have passed since these operations were begun; the barren moor has been reclaimed into a valuable and productive farm: the once bare and rugged banks that impeded its draining have long been turned into boundaries covered with herbage of the softest texture, and crowned with woods at once an ornament and a shelter, and that being to be paid for, will render their owner rich. Even the deep and unsightly pool, that first assisted in laying the land dry, has been surrounded and screened by willows and alders, both useful in their way; and from the numbers of ducks and geese constantly breeding on its borders and floating on its bosom, must add no inconsiderable item to the profits of the farm. Where the first damp and disheartening turf-shed was erected, there are now warm and substantial offices; and fronting all, and flanked by garden walls, and behind them trees, stands a farm-house, in its first days a cottage, but always the seat of plain abundance, and now of every comfort and a generous hospitality. Though in a climate not very genial, it is always warm; and from various flowering shrubs spread over it, seldom without flowers. It is the cherished residence of an industrious, ingenious, and very worthy man.

Many, stimulated by his success, soon followed his example, though on a less extensive scale; but the unpromising wild of thirty years ago is now a sheltered, cultivated and comparatively fertile spot, and the abode of many industrious and contented families.

The volume of nature is the book of knowledge; and he becomes most wise who makes the most judicious selection.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR. (FOR OUR COUNTRY) J. N. LEWIS, AND A. W. ANDERSON, ASSISTANT EDITORS.

VOL. XIV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) NOVEMBER 7. 1845. NO. 4

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months TWO DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the opinion of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearages are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square; for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Baesa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr. R. MURRAY,
Cape Palmas	Dr. F. S. R. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORP Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia	Rev. W. MAXNE,
Norfolk	W. DU TACEY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. COX,
Boston,	Rev. T. TRACEY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

CHATER 1.1—WE ARE NAMED.

IT is assuredly a mercy of mankind that we are born into this world of folly as we are, mere purblind, sprawling, oysterly epics, with no more nous than a polypus, instead of coming into it with our wits ready sharpened, and wide awake as young weasels! Above all, it is providential that we are so much more accessible to lachrymose than ludicrous impressions; more prone to tears, sqeakings, sobs, sighs, and bellowings, than to broad grins or crowing like chanticleer. For, while at a royal or imperial establishment, one Fool has generally been deemed sufficient; at the court of a Lilliputian Infant or infanta, it seems to be held indispensable that every person who enters the presence must play the Zany or buffoon, and act, talk, sing, cut, and caper, such antics, gibberish, nonsense, capers, and grimaces, that nine tenths of the breed of babies, if their nerves were not callous already, must there die of ruptured spleen, burst blood-vessels, split sides, or shattered diaphragms. Yes, nine tenths of the species would go off in a galloway; like the ancient who lost the breath of consternation, at seeing an ass eating figs. For truly that donkey was nothing to the donkeys, nor his freak worth one of his figs, compared to the farcicalities exhibited by those he and sucking wiseacres who congregate around the cots and cradles of the nursery. Thus, had our own little vacant goggle-eyes at all appreciated, or our ignorant sealed ears at all comprehended, the absurdities that were perpetrated said and sung, daily and hourly, before and around us my Twin-Brother and myself must inevitably, in the first week, have cracked in our pap and we, struggled in convulsion fits of inextinguishable laughter, or perhaps jaw-locked by a collapse of the overstrained risible muscles.

It would have been quite enough to shatter the tender lungs and mirth of a precocious humorist, to have only seen that ungainly figure which so constantly hung over us, with that strange variegated face, grotesquely puckering, twisting, screwing its refractory features to produce such indescribable cacklings, chucklings, and chirruppings;—to have heard her drivling that impracticable peacocky voice with its rebellious falsetto, and all its mazy wanderings, from nasal to guttural, from guttural to pectoral, and even to ventral, with all its involuntary quaverings, guggings and gratings,—into a soothing lullaby, or cradle hymn. It must have asphyxiated an infant, with any turn for the comic, to have seen and heard that lo-like creature with her pied red and white face lowing—or that astounding flourish of tune, accompanied by an appropriate brandishing of the mottled upper limbs, with which she warbled—

"There's no ox near thy bed:"

"'Tis thy Kizzy sits beside thee,
And her harms shall be thy guard."

It was ten thousand mercies, I say that the stolid gravity of babyhood was proof against such sounds and spectacles; not to forget that domestic conclave, with its notable debate as to the names to be given to us in our baptism.

"For my own part," said my mother, enthroned in a huge dimity covered easy chair," I throned like some sort of names we are accustomed to couple together, so as to make them out for a pair of twins."

"Nothing more easy," said my father. "There's Castor and Pollux."

"Was Castor the inventor of castor oil?" inquired my mother, in the very simplicity of her heart.

"Why, not exactly," replied my fatherly, suddenly rubbing his nose as if something had tickled him. "Je was invented himself." An answer, by the way, which served my other parent as a riddle for the rest of the day.

"And what was their persuasion?"

"He then, of course."

"Then they shall never stand sponsors for children of mine," said my mother whose religious sentiments were strictly orthodox. "But are there no other twin brothers celebrated in history?"

"Yes," replied my father. "Valentine and Orson."

"Why one—one—one of them," exclaimed Kezia stuttering in her eagerness—"one of them was a savage, like Peter the Wild Boy, and sucked a she-bear!"

"Then they won't do, "said my mother, in a tone of great decision.

"And Romulus and Remus are equally ineligible said my father, "for they were suckled by a she-wolf."

"Bless me!" exclaimed my mother, throwing up her hands, "are all the beasts in those days must have been much tamer and gentler than in ours. I should be sorry to trust flesh and blood of mine to such sucklings as bear-nurses" And what would be your choice Kizzy!" inquired my father, turning towards the maid of all work, who, by way of employing both hands and feet, had volunteered to rock the cradle whilst she worked at the duplicate baby clothes unexpectedly required

"Why then," said Kezia, rising up to give more weight to the forthcoming oblation, "if that precious pair of twins was mine, I'd christen them Jacin and Boaz."

"The pillars of the temple,"—said my father. "But suppose, Kizzy, the boys chose to go into the army and navy?"

"They would fight none the worse," said Kezia, reddening, "for having Bible names!"

"Nor better," said my father, sotto voce. "And now, perhaps Mrs. Prideaux will favor us with her opinion!"

But the genteel nurse, with a sweet smile, and in her silvery voice, declined advising in such a delicate matter; only hinting, as regarded her private taste, that she preferred the select and private euphonious, as a prefix. Her own son was named Algernon Mirabeau Prideaux.

"Perhaps," said my father, leaning his head thoughtfully on one side and caressing his nose "perhaps Postle could suggest something. His head's like an Encyclopedia."

"He leave," said Kezia, suspending for a moment her needle work and the rocking of the cradle "He's for Damon and Pithy."

"For what!!!" exclaimed my mother,——

"Damon and Pithy."

"Pooh, pho—Damon and Pythias," said my father, "famous for their friendship, like David and Jonathan in the classical times."

"Then they're heathens, too," said my mother," and won't do for godfather to little Christians."

A dead pause ensued for some minutes, during which nothing was audible but my father, ghost of a whistle, and the gentle creak, creak, of the wicker cradle. The expression of my mothers face, in the meantimes, changed every moment for the worse; from puzzled to anxious, from anxious to rettul.

"Well I do wish," she exclaimed at last, just at the tail of a long sigh, "I do wish George, that you would think of some name for our twins. For, of course, you don't wish them to grow up anonymous like Tom's dog!"

"Of course not," replied my father. "But I can hit on only one more suggestion. Supposing the infant to be remarkably fine ones——"

"And so they are!" put in Kezia.

"And of an uncommon size for twins——"

"They're perfect Herculeses," cried Kezia.

"What think you of Gog and Magog!"

"Fiddle-and fiddlestick!" exclaimed my mother in great indignation. "But I believe you would joke on your death-bed."

"Not by dis dat," said my father. "But come," he added in his genuine serious voice, for he had two a real and a sham Abraham one, "it is my decided opinion that we could not do better than to name the children after your brother. He is wealthy, and a bachelor; and it might be to the advantage of the boys to pay him the compliment."

"I have thought of that too," said my mother. "But my brother does not shorten well: Jinkins Rumbold is well enough; but you would not like to hear me when I wanted the children, calling for Jin and Rum."

"Pshaw!" said my father, "I am philosopher enough to bear that for the chance of a thumping legacy to our sons."

The genteel nurse, Mrs. Prideaux, backing this worldly policy of my father,s with a few emphatic words, my mother concurred, and, accordingly it was decided that we should be called after Jinkins Rumbold; the Jinkins being assigned to my twin brother, the first-born, and the Rumbold to my "crying self."

It is usual, however, in dedicating works, whether of Art or Nature, in one or two volumes, to ask previously the permission of the dedicate. To obtain this consent, it was necessary to write to our Godfather Elect: and accordingly my father retired to the parlor, and seated himself, on epistolary deeds intent, at the old escrutoire. But my parent was an indifferent letter writer at the best; and the task was even more perplexing than such labors usually are. His brother-in-law was a formalist of the old school; an antiquarian in dress, speech, manners sentiments, and prejudices, whom it would not be prudent to address in the current and familiar style of the day. The request, besides, involved delicate consideration as difficult to touch safely, as impossible to avoid. In this extremity, after spoiling a dozen sheets of paper and as many pens, my father had recourse, as usual, to Mr. Postle, who came characteristically at his summons, with a graduated glass in one hand, and a bottle of vitriolic acid in the other. It was indeed one of his merits, that he identified himself, soul and body, with his business: so much so, that he was reported to have gone to an evening party with his handkerchief scented with spirits of camphor.

"Mr. Postle," said my father, "I want your opinion on a new case. Suppose a rich old hunks of a bachelor uncle, whom you wished to stand godfather to your twins, what would be your mode of treatment, by way of application to him?"

The assistant, thus called in to consultation, at once addressed himself, seriously to the consideration of the case. But in vain he stared at the Esculapian bronze bird with the gilt bolus suspended from its beak, and from the bird, at the framed sampler, and thence to the water-color view of some landscape in Wales and then at the stuffed woodpecker, and in turn at each of the black profiles that flanked the mirror. There was no inspiration in any of them At last he spoke.

"It's all the same to you, sir, I think if we were to adjourn to the surgery, I could make up my mind on the subject. Like the authors, who write best, as I have heard, in their libraries, with their books about them, my ideas are always most confident, when in looking for them, my eyes rest on the drawers, and bottles, and gallipots. It's an idiosyncrasy, I believe but so it is."

"So be it," said my father gathering up his rough composing drafts, and hurrying, with Postle at his heels, into the surgery, where he established himself at the desk. The assistant in the mean time took a deliberate survey of all the wooden earthenware, and glass repositories for drugs, acid, salt, bitter, or saccharine; liquid, solid, or in powder.

"Now then, Postle," said my father, "how would you set to work to ask a rich old curmudgeon to stand sponsor to your twins?"

"Why, then, sir," replied Postle, "in the first place I would disclaim all idea of drawing upon him"—(and he glanced at a great bottle aparently filled with green tinsel, but marked "Catharides") —"or of bleeding him. Next I would throw in gentle stimulants, such as an appeal to family pride, and reminding him of your matrimonial mixture. Then I would exhibit the babies—in as pleasant a vehicle as possible—flavored, as it were, with cinnamon"—(he looked hard at a particular drawer(—"and scented with rose water. As sweet as honey"—(he got that bottle from a large white jar(—"and as lively as leeches." (He used that comparison to a great fact on the counter.)

"Very good," said my father.

"After that," continued Mr. Postle, "I would recommend change of air and exercise, namely, by coming down to the christening: with an unrestricted diet. I would also prescribe to make all sure, a bolus for him, according to the best prescriptions; with a draught of something comfortting to be taken the last thing at night. Say diluted alcohol, sweetened with sugar. Add a little essential oil of flummery; and in case of refusal, hint at a mortification."

"Capital—Excellent!" exclaimed my father And on this medical model he actually constructed a letter before dinner time, which might otherwise have puzzled him for a week!

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

1. OF SOUND.—When we strike an object a sound is made. The cause of the noise is the trembling movement of the body struck. After striking a bell, we can see it tremble for a minute or more. This trembling shakes the air, which is pressing all around the bell.

2. As when we drop a stone into a smooth pond of water we see the little circular waves following one after another from where the stone went in, out towards the shore; so when the bell is trembling it sends little waves of air out in all directions.

3. A bell continues to give a succession of impulses, (or strokes,) to the air for a long time after it is struck; while some other sounds are made by a single impulse, as a crack of a whip, or a clap of the hands. In the last cases a large wave of air is sent out into the atmosphere.

4. When a bell is ringing, constant succession of airy-waves keeps coming from the bell to the ear, and these motions of the air against the ear gives us the sensation we call sound. What wisdom is shown in giving to the air the property of quick motions.

5. If we want to speak to a whole city, or town, in an instant, as it frequently happens in case of fires, all we have to do is to strike the bell. The movements of the air like little messengers, run every way to every body, whoever or wherever they may be, telling them at once what the man thinks who strikes the bell

6. So the busy little waves of the air tell us that a carriage is coming, and that we must keep out of the way: and the undulations of the air tell us, too, what our fellowmen are saying. The motions of the air bring to us the words of the orator, and by them we carry on our daily conversations.

7. We all know that air is necessary to support life, but we seldom think it equally necessary to conversation, reading, &c. Without air candles or the fire would not burn; without air plants and animals and men would die; and without air the tongue and the ear would be of no use.

8. If you take all the air out of a vessel, and then strike a bell in the vessel, no sound is heard. As you go up into the air it becomes thinner, there is less of it; so that when you get forty-five miles up above the earth there is no air. There is less and less air all the way up to that point. Now, the higher in the air you strike a bell, the less sound does it make. This proves that air is necessary to make a sound.

9. Firing a gun on the highest mountains makes but a very small noise, and people there have to scream, in order to be heard, when they talk to each other. On the other hand, when you condense the air you increase the sound. If we could put twice as much air into the room; our voices would be as long again.

10. Although air is the great conductor of sound, yet solid bodies convey it much more rapidly and to greater distances. If a person lay his ear to one end of a long stick of timber, he can hear the scratch of a pin made at the other end. The scratch would not be heard two feet through the air. If those who live in cities, where there are pavements, will observe, they will see the furniture in the room tremble slightly, long before the carriage is heard.

11. Sound goes through the air at the rate of 11. 42 feet in a second. Hence, with a watch, which measures the seconds in the hand, we can measure the distance of a thunder cloud from us. For by observing the flash of lightning, and then counting the seconds from that instant to the time when the thunder reaches the ear, we have the number of seconds, which multiplied by eleven hundred and forty-two, will give the number of feet the cloud is off from us.

12. So with the wood-chopper, we can tell how far he is off. We can see the axe strike the log, and then count the seconds before the report reaches us. Sounds are conducted by water about four times quicker than by air, and by solids about twice as rapidly as by water about four times quicker than tons of sound than stone or brick.

13. If a person standing some distance off, with a board fence between us, strike the fence with a hammer, two reports will be heard; one almost instantly coming through the fence, and the other, after a short time, coming through the air.

14. It is by the motions in the air that music is made. But before we can make music, we must know how to agitate the air. A cart, as it rumbles along in the street, makes undulations in the air, but the undulations do not produce music. Music is noise, but all noise is not music.

In our next article we will tell what noise is musical, and how it is made. And also, what makes a discord. Let my young readers see if they can find this last thing out before I tell them. If you do I shall be glad to hear from you.

DECLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE.—The following strong paragraph was stricken out of the draft of the Declaration of Independence, as proposed by Mr. Jefferson, & approved by the select committee to whom the subject had been referred. We wish, said Hezekiah Niles in recording the fact, that it had been retained. It might have acted as an obstruction to the increase of our black population, which now so fearfully presses upon some of the States; and besides, it would have stood in perpetual remembrance of the fact that the slavetrade was not an American institution, or approved of by the early inhabitants of these States:

"He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people, who never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the approbrium of infidel powers, is the work of a Christian king of Great Britian. Determined to keep an open market where MEN should be brought and sold, he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this execrable commerce. And that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished dye, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people upon whom he also obtruded them; thus paving off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another."

"Two things are causes of daily astonishment to me: the readiness of Christ to come from heaven to earth for me; and my backwardness to rise from earth to heaven with him.—Pearse.

From Africa's Luminary.

ADDRESS.

The following address, upon a subject so interesting to the citizens of this commonwealth, was delivered on the night of the 5th inst, before the Liberia Lyceum, by John N. Lewis Esq: and published by order of that institution. Whatever may be written, either for or against, on this vital question, now so extensively and deeply engaging the attention of our citizens, we would most earnestly commend to their cool and deliberate reflection. The Committee to whom the publication of the address below was assigned, has omitted a sentence or two only.

Mr. President:—I consider myself highly honored in having been selected by your institution to deliver this evening, a address. I have to assure you that I feel no little embarrassment in undertaking the task, especially, as I see around me many gentlemen, who, I am sure would do more justice to the occasion than can reasonably be expected of me. I have found it sir, very difficult to select a subject that I thought would be interesting and at the same time instructive to us all. My mind has wavered from one object to another with such rapidity, as to leave me but little time to give any of them the necessary consideration. In this state of mind, without having matured any subject, I present myself before you. Not that the occasion does not demand an extra effort, but simply from the fact, that the circumstances of the day are of such a character, as to leave one but very little time to consider on matters not immediately within its operations. With this frank acknowledgment I am in hopes, that your institution will tender to me every indulgence while I attempt to bring before them, for their evening, a contemplation, a subject which to us at the present time, is an all-engrossing topic—a subject pregnant with consequences of no ordinary character to the people of Liberia. A more grave and momentous subject never before occupied our attention. That subject sir, "Is the propriety of severing our connection with the American Colonization Society."

Mr. President, in considering this subject, I deem it proper that we should refer back some twenty-six years to find out the origin of this connection. And if we have a desire to learn its origin and growth I am sure that the time we may now occupy in the examination, will not be considered as unprofitably spent It is impossible for us fully to understand the relation we now sustain to the society unless we are somewhat acquainted with its character; and in ascertaining that we shall soon understand how we have in a measure, become subject to its influence.

The American Colonization Society was formed little more than a quarter of a century ago. It numbered among its members, men of the first standing and respectability in the United States. Its professed object, as proclaimed to the world which we believe have been strictly carried out, was to ameliorate the condition of the colored race, by colonizing them [illegible]. I do not remember or having heard that any plan had been adopted to better extensively and permanently the condition of our race. No sir! No plan could have been devised to improve their circumstances, unless their removal to a distant land formed the bases upon which that amelioration was predicated. Nature seems to have intended that the two races should not live together on terms of equality. Common sense dictates to us the impracticability of such a contingency: And for my part I frankly confess, that I am perfectly satisfied with the order of things so far as the separation of the races is concerned. I would of all things oppose amalgamation—Yes sir! I deprecate it more strongly than the whites, for with all their denunciations against intermixing, the fact can easily be established that they are not so sensitive on this point, as their loud declarations would seem to imply.

I say sir, that the object of of the society was to better the condition of the colored race. They saw with feelings of the deepest commisseration that a prejudice of an unconquerable character condemned our race to a life of servitude and dependence. They did not for a moment suppose, that any effort of theirs could alter or change the order of things in this respect nor did they entertain the idea of removing the entire colored population from the United States: the enterprise was too great and required more resources than they could hope ever to command but they were consoled with the reflection, that after they had fully shown the practicability of the scheme that an arm stronger than theirs would complete what they had begun. Yes sir! the day was looked forward to with anxiety when the Government of the United States would step forward and lend its powerful aid to this gigantic enterprise. Not a few of the American people believed, but that the scheme of Colonization would eventually fall into the hands of their Government; and was there anything unreasonable in entertaining this belief?—No sir! the aid was expected to assist a people whose principles are in the strictest sense of the word, American—a people who speak the same language—were born on the same soil—and worship the same Holy and just God:—a people who brought to a savage coast civilization and Christianity—and who have raised thereon a form of government, republican in character, and as near a like to the one from under which they came, as the circumstances of their case would admit. Yes sir! here where over all supremely reigned superstition with all its train of barbarities,—where the Slave Trader met with ready success in freighting his ship with the victims of unjust and unnatural wars—where human sacrifices were offered up in the vain belief that the raging elements would be appeased; are raised and standing pre-eminent conspicuous, Christian Churches, dedicated to the service of the living God—and instead of the cries of the slave, and the clang of his shackles ascending to heaven and insulting a just and Holy Being our voices unite in songs of praise and rejoicing to the most High for his wonderful mercies to the children of men. But to whom is credit due for such a manifest revolution in the state of Society in Africa? Not to the government from whence we came, for it proclaims against any participation in the scheme of Colonization—it is declared to be opposed to the very nature of its precepts to hold any connection with a foreign people; other than what treaties may give, though that people were born on its own soil.

It is to the American Colonization Society, then that is due the praise of establishing Christian Colonies on this shore. And did the society prosecute this work without opposion? Did the scheme meet with ready assistance from the American people?—No sir! in every stage of the history of the society it has been obliged to sustain itself against a host of opposition. Societies composed of men of the first standing and respectability, combined to destroy it.

But this opposition did not, they say, arise from any ill will to the colored race. They contended from a higher principle. They opposed a scheme that they thought was provided to operate against the interest of the colored man by sending them from the land of their birth: and they denied the possibility of the society accomplishing what it had promised. The society publicly declared their opinion as to the feasibility of the scheme, and promised, if philanthropists would extend to them their patronage and benevolence, they would plant on the shores of Africa a Christian community in the full enjoyment of liberty and happiness. Notwithstanding the promise of the society—the earnestness with which their appeals were made, it could not rid itself of the formidable opposition that was arrayed against it. Nevertheless, under the direction and guidance of the Governor of the universe, Colonization gained friends. Ships were chartered and sent out with emigrants—they were landed on these shores, and after enduring innumerable privations, which all pioneers have to contend with succeeded in laying the basis of a Republic And now they earnestly invite their brethren in American to come over and enjoy with them the blessings of liberty. But will they hearken to our call! Do they respond to the invitation we so freely tender to them to come over and assist us in rearing a Republic where they may find a home for themselves and children! I exceedingly regret that they hold for us no such corresponding feeling.

They view us as dupes of Colonization. They have been taught to entertain feelings of the deepest disgust for the Colonization Society, and all those who in any way favor its measures come under their malediction. We deplore with heart felt sorrow that our colored brethren should entertain for us other feelings, than those of friendship, and that if they really look upon us as the dupes of the society that instead of heaping upon us opprobrium they should commiserate our lot—they should give us their sympathy and occasionally send us over a word of encouragement to excite us to make the best of a bad case. But I rejoice that we have no cause to invite their sympathy, and it is still a further source of congratulation to know that we prefer our lot in society to theirs—instead of holding them inferior [illegible] to extend to them the hospitalities of Liberia. We would have them to leave their servile and degraded occupations under the whites and prepare themselves for usefulness in a free country, they will find here no distinction but what they can by industry overcome. We will prepare them for taking an honorable position in the affairs of Government. But sir if there be cause of crimination, we are the ones from whom such might properly come.—Our brethren in the United States being under the delusion that they live in a free state, combined their strength and influence, with those who from the beginning opposed the Society—they circulated reports injurious to Liberia—they caused its friends to slacken in their efforts to advance our cause. And well did their combined machinations operate. The society and Liberia so felt the force of their unnatural opposition, that here and in America all things for a while were prostrated. But when we were advised of their demonical persecutions, we no longer slumber we rose up as one man and assembled in public meeting.

For several days the state of affairs were freely discussed—the reports so industriously circulated in the United States to our injury were found to be malicious and utterly void of truth. But not to be tedious, Mr. President, I will by your permission read the sentiments of two of our distinguished and worthy citizens, which among many others breathing kindred sentiments, received the unanimous approbation of that meeting. The first I shall read, was from my esteemed friend the Rev. Mr. Wilson, —"Whereas it has been widely and maliciously circulated in the United States of America, that the inhabitants of this Colony are unhappy in their situation and anxious to return," Resolved,—That this report is false and malicious, and originated to injure the Colony, by calling off the support of it friends; —that so far from a desire to return we would regard such an event as the greatest calamity that could befall us." The other sentiment sir, is from our honored president, the Rev. Mr. Teage,—"Resolved, —That this meeting regard the Colonizing Institution as one of the highest, holiest, and most benevolent enterprises of the present day; that as a plan for the amelioration of the colored race it takes the precedence of all that have been presented to the attention of the modern world, that in its progress it is peaceful and safe—in its tendences beneficial and advantageous; that it is entitled to the highest veneration and unbounded confidence of every man of color; —that what is has already accomplished demands our devout thanks to these noble and disinterested philanthrophists that compose it; as being under God, the greatest earthly benefactors of a despised and depressed portion of the human family."

You sir and nearly all who now hear me, remember the unanimity with which the citizens acted on the occasion referred to; and you must know sir that at that time, the people considered it their duty to come forward, whenever it became necessary, in defense of the society. They never hesitated for a moment, nor were such duties found irksome, we hold the same relation to the society as a child does to it parent. The engagement was mutual. We voluntarily placed ourselves under the influence of the Society with the understanding that when we become capable of managing our own affairs, the society would withdraw its control. As the Colony has progressed in improvement and intelligence, so has the authority of the society been diminished. The relation now existing between the Colony & its founders is easily comprehended—the ratification of our Laws belongs to them. This right is held by them for our own security. It was feared that we might not be conversant with all the rules and regulations laid down for the government of civilized communities and that in legislating we might adopt principles at variance with these rules. But the society will claim this nor any other right no longer, than we are willing that they should exercise it. The moment that they are informed that the people of these Colonies consider themselves fully competent to govern themselves, they will withdraw their control. This the society promised to do: and this promise we have steadily kept in view; and from a recent expression of theirs in relation to Liberia we are gratified to perceive, that they are ready, the moment we request it, of them, to leave us to ourselves. Has that time arrived? Have we so progressed in intelligence and stability, as to wish the Society to withdraw its control? It is supposed by some that by a separation of interest we will be able to form such relations with foreign communities as to ensure to the Colony respectability, and the extension of its commercial interest. These conclusion may be well founded, for all I know. It is not for me to oppose them, unless I am convinced that a separation would injure Liberia, in that case it would be the duty of us all to combine in opposition to any such measure.

Mr. President, all precaution was ever necessary in any instance, it is in our case. If ever a people stood in need of men of pure mind, and disinterested motives to assist them in determining a question in which their future tranquility depends we are that people. And it is impossible for thinking minds not to be alarmed when such grave questions are agitated, without having had a clear conception of their character. We learn that in other countries, when subjects interesting to the public are introduced that those persons placing themselves before the people for their suffrage, are obliged from the very nature of the position which they have coveted, to take every proper method to enlighten their constituents.

Such a course is commendable, and should be required to be followed by our politicians. I need not tell you sir, that conflicting opinions prevail as to the practicability of a change in our relations. * * * * * *

In this state of public feeling, the subject should be handled with the greatest circumspection, and those who have taken the lead in this agitation, should spare no pains in industriously disseminating among the people their reasons for desiring a separation. I am anxious sir, that this subject should take some definite form. It has assumed as many forms among us, as Proteus could shapes. The people remain in ignorance as to the course sought to be pursued. Let the subject be fairly entertained.

Convince the people if we can, that they will be benefitted by a change; and shew them in what will consist the advantage. Last, though not the least in importance, let them fully understand the nature of the connection now sought to be dissolved. Let them know that we are contemplating the propriety of cutting asunder the small cord that authorizes" our greatest earthly benefactors to exercise control over us. Let them know that all we possess, and that the liberty we now enjoy in sitting and entertaining ourselves in this spacious hall, while the banner of freedom waves over us, have been under God, through the Society,s instrumentality. When they shall have known and understood the obligations that they are under to that Body of Philanthropists, through whose benevolence they have been redeemed from a life of servitude and dependence, they will then be able to comprehend the importance of the subject now in agitation, and have their minds prepared for the impartial consideration of it.

In closing my remarks I would with all earnest, once again, call the attention of my hearers to the subject we have had before us. As a people, I would advise them to be on the look out As Liberian I would tell them that they have a political character to sustain, and would with the utmost sincerity persuade them to hand it down to their posterity untarnished. I would have our child en, and those who may take our places, to speak of us as fathers—to approve of our actions, and to defend our honor. With these opinions, let us be united. If we fall, let us fall together as Liberians and as Liberians let us this night, vow, that we will be true to our country the home of our adoption. Let us invoke the spirits of our fathers that have finished their labor and are now, we hope, enjoying the happiness of another and blessed world; and while we imagine that we see them hovering over us, in the likeness of a Carey, Benson, Waring, Devany, Teage and Barbour Let us renew our vows in words too plain to be misunderstood, and in language sufficiently loud to be heard by all. Yes, let us pledge to Liberia, that if we forget her, and prove unworthy of the home she affords us, may our tongues cleave to the roof of our mouths, and may our right hand forget his cunning.

I beg to tender to you sir, and the Gentlemen of this institution, my grateful acknowledgements, for the patient attention with which the observations I have made, have been listened to: and though the subject of them is not such as might have been expected yet, I am sure they will grant to me with their characteristic benevolence, every indulgence.

From the Christian Watchman.

SHORT ESSAY.---No. 4.

"For through each checker'd scene a contrast ran.
Foes and a proof, how great, how weak is man!"

Dr. Johnson was not more remarkable for his great mental endowments than for his singular habits and weaknesses. There his biographers and cotemporaries have minutely detailed. As they relate to the first literary man of an eminently literary age, they will, we doubt not, be read with interest; and that too, although many of them may have been read or related before.

Much that is peculiar in the habits and manners of Dr. Johnson may be attributed to his corporeal defects. One of his eyes was wholly useless, and with the other he could not distinguish the features of a person, at the distance of half a yard. His hearing was sadly defective. He was the victim of a "vile melancholy" which clouded depressed and enslaved his mind; and was disfigured by the scrofula which deprived him at times of the control of his nerves. Physical infirmities like these ought surely to palliate much of his rudeness, severity, and ill-humor. But many of his peculiarities are also to be referred to the sufferings and calamities of his boyhood and youth, when the character is moulded and the manners are formed. The events of the early part of his life were a series of struggles with the adversities and disappointments of fortune. He had been cheered and gladdened by few of the world's smiles and favors; but had often experienced its frowns and reverses. The gentler emotios which polish and refine social intercourse were, in him, stifled if not extinguished,—with these considerations in view let us proceed to notice some of these traits

In powers of conversation he had not during his life and has not since had, an equal. In large companies he brooked no rival; much less a victor. He talked for victory With his boundless flow of language, his fertile imagination, his acute understanding, his sound common sense, and his inexhaustible fund of illustration, he was never left without a resource. If argument failed, he sheltered himself under a sophism; if that was detected, he marshalled his ready wit and humor, and if neither of these silenced his adversary, he terminated the contest with a pointed and facetious Goldsmith who was often the mark for these arrows, once said, "There is no arguing with Johnson; for when his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt end of it" His stentorian voice which he often raised to its highest pitch, his boisterous and impetuous manners, and his careless disregard of others contributed much to his success. Burke, Gibbon, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Goldsmith and Garrick eminent as they were, yet dreaded an encounter with Johnson. Confident of his power and fearless of opposition, he reigned a despot in the social and literary circles of London.

But justly celebrated as he is for his superiority in conversational talent he is perhaps not less notorious for his rude and unfeeling treatment of his associates and friends. He sported on his. Dress, manners, opinions, and tastes, were each at times objects of censure and abuse. If Goldsmith, bashful and blundering at the best, presumed to express an opinion different from his own, Johnson silenced him with "Sir you are impertinent." A Scotish clergyman happened to speak slightingly of the Church of England:—Johnson turned upon him "Sir you know no more of our church than a Hottentot!" Dr. Johnson and Dr. Adam Smith once ended a dispute in these courteous terms:—Johnson. "You lie" Smith, "you are a son of a—!" Of the hundreds of other instances which might be collected, we will mention only one. It is his reply to Miss H. More, on the occasion of her introduction, and is recorded in the Memoirs of Madame D'Arblay Hannah More was then but a young girl, and was only known as the authoress of two or three little poems. She had heard much of Dr. Johnson and regarded him with a species of veneration. On being presented to him, she naturally enough began to express her sense of his great merits, and to talk of the pleasure and instruction which she had received from his writings. He listened to her for some time in silence. At length he turned surneddenly to her, with a stern and angry countenance, and said, "Madam, before you flatter a man so grossly to his face, you should consider whether or not your flattery is worth his having."

He was on many subjects foolishly superstitious. From this mental weakness, more especially, Dr. Madden has derived plausible argument for including him in his catalogue of nonomanices In Rasselas, Imlate, the sage, advances serious reasons for believing in the appearance of departed spirits. Johnson himself once said of the appearance of spirits after death; "all argument is against it; but all belief is for it" When walking the streets he was always scrupulously observant to touch the lamp-posts as he passed them; and has been seen to stop, retrace his steps, and lay his hand on one which he had accidentally omitted. He counted the steps of the stairs as he ascended them, and if it happened that his left foot reached the threshold before the other, he hurried down and commenced the ascent again. Sometimes his feet proved heretical in the open streets: on such occasions his ridiculous efforts to rectify their er-

From Africa's Luminary.

ADDRESS.

The following address, upon a subject so interesting to the citizens of this commonwealth, was delivered on the night of the 5th inst, before the Liberia Lyceum, by John N. Lewis Esq: and published by order of that institution. Whatever may be written, either for or against, on this vital question, now so extensively and deeply engaging the attention of our citizens, we would most earnestly commend to their cool and deliberate reflection. The Committee to whom the publication of the address below was assigned, has omitted a sentence or two only.

Mr. President:—I consider myself highly honored in having been selected by your institution to deliver this evening,s address. I have to assure you that I feel no little embarrassment in undertaking the task, especially, as I see around me many gentlemen, who, I am sure would do more justice to the occasion than can reasonably be expected of me. I have found it sir, very difficult to select a subject that I thought would be interesting and at the same time instructive to us all. My mind has wavered from one object to another with such rapidity, as to leave me but little time to give any of them the necessary consideration. In this state of mind, without having matured any subject, I present myself before you. Not that the occasion does not demand an extra effort, but simply from the fact, that the circumstances of the day are of such a character, as to leave one but very little time to consider on matters not immediately within its operations. With this frank acknowledgment I am in hopes, that your institution will tender to me every indulgence while I attempt to bring before them, for their evening,s contemplation, a subject which to us at the present time, is an all-engrossing topic—a subject pregnant with consequences of no ordinary character to the people of Liberia. A more grave and momentous subject never before occupied our attention. That subject sir, "Is the propriety of severing our connection with the American Colonization Society."

Mr. President, in considering this subject, I deem it proper that we should refer back some twenty-six years to find out the origin of this connection. And if we have a desire to learn its origin and growth I am sure that the time we may now occupy in the examination, will not be considered as unprofitably spent It is impossible for us fully to understand the relation we now sustain to the society unless we are somewhat acquainted with its character; and in ascertaining that we shall soon understand how we have in a measure, become subject to its influence.

The American Colonization Society was formed little more than a quarter of a century ago. It numbered among its members, men of the first standing and respectability in the United States. Its professed object, as proclaimed to the word which we believe have been strictly carried out, was to ameliorate the condition of the colored race, by colonizing them [illegible] formation. I do not remember of having heard that any plan had been adopted to better extensively and permanently the condition of our race. No sir! No plan could have been devised to improve their circumstances, unless their removal to a distant land formed the bases upon which that amelioration was predicated. Nature seems to have intended that the two races should not live together on terms of equality. Common sense dictates to us the impracticability of such a contingency: And for my part I frankly confess, that I am perfectly satisfied with the order of things so far as the separation of the races is concerned. I would of all things oppose amalgamation—Yes sir! I deprecate it more strongly than the whites, for with all their denunciations against intermixing, the fact can easily be established that they are not so sensitive on this point, as their loud declarations would seem to imply.

I say sir, that the object of the society was to better the condition of the colored race. They saw with feelings of the deepest commiseration that a prejudice of an unconquerable character condemned our race to a life of servitude and dependence. They did not for a moment suppose, that any effort of theirs could alter or change the order of things in this respect nor did they entertain the idea of removing the entire colored population from the United States: the enterprise was too great and required more resources than they could hope ever to command but they were consoled with the reflection, that after they had fully shown the practicability of the scheme that an arm stronger than theirs would complete what they had begun. Yes sir! the day was looked forward to with anxiety when the Government of the United States would step forward and lend its powerful aid to this gigantic enterprise. Not a few of the American people believed, but that the scheme of Colonization would eventually fall into the hands of the Government; and was there anything unreasonable in entertaining this belief?—No sir! the aid was expected to assist a people whose principles are in the strictest sense of the word, American—a people who speak the same language—were born on the same soil—and worship the same Holy and just God;—a people who brought to a savage coast civilization and Christianity—and who have raised thereon a form of government, republican in character, and as near A like to the one from under which they came, as the circumstances of their case would admit. Yes sir! here where over all supremely reigned superstition with all its train of barbarities,—where the Slave Trader met with ready success in freighting his ship with the victims of unjust and unnatural wars—where human sacrifices were offered up in the vain belief that the raging elements would be appeased; are raised and standing pre-eminent conspicuous, Christian Churches, dedicated to the service of the living God—and instead of the cries of the slave, and the clang of his shackles ascending to heaven and insulting a just and Holy Being our voices unite in songs of praise and rejoicing to the most High for his wonderful mercies to the children of men. But to whom is credit due for such a manifest revolution in the state of Society in Africa? Not to the government from whence we came, for it proclaims against any participation in the scheme of Colonization—it is declared to be opposed to the very nature of its precepts to hold any connection with a foreign people; other than what treaties may give, though that people were born on its own soil.

It is to the American Colonization Society, then that is due the praise of establishing Christian Colonies on this shore. And did the society prosecute this work without opposion? Did the scheme meet with ready assistance from the American people?—No sir! in every stage of the history of the society it has been obliged to sustain itself against a host of opposition. Societies composed of men of the first standing and respectability, combined to destroy it.

But this opposition did not, they say, arise from any ill will to the colored race. They contended from a higher principle. They opposed a scheme that they thought was intended to operate against the interest of the colored man by sending them from the land of their birth: and they denied the possibility of the society accomplishing what it had promised. The society publicly declared their opinion as to the feasibility of the scheme, and promised, if philanthropists would extend to them their patronage and benevolence, they would plant on the shores of Africa a Christian community in the full enjoyment of liberty and happiness. Notwithstanding the promise of the society—the earnestness with which their appeals were made, it could not rid itself of the formidable opposition that was arrayed against it. Nevertheless, under the direction and guidance of the Governor of the universe, Colonization gained friends.

Ships were chartered and sent out with emigrants—they were landed on these shores, and after enduring innumerable privations, which all pioneers have to contend with succeeded in laying the basis of a Republic. And now they earnestly invite their brethren in American to come over and enjoy with them the blessings of liberty. But will they hearken to our call! Do they respond to the invitation we so freely tender to them to come over and assist us in rearing a Republic where they may find a home for themselves and children! I exceedingly regret that they hold for us no such corresponding feeling.

They view us as dupes of Colonization. They have been taught to entertain feelings of the deepest disgust for the Colonization Society, and all those who in any way favor its measures come under their malediction. We deplore with heart felt sorrow that our colored brethren should entertain for us other feelings, than those of friendship, and that if they really look upon us as the dupes of the society that instead of heaping upon us opprobrium they should commiserate our lot—they should give us their sympathy and occasionally send us over a word of encouragement to excite us to make the best of a bad case. But I rejoice that we have no cause to invite their sympathy, and it is still a further source of congratulation to know that we prefer our lot in society to theirs—instead of holding them inferior [illegible] to extend to them the hospitalities of Liberia. We would have them to leave their servile and degraded occupations under the whites and prepare themselves for usefulness in a free country, they will find here no distinction but what they can by industry overcome. We will prepare them for taking an honorable position in the affairs of Government. But sir if there be cause of crimination, we are the ones from whom such might properly come.—Our brethren in the United States being under the delusion that they live in a free state, combined their strength and influence, with those who from the beginning opposed the Society—they circulated reports injurious to Liberia—they caused its friends to slacken in their efforts to advance our cause. And well did their combined machinations operate. The society and Liberia so felt the force of their unnatural opposition, that here and in America all things for a while were prostrated. But when we were advised of their demonical persecutions, we no longer slumber we rose up as one man and assembled in public meeting.

For several days the state of affairs were freely discussed—the reports so industriously circulated in the United States to our injury were found to be malicious and utterly void of truth. But not to be tedious, Mr. President, I will by your permission read the sentiments of two of our distinguished and worthy citizens, which among many others breathing kindred sentiments, received the unanimous approbation of that meeting. The first I shall read, was from my esteemed friend the Rev. Mr. Wilson. —"Whereas it has been widely and maliciously circulated in the United States of America, that the inhabitants of this Colony are unhappy in their situation and anxious to return," Resolved,—That this report is false and malicious, and originated to injure the Colony, by calling off the support of it friends; —that so far from a desire to return we would regard such an event as the greatest calamity that could befall us." The other sentiment sir, is from our honored president, the Rev. Mr. Teage.—"Resolved. —That this meeting regard the Colonizing Institution as one of the highest, holiest, and most benevolent enterprises of the present day; that as a plan for the amelioration of the colored race it takes the precedence of all that have been presented to the attention of the modern world, that in its progress it is peaceful and safe—in its tendences beneficial and advantageous; that it is entitled to the highest veneration and unbounded confidence of every man of color; —that what is has already accomplished demands our devout thanks to these noble and disinterested philanthrophists that compose it; as being under God, the greatest earthly benefactors of a despised and depressed portion of the human family."

You sir and nearly all who now hear me, remember the unanimity with which the citizens acted on the occasion referred to; and you must know sir that at that time, the people considered it their duty to come forward, whenever it became necessary, in defense of the society. They never hesitated for a moment, nor were such duties found irksome, we hold the same relation to the society as a child does to it parent. The engagement was mutual. We voluntarily placed ourselves under the influence of the Society with the understanding that when we become capable of managing our own affairs, the society would withdraw its control. As the Colony has progressed in improvement and intelligence, so has the authority of the society been diminished. The relation now existing between the Colony & its founders is easily comprehended—the ratification of our Laws belongs to them. This right is held by them for our own security. It was feared that we might not be conversant with all the rules and regulations laid down for the government of civilized communities and that in legislating we might adopt principles at variance with these rules. But the society will claim this nor any other right no longer, than we are willing that they should exercise it. The moment that they are informed that the people of these Colonies consider themselves fully competent to govern themselves, they will withdraw their control. This the society promised to do: and this promise we have steadily kept in view; and from a recent expression of theirs in relation to Liberia we are gratified to perceive, that they are ready, the moment we request it, of them, to leave us to ourselves. Has that time arrived? Have we so progressed in intelligence and stability, as to wish the Society to withdraw its control? It is supposed by some that by a separation of interest we will be able to form such relations with foreign communities as to ensure to the Colony respectability, and the extension of its commercial interest. These conclusion may be well founded for aught I know. It is not for me to oppose them unless I am convinced that a separation would injure Liberia, in that case it would be the duty of us all to combine in opposition to any such measure.

Mr. President, if precaution was ever necessary in any instance, it is in our case. If ever a people stood in need of men of pure mind, and disinterested motives to assist them in determining a question in which their future tranquility depends we are that people. And it is impossible for thinking minds not to be alarmed when such grave questions are agitated, without having had a clear conception of their character. We learn that in other countries, when subjects interesting to the public are introduced that those persons placing themselves before the people for their suffrage, are obliged, from the very nature of the position which they have coveted, to take every proper method to enlighten their constituents.

Such a course is commendable, and should be required to be followed by our politicians. I need not tell you sir, that conflicting opinions prevail as to the practicability of a change in our relations. * * * * * *

In this state of public feeling, the subject should be handled with the greatest circumspection, and those who have taken the lead in this agitation, should spare no pains in industriously disseminating among the people their reasons for desiring a separation. I am anxious sir, that this subject should take some definite form. It has assumed as many forms among us, as Proteus could shapes. The people remain in ignorance as to the course sought to be pursued. Let the subject be fairly entertained.

Convince the people if we can, that they will be benefitted by a change; and shew them in what will consist the advantage. Last, though not the least in importance, let them fully understand the nature of the connection now sought to be dissolved. Let them know that we are contemplating the propriety of cutting asunder "the small cord that authorizes" our greatest earthly benefactors to exercise control over us. Let them know that all we possess, and that the liberty we now enjoy in sitting and entertaining ourselves in this spacious hall, while the banner of freedom waves over us, have been under God, through the Society,s instrumentality. When they shall have known and understood the obligations that they are under to that Body of Philanthropists, through whose benevolence they have been redeemed from a life of servitude and dependence, they will then be able to comprehend the importance of the subject now in agitation, and have their minds prepared for the impartial consideration of it.

In closing my remarks I would with all earnest, ness again, call the attention of my hearers to the subject we have had before us. As a people, I would advise them to be on the look out. As Liberian I would tell them that they have a political character to sustain, and would with the utmost sincerity persuade them to hand it down to their posterity untarnished. I would have our child en, and those who may take our places, to speak of us as fathers—to approve of our actions, and to defend our honor. With these opinions, let us be united. If we fall, let us fall together as Liberians and as Liberians let us this night, vow, that we will be true to our country the home of our adoption. Let us invoke the spirits of our fathers that have finished their labor and are now, we hope, enjoying the happiness of another and blessed world; and while we imagine that we see them hovering over us, in the likeness of a Carey, Benson, Waring, Devany, Teage and Barbour Let us renew our vows in words too plain to be misunderstood, and in language sufficiently loud to be heard by all. Yes, let us pledge to Liberia, that if we forget her, and prove unworthy of the home she affords us, may our tongues cleave to the roof of our mouths, and may our right hand forget his cunning.

I beg to tender to you sir, and the Gentlemen of this institution, my grateful acknowledgements, for the patient attention with which the observations I have made, have been listened to: and though the subject of them is not such as might have been expected yet, I am sure they will grant to me with their characteristic benevolence, every indulgence.

From the Christian Watchman.

SHORT ESSAY.---No. 4.

"For through each checker'd scene a contrast ran.
Too sad a proof, how great, how weak is man!"

Dr. Johnson was not more remarkable for his great mental endowments than for his singular habits and weaknesses. There his biographers and cotemporaries have minutely detailed. As they relate to the first literary man of an eminently literary age, they will, we doubt not, be read with interest; and that too, although many of them may have been read or related before.

Much that is peculiar in the habits and manners of Dr. Johnson may be attributed to his corporeal defects. One of his eyes was wholly useless, and with the other he could not distinguish the features of a person, at the distance of half a yard. His hearing was sadly defective. He was the victim of a "vile melancholy" which clouded depressed and enslaved his mind; and was disfigured by the scrofula which deprived him at times of the control of his nerves. Physical infirmities like these ought surely to palliate much of his rudeness, severity, and ill-humor. But many of his peculiarities are also to be referred to the sufferings and calamities of his boyhood and youth, when the character is moulded and the manners are formed. The events of the early part of his life were a series of struggles with the adversities and disappointments of fortune. He had been cheered and gladdened by few of the world,s smiles and favors; but had often experienced its frowns and reverses. The gentler emotios which polish and refine social intercourse were, in him, stifled if not extinguished,—with these considerations in view let us proceed to notice some of these traits

In powers of conversation he had not during his life and has not since had, an equal. In large companies he brooked no rival; much less a victor. He talked for victory. With his boundless flow of language, his fertile imagination, his acute understanding, his sound common sense, and his inexhaustible fund of illustration, he was never left without a resource. If argument failed, he sheltered himself under a sophism; if that was detected, he marshalled his ready wit and humor, and if neither of these silenced his adversary, he terminated the contest with a pointed and facetious retort. Goldsmith who was often the mark for these arrows, once said, "There is no arguing with Johnson; for when his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt end of it." His stentorian voice which he often raised to its highest pitch, his boisterous and impetuous manners, and his careless disregard of others contributed much to his success. Burke, Gibbon, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Goldsmith and Garrick eminent as they were, yet dreaded an encounter with Johnson. Confident of his power and fearless of opposition, he reigned the despot in the social and literary circles of London.

But justly celebrated as he is for his superiority in conversational talent he is perhaps more notorious for his rude and unfeeling treatment of his associates and friends. He sacrificed on one. Dress, manners, opinions, and tastes, were each at times objects of censure and abuse. If Goldsmith, bashful and blundering at the bar, ventured to express an opinion different from his own, Johnson silenced him with "Sir you are impertinent." A Scotish clergyman happened to speak slightingly of the Church of England:—Johnson turned upon, him "Sir you know no more of our church than a Hottentot!" Dr. Johnson and Dr. Adam Smith once ended a dispute in these courteous terms:—Johnson. "you lie" Smith, "you are a son of a—!" Of the hundreds of other instances which might be collected, we will mention only one. It is his reply to Miss H. More, on the occasion of her introduction, and is recorded in the Memoirs of Madame D'Arblay. Hannah More was then but a young girl, and was only known as the authoress of two or three little poems. She had heard much of Dr. Johnson and regarded him with a species of veneration. On being presented to him, she naturally enough began to express her sense of his great merits, and to talk of the pleasure and instruction which she had received from his writings. He listened to her for some time in silence. At length he turned surneddenly to her, with a stern and angry countenance, and said, "Madam, before you flatter a man so grossly to his face, you should consider whether or not your flattery is worth his having."

He was on many subjects foolishly superstitious. From this mental weakness, more especially, Dr. Madden has derived plausible argument for including him in his catalogue of nonomanices. In Russelas, Imlate, the sage, advances serious reasons for believing in the appearance of departed spirits. Johnson himself once said of the appearance of spirits after death; "all argument is against it; but all belief is for it" When walking the streets he was always scrupulously observant to touch the lamp-posts as he passed them; and has been seen to stop, retrace his steps, and lay his hand on one which he had accidentally omitted. He counted the steps of the stairs as he ascended them, and if it happened that his left foot reached the threshold before the other, he hurried down and commenced the ascent again. Sometimes his feet proved heretical in the open streets; on such occasions his ridiculous efforts to rectify their errors, usually collected about him a crowd of wondering spectators.

While eating and drinking Johnson seemed to have forgotten the proprieties, the decencies of life. "When at table," says his idolatrous biographer, "he was totally absorbed in the business of the moment; his looks seemed riveted to his plate; nor would he, unless when in very high company say one word, or even pay the least attention to what was said by others, till he had satisfied his appetite; which was so fierce and indulged with such intenseness, that while in the act of eating, the veins of his forehead swelled, and generally a strong perspiration was visible."

He was accustomed to say that "he who dressed a good dinner was a more excellent and more useful member of society, than he who wrote a good poem" Tea was his favorite beverage; and he drank of it immoderately. Twelve cups was his usual allowance but he sometimes drank twenty-five.

He dressed like a slover; but demanded extreme neatness of apparel in those who visited him. He kept late hours; but violently censured the practice in others. He took offence on the least slight, but gave it without consideration. He offended Mrs Boswell by saying, &c.; and won the love of Mrs. Thrale by doing so. He detested all affectation; but always wrote in an inflated, artificial style Mr. M'Cauley has named it, the Johnsonese

These are a few of the peculiarities, weaknesses, and inconsistencies which mingled with the character of the great philosopher, moralist, lexicographer, critic and biographer, and made him a wonderful matter of amusement and interest to his associates and admirers, but serve chiefly as a proof and illustration of the general truth that we only behold dimly discernible spots on the sun's disk. Perhaps there are few characters that, under the severe scrutiny, would bear public scrutiny as well. But in the faults we discern in his character we shall not fail to cherish his memory with grateful and pleasing regard Recollecting with thankfulness suffered from the world within as well as from the world without we shall wonder that his failings, numerous as they were, had been so few, and his patience and fortitude such a load of ills, had been so great. Exercising that charity for which the best of us still have too much need, we shall forget his weaknesses and errors in the contemplation of his many virtues and merits.

BRUNO.

COMMUNICATION.

FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Mr. Editor:—Agriculture, in other countries, is considered the most important of all the other branches of business that men engage in—while in Liberia, we look upon it, as an object of secondary importance.

How long shall we continue to prefer investing our funds in commerce, which is very uncertain in its operation to the more sure and certain plan of acquiring an independence in the cultivation of sugar and coffee. It is true, that we cannot hope, until we obtain draught animals, to cultivate sugar in such quantities and on such terms as to admit of our exporting it; but we can and ought to make enough for our own consumption.

Coffee can be raised in any quantity and on terms that would enable us to export it to foreign markets, and have it placed there in competition with the most favored of its kind. I have heard foreigners who are judges of the article, speak of our coffee in the most flattering terms—they pronounced it to be equal in quality to any in the world.

There can be no doubt about it—we must grow some staple article, the prosperity of Liberia, will in a great measure depend upon the attention we give to the cultivation of its soil. To place our sole dependence on the small business we do in bartering for Camwood and Palm Oil would imply a want of the common understanding that would not be inexcusable in an untutored African. We have lived in a state of deplorable indolence sufficiently long. Let us bestir ourselves and be determined to raise an article that will bring to our ports the shipping of the civilized world, and let that article be coffee.

There are other articles, that we might cultivate to an advantage, and which, though not possessing the same permanent profit as coffee, would no doubt well repay the growers for any disbursement they might make in raising them, I allude to the Ground Pea, and the small Red Pepper, both of these articles are eagerly sought after—they are like the coffee natives of the soil, and would require but little trouble and expense to grow them. They can be raised in large quantities and a ready market can always be obtained for them in Europe and the United States.

If you think these suggestions, which I have hastily thrown together, worthy a place in your columns, you may at some future time hear from me again.

Yours.

THE FRIEND.

Monrovia
Nov 5th 1845

We are decidedly of the opinion of "The Friend" who "by the by" is one of our staunch friends in all measures. We know it to be the pride and boast of every civilized government to know for a certainty that they do grow an abundance of produce for home consumption, and for exportation, and until we are assured that we have attained this point, we need not stretch ourselves beyond measure. The great business of a government is the successful tillage of its soil, and the education of its people. This fact we believe is universally admitted, we do not hesitate to avow the belief, that without far more extensive regulations on these points than have yet been made, our bright prospects of Liberia's rise must go down.

FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Mr. Editor:—In casting my eyes over Africa's Directory of the 12th inst. I find a portion of one of its columns is appropriated to the notice of the "Union Sisters of Charity Society's" twelfth anniversary, held in this town on the 6th inst. in which the remarks there made by the sagacious Editor, commends and at the same time finds fault with the singing of the quire. He justly remarks "We find fault one week, and that is by no means a particular, but a general one. It is a custom which the choruses have adopted from the States, of falling into more or repeating for the last two lines of the last verse, in every hymn"

Well, Mr. Editor as you ask Mr. Editor, whether or not a custom of this or that description, and would [illegible] movement in the way of singing

[illegible] say, that such was the case [illegible] Anniversary! Sir, I think [illegible] right when I say there was more of [illegible] verse of the hymns sung, [illegible] sung as laid down in the [illegible] Communion, and therefore must be [illegible] to the rules of same. Sir, as you [illegible] "in Liberia" what was not the case [illegible] Anniversary, but [illegible] appear as a [illegible] the regulations must [illegible] to show me to [illegible] knowledge of the singing as I participated more [illegible]

A word, Mr. Editor, rather severe with the young Society, in owning it to be his first essay at public speaking he might have been a little more lenient, with [illegible] So you must first coming on the stage [illegible] expects instant success, nor does he think himself—though he solicits the clemency of profound critics, free from their keen and cutting remarks. Nor is the more experienced more escape the scrutinizing glance: and I do not suppose the young aspirant thought himself more infallible than his most thorough-bread compeers in such business.

The "Good sisters" he would not have them think or look hard by way of remark, because he thinks they were guilty of a little [illegible] by way of "excess of drapery." Now I do not profess to be one of the most scrutinizing and inspecting person of the age, neither do animate and inanimate objects pass me without noticing in my leading points or particularities they may possess. And I think if I may be allowed to judge no "excess of drapery" was worn by the society, when that body congregated to celebrate their anniversary, unless sir, he the suggesting and improving Editor alludes to vails, worn by some of its members which may appear new, and unnecessary by himself and others, but to me are indispensably necessary, as he suggests an improvement in the manner of raising collections at the door by appointing there a Young Miss, who then would have a protection from the penetrating stare of the passing stranger. It is understood that the Editor means a member of the society to hold the hat or whatever may be used.

In the evening many ladies appeared somewhat gaily attired, but it was not restricted or confined to the good sisters for it seemed pretty general throughout the rooms in somewhat a tasteful manner.

AN OBSERVER.

NOTICE.

The subscribers having been engaged for several years in the transaction of a general wholesale commission business, hereby offer their services to the public in that capacity.

Our business comprehending the leading articles of Drugs and Dye stuffs, Palm Oil, Ivory, Hides, Gum Copal, Peppers, Ebony, Gold Dust, and other kinds of African produce,—we flatter ourselves that with our knowledge of the different markets for these articles, we can present sufficient inducements to shippers to avail of our services

Reasonable advances in money, or purchases of goods on order, will be made on all consignments when requested;—the consignees always being in possession of Bill Lading of the articles shipped, which will be required to be made over to them in the form usual in such cases.

☞Not office in spiritous liquors.

THOMBLY & LAMSON,
15 and 16,
Commercial Wharf.

Boston, Mass. U. S. A.
July 21st, 1845.

UNION SISTERS OF CHARITY SOCIETY.

The twelfth Anniversary of this Society was held on Thursday the 6th of November 1845 in the Baptist Church, the services commenced a quarter before eleven —The meeting was opened by singing the tune—"Stonefield" to the words commencing.

"Eternal source of every joy!
Well may thy praise our lips employ
While in thy temple we appear,
To hail the sovereign of the year."

After which an appropriate prayer was offered up by Rev. H. Teage —(Singing by the Society tune "Daughter of Zion."—Reading the constitution of the Society by Mr. James C. Minor.—Abstract of the annual report read, by the Society's Agent. (Singing by the Society tune —Newburg.—Address by Mr. Henry J. Roberts,—singing by the Society, tune "Creation." Concluding prayer by Rev. James Eden (Singing by the Society, "Anthem for Easter." Benediction by Rev H. Teage.

The meeting was well attended by the Citizens generally. The singing is said to have been well done, and as a demonstration of this truth it has been remarked by a gentleman of no ordinary taste for musick that such was the effect of the singing on him that he felt somewhat electrified by it. The Address gave a very gratifying account of the Society's labour for the last 12 years, and we must say that the young speaker handled his subject throughout systematically, to the praise and admiration of the Audience generally, in behalf of the Society I wish him success on all similar occasions.

A. W. ANDERSON.
Society's Agent.

MILITARY.

At a meeting of the Military Officers held at the Court House November 3rd 1845.

Colonel B. P. Yates, was called to the chair. Lieutenant W F. Brown, appointed secretary

Col. Yates being called on to state the object of the meeting, rose and stated:—

That the meeting was called to make the necessary arrangements for the celebration of the first of December insuing, the day on which the decisive battle was fought, which gave such a signal triumph and victory over our savage foes.

Resolved,—That there be a committee of five appointed by this meeting, whose duty it shall be to make such necessary arrangements for that day as may be thought proper.

Resolved,—That Captains J. W. Barbour, W. J. Roberts. Lieuts. J. N. Lewis, P. Skipwith, I. S. Bratcher, be that committee.

Resolved.—That all foreign as well as colonial vessels that may be in harbour on that day, be requested to display their flags.

Resolved,—That each warehouse and grocery be closed, and that we desist from any and all mercantile operations on that day

B. P. YATES, President.
W. F. BROWN Secretary.

ORDER OF THE DAY FOR THE CELEBRATION OF THE FIRST DECEMBER.

1. One gun from Central Fort will announce the dawn of day.

2. At 8 o'clock A. M. one gun from Central Fort, at which time the flag of the colony will be displayed.

3. At 9 o'clock A. M. the troops will be assembled in Broad Street.

4. At 10. o'clock A. M. the troops will form in front of the Government House, to escort His Excellency the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and civil officers to the M. E. Church, to hear an oration to be delivered by Mr. H. W. Erskein.

5. One gun will announce the movement of the procession from the Government House to H Street, down H. Street to Broad Street, down Broad Street to E. Street, up E. Street to the M. E. Church.

6. The troops after the oration will form to receive His Excellency the Governor, Lieut. Governor, and civil officers.

7. At 12 o'clock the national salute of 22 guns will be fired from Central Fort.

8. At Sunset one gun from Central Fort, at which time the flag will be struck.

J. W. BARBOUR,
W. J. ROBERTS,
JAMES N. LEWIS,
P. SKIPWITH,
I. S. BRATCHER.
Committee of arrangements.

Monrovia,
November 13th 1845.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, NOV. 7th, 1845.

Our readers will pardon the paucity of Editorial in this number.

Had we been informed in time, that the duty of conducting this number of the paper would have fallen to our lot, we should no doubt have prepared ourself for the task,—we do not say to credit—but according to our ability. There are many things that transpires in Liberia daily, that furnishes subjects enough to talk and write about, did we notice them, any of which if properly written, and well arranged would not disgrace our columns. But such is the fact what is one man's business is not every body's. We would here call the attention of our readers to the address of Gen. Lewis, delivered before the Liberia Lyceum, as it is a judicious, and well written article. We prefer commending it to the notice of all who love Liberia, than to make any lengthy remarks on it ourself. Certain are we that eleven twelfths of the inhabitants of these colonies entertain like sentiments with the General, and we are very certain his position is a correct one. We regret that any strictures were made on the publication of that address, as the paragraphs left out, doubtless would have discovered to the reader little more light on the subject.

His closing remarks are certainly eloquent. They exhibit more than ordinary mental reflection on the course of conduct we ought to persue in order to hand down unsullied and unimpaired our political career to our children's children. His suggestions are well timed and proper, and ought to be responded to by every thinking Liberian.

PUBLIC DISCUSSION.

There is an old maxim, but never too old to be reiterated (viz) when public sentiment is agitated, truth spontaneously springs up. Let the whole populace mind, with its "Press" and various civil institutions, be concentrated on any one subject, and truth will rise paramount. For proof; notice the progress which the subject of slavery has made. As soon as public attention had fixed itself upon the evils and dangers it is likely to entail on the American people, a great and prevailing change was evident to all, this general and popular agitation may throw up much strife and delusion. Yet nevertheless, error whose certain fate is inevitable must sink, and give place to truth.

The subject of Liberia's independence, is much discussed by all classes—by the learned and the unlearned, —by the mechanic at their work—by men on ship board, —by the farmer in his farm—by the way side, and in public halls,

Who does not see the probable result—the inevitable conclusion of these inquiries? How much of that spirit which is wrong will be detected? How rapid is our present advance to that point of light where the truth on this great subject can be seen!! A happy circumstance for the human race, when an enlightened people consents to elicit truth from the smallest political or moral question. Man is sure to gain something. Could the people of these colonies, for one [illegible] their [illegible] powers upon the great question. "how shall the whole people of these colonies betters their condition by severing the connection that subsists between them and the American Colonization Society" Could this subject become a general topic. Scrupulously view from its origin to its end, or from its cause to its effects as general as other matters are now, how much might be hoped. Until this is so or something near it, in vain may we hope to see any thing permanently done about this independence of Liberia.

If the people desire freedom and all that follows in its train, they will better insure it by this method than by any other, they too, will better elicit the sympathies of all classes of citizens in this matter; but as long as some men prefer to be the sole actors in this affair, regardless of the opinions and counsels of the whole colony nothing can, or will be done. This was predict.

The people must be enlightened on all subjects touching their interest, either by public meetings or by other proper and laudable mediums, which we believe is the uniform course taken in every other country, and which in time past was practiced in these colonies.

A RUMOR AFLOAT.

It is here rumored about, that the American Colonization Society are preparing to found a colony in the interior of some one or other of our frontier settlements. If this news be true we bid them "God's speed." In our opinion it would be one of the best steps ever taken by that body to promote civilization, christianization and internal improvements there is no doubt that a thousand facilities to interior trade would be found consequent on such a measure.

We would call the attention of our citizens to the fact —that very few of our African neighbors succeeded, last season in raising their crops of Rice,—owing to the rainy season having set in earlier than it usually does, and those of them that were more fortunate, made but very small crops. Therefore we need not look to them for any supplies

We are pleased to see the earnestness with which all classes of our citizens have entered into the planting of eatables, and we would recommend to them the propriety of increasing their fields, so as to prevent the possibility of a repetition of the dificulties we had to labor under a few months since.

So essential is knowledge, if not to virtue, at least to all the ends of virtue, that, without it, benevolence itself, when accompanied by power, may be as destructive and desolating as intentional tyranny.—Dr. Brown

POETRY

Washington City Prison.

BY ELIZABETH M. CHANDLER.

Thou dark, and drear, and melancholy pile!
Who seemest, like a guilty penitent,
To brood o'er horrors in thy bosom pent.
Until the sunbeams that around thee smile,
And the glad breath of heaven, have become
A hatred and a mockery to thy gloom.—
Stern fabric! I will commune with thee awhile!
And from thy hollow echoes, and the gale
That moans round thy dark cells, win back the tale
Of thy past history;—give thy stones a tongue,
And bid them answer me, and let the sighs
That round thy walls so heavily arise,
Be vocal, and declare from whence they sprung;
And by what passion of intense despair—
What aching throb of life-consuming care,
From the torn heart of anguish they were wrung.

Receptacle of guilt! hath guilt alone,
Stain'd with its falling tears thy foot worn floor,
When the harsh echo of the closing door
Hath died upon the ear, and flinging prone
His from upon the earth, thy chilling gloom
Seem'd to the wretch the sentence of his doom—
Say, beat'st thou witness to no heart rung groan,
Bursting from sinless bosoms, whom the hand
Of tyrant power hath serv'd from the hand
Of the earth's holiest and dearest things,
And thrust amidst thy darkness? Speak! declare
If only the rude felon's curse and prayer,
Mix'd with wild wail and wilder laughter, rings
Within those dreary walls! Or if there be
No spirit fainting there with agony,
That not from their own crimes, but foul oppression springs!

Ha! am I answer'd?—Is that startling cry,
Bursting from some wild beast, with anguish riven,
And rising up to register in heaven,
Its blighting tale of outrage;—the reply.
Was heard distinctly terrible—It sprung
From a sad house hold group, who wildly clung
Together, in their frantic agony,
Till they were torn by savage hands apart,
Wound arms from twining arms, and heart from heart,
Never to meet again! What had they done,
Thou tool of avarice and tyranny?
That they should thus be given o'er to thee
And thy guilt haunted cells? Where sire and son,
Mother and babe, all partners in one crime,
As dreadful as the fate that through all time,
Clings to them with a grasp they may not shun?

No!—let the tale be spoken, though it burn
The cheek with shame to breathe it—let it go
Forth to the winds that the wide globe may know
Our vileness, and the rudest savage turn
And point, with taunting finger, to the spot,
Whereupon thou standest; that all men may blot
Our name with its deserved taint, and spurn
Our vaunting laws of justice with the heel
Of low contumely; that every peal
Of triumph, may be answer'd with a shout
Of biting mockery; and our starry flag,
Our glorious banner! may dishonor'd, drag
Its proud folds in the dust, or only float
The gules of heaven, to a broader mark
For scorn to spit at;—oh, thou depot dark,
Where souls and human limbs are melted out,

In fiendish traffic!—No! Those weeping ones
Have done no evil;—but their brother's hand
Hath rudely burst the sacred house hold band,
And given, with heart more flinty than thy stones,
His victims to thy deeping, and thy chains,
Till he hath sold them! They within whose veins
Blood like his own is coursing, and whose moans
Are torn from hearts as deathless as his own!
And there thou stand'st, where Freedom's altar stone
Is darken'd by thy shadows, and the cry,
That thrills so fearfully upon the air,
With its wild tale of anguish and dispair,
Blends with the pæns that are swelling high,
To do her homage!—I have sometimes felt
As I could hate my country for her guilt,—
Until in bitter tears the mood went by.

EXTINCTION OF SLAVERR—At the late public meeting in opposition to slavery, held in Wilmington, Delaware, it was stated that three fourths of the inhabitants of the State are ready to sign a petition for the immediate abolition of slavery in that State, granting moderate compensation to the owners.—There are only about 3000 in the State. It is also said that Thomas H. Benson, U. S. Senator from Missouri, is about to submit a proposition to the Legislature of that State, for the abolition of slavery there

MISCELLANEOUS

From the Address to Youth by A. B. Eddy.

To secure the respect of others, and to be useful in life, you must cherish proper respect for public opinion. This is a duty which you owe yourself. I here introduce a subject which is often improperly understood. By respect for public opinion, I do not mean that you should, of necessity, adopt it, and be borne away before it, but that you should have regard to it and act in view of it. nothing will be more destructive to your influence and usefulness, than to become indifferent to public opinion and to act, irrespective of that opinion. Your object, as a member of the vast community, is, or should be, to derive all the good you can, and to impart all that salutary influence which lies within your power. You hear it often said of some—and it is said and heard too, perhaps, with commendation—"they are perfectly indifferent to public opinion—have no regard for what others think or say—they are original characters—have dignity and fortitude enough to stand alone." I can never hear such remarks without recurring to those two sound maxims, which you all may have met: "He that thinks the world can live without him, is unwise and he who thinks that he can live without the world is a fool." An original character! independent! no respect for the opinions and habits of others! then flee society, retire from the companionship of man; you are wholly unworthy their respect and worse than useless. You may live on her indulgence, and at their expense, but in no way contribute to the public good.

Do you ask, what is proper respect for public opinion? I reply, it is not necessarily to suppose that public sentiment is correct. It is not blindly to sanction what it would advocate. Nor is it to fall in with public opinion and comply with its long established habits of feeling and action. It is not to court, flatter, and obsequiously caress, each and every department of life. It is not to adopt the maxim of false politeness, and make yourself at home and on a level with every one you meet, and every circle into which you fall.

There is a certain undignified obsequiousness, a condescension to weakness and sin, to gain and enjoy public favour, which good sense and enlightened policy abhor. That this ranges far and wide, and too often influences the conduct of public political men, is too obvious to deny. Over these scurrility and prostituted sentiment have unlimited control. This is indeed respect for public sentiment, but the contrary of that which I would enjoin.

There is another submission to public sentiment to which I would allude. A disposition to allow public evils to exist, from the fear of arousing popular indignation in attempting their correction.—These evils abound among us; the depraved and abandoned feast and fatten like vampires, on the blood of virtue and we make an annual sacrifice to these cannibals, in the ruined habits, blasted for tunes, and lost souls of many a youth that might otherwise have adorned society and blessed the world. This is not respect for public opinion, it is a slavish fear of the influence and malignity of degraded and worthless men, united, perhaps with the dreaded of incurring the imputation of becoming the officious conservator of other mens morals and prosperity. Under this false respect for public sentiment, evils are left to grow, and spread and fasten themselves on the bosom of the community, which ought to arouse the indigdation of every virtuous citizen, and prompt to remedial efforts from all.

Respect for public opinion does not imply that you should make no efforts to alter and improve it It is not perfect and changeless. But respect for public sentiment, when correct, does demand a conformity to it on your part, when such conformity does not involve the sacrifice or derelict on of principle. Do not, for the sake of private opinion, or the pride of consistency, tenaciously cling to your own opinion and pursue your own way, because they are your own, when harmony with public feeling and action would be no other sacrifice for you than your own views and customs. Opposing others and rejecting their sentiment, when principle and virtue does not demand it, is unwise and undignified. In this changing world, changes do not imply instability and fickleness of character, but more often a becoming regard for public improvement, and an evidence of our own advancement in knowledge.

Respect for public opinion, implies that we do not overlook its existing character, in all our efforts to influence and improve society. We must study the character of public sentiment, and meet it in the way, best calculated to improve it, if wrong. Sometimes that sentiment is such, that a bold stroke may be given and an amazing change be wrought in an hour. More often it is such, that we must act through remote and unsuspected channels, and bring our influence, to bear with modest and mild sway over more distant evils, that we may ultimately reach and remedy the disease, that preys on the vitals of the community. It is one of the uniform principles of Providence, that great moral causes and changes are gradual in their growth, and generally slow in reaching maturrity, in proportion to the importance and permanence of their character.

Respect for public opinion implies, that we should not do unnecessary violence to public feeling. There is much improvement lost and many valuable revolutions defeated forever, by an utter disregard of the finer feelings of men, as well as of their ignorance, interests, and long-settled habits of thought and action. We often attempt too much and accomplish nothing; but a miserable and ruinous reaction ensues and the very evils which we sought to remedy, recoil upon us with double power.

As youth, just rising, to assume the control of the public interests, you will be required to influence and lead its opinions. You are not to take it for granted that these are in all respects right, and of course will continue so, and to yield yourselves up to their sway. This though too common, is not the respect for public sentiment which is due from you. It is not respect for yourselves, but a guilty sacrifice of private judgment and character to the vitiated propensities and habits of men. As citizens of a country, whose hope and safety is in virtue and intelligence; much more, as Christians, you ought to see public opinion correct and sustained in enlightened, holy, and dignified elevation, and give to it the sanction and support of intellectual eminence and moral purity.

I hope that you understand what I mean by respect for public opinion. It is such an accommodation to the views and habits of men; such a regard for the feelings and interests, that you may gain their confidence, do them the most good, and most powerfully aid in correcting and sustaining pure the public sentiment on all subjects of interests and duty. It may require, for one in this connection to remain by a course of conduct which would prove yourself, in the selection of your associates in life. Let them be such, as may, such, as will add to your reputation and usefulness. Make them the virtuous, the able, the profligate, and impure, and thus degrade yourself, you soon sink to their level, and participate in all the guilt and meanness of their character and serve but to encourage them in the headings of their loved corruption. We are not, in our best state, so free from moral contamination that we can breathe the air of guilt and pollution and not be tainted, within the soul of virtue feels the disease of disgrace and death. Let the idle, the vicious the immoral, and profane, be seen as welcome visitors at your home, or as your accustomed associates, and by the immutable laws of affinity and moral influence, you will not only be viewed by others as they are viewed, but you will soon become what they are, vicious, idle, profane and impure. I would bar and drive from my door and society such a man, as I would expel a pestilence. You are more safe with the robber prowling around your dwelling than with such. Your virtue purity peace reputation, and religion, are all gone, if your associates are not good.

A conscientious regard to this duty, will render an additional suggestion respecting the love of games, wholly unnecessary. An indulgence in these ought not to be expected in an age distinguished for refinement and the rich sources of intellectual improvement. The associations to which they will lead you, their uniform and degrading influence, vitiating sensibility and destroying time, are such, that the slightest allusion to them in this place, is all that is needed. As beings of thought and feeling accountable for time and destined to eternity, you will not waste probation, and thus incur the frown of God.

The last duty which I would impress upon you, is, to be prepared against all possible vicissitudes. You live in a world of changes, and peace in looking on that infinitely momentous change, that fixes you eternal states immutable forever. Here is a duty that presses upon you. Be prepared for changes. If not, when they come, and come they will, your composure is gone, your fortitude lost, your spirit broken, the man sinks to a child, and the Christian is obscured in the weakness of desertion and the misery of unbelief. Thus, in a moment one solitary revolution may blast your happiness and reputation and leave you a mere wreck of moral and moral being, incapable of repair and unfit for action, in any future effort of usefulness or duty.

What if from want of industry, you are unfitted to labour, when the changes and the chances of life have stripped you of support, and like the unjust steward, you can neither dig nor beg? Have you not injured yourself? What, if when placed where mental energy, intellectual force, and resources are demanded, you are found ignorant? Who must be reproached? Who, accused of neglected duty, but yourself! If void of moral honesty, when trust would, but cannot be reposed; if in the hour of need, by indulgence of intemperates desires, you find your frame weakened and wasted; your mind enfeebled and impaired; your character and credit gone—a wretched bankrupt in body, mind, morals, and estate yourself becomes the greatest creditor—the greatest SUFFER. And if friends desert you then, you have no friend in God! Sickness invades and lays your outward frame in the dust, the inward man to rise in renovated energy on its ruins. When death, with untried pains and terrors, and eternity spreads its changeless scenes! O! to be unprepared! What robbery, cruel robber, of thine own eternal good! Endless reproaches shall thy lost spirit give, and that pure sense of just revenge, God in thy creation gave the soul, shall react upon itself the worm that never dies; and with this, the sad reflection, that your blasted reputation and blighting influence still live and will live forever and two worlds claim, as their possession, and pass their sentence on your character. The one will write your epitaph here, the other your destiny hereafter. Your eternal spirit shall review the one and anticipate the other in the endurance of a just and righteous retribution.

THE LAW.

1. The spirit of the law is all equility and justice In a government based on true principles, the law is the sole sovereign of a nation It watches over its subjects in their business, in their recreation and their sleep. It guards their fortunes, their lives, and their honors.

2. In the broad noon day and the dark midnight it ministers to their security. It accompanies them to the altar and festal board. It watches over the ship of the merchant, though a thousand leagues intervene; over the seed of the husbandman abandoned for a season to the earth; over the studies of the student, the labors of the mechanic, the opinions of every man.

3. None are high enough to offend it with impunity, none so low that it scorns to protect them. It is throned with the king, and trate, but it also hovers over the couch of the lovely, and lands sentinel scrupulously preserving to the felon whatever right he has not forfeited.

4 The light of the law illuminates the palace and the novel, and surrounds the cradle and the bier. The strength of the law laughs fortresses to scorn, and burns the intrenchments of iniquity. The power of the law crushes the power of man and strips wealth of unrighteous immunity. It is the thread of Dædalus, to guide us through the labrynths of cunning. It is the spear of Ithuriel to detect falsehood and deceit.

5 It is the faith of the martyr to shield us from the fires of persecution—it is the good man's reliance—the wicked one's dread—the bulwark of piety—the upholder of morality—the guardian of right—the distributer of justice—its power is irresistible—its dominion is disputable. It is above us, and around us, and within us—we can not fly from its protection—we can not avert its vengeance.—Lit Messenger.

A TRAP. There is a half whispered story going the rounds—It is breathed with caution in the parlor from friend to friend—the chamber maid tells the cook, with injunctions not to use her name in the affair, and the cook whispers it to the coachman, who in turn tells it in an under tone to the ostler, who, having none of the household to whisper it to, deals it out in small portions at the bar-room of the tavern where he usually spends his evenings. "You don't say so?" says one opening his eyes as if he was witnessing the reality of the opening of the sixth seal, "Just what I expected!" exclaimed another, tossing off his toddy as if all things were matters of fact. "He's a snake in the grass!" vociferates a third, puffing a long nine as if he were drawing on a bank for specie.

Enough—we have kept the reader in a mortal dread of suspense,, all to no purpose We would give the particulars of this strange rumor were we not waiting for the denouement—which will, doubtless, come off with considerable eclat to one party or the other.

What, in the old Harry, has got into the married men? We heard of one the other day who is (or was) a prominent member of the church—who met with a beautiful and accomplished married lady, and immediately commenced writing amatory letters to her—who little dreaming of the trap that was laid for him, received the husband's answers over the signature of the wife and who at last found that the affair had progressed so far that a meeting was appointed. The husband, in the meanwhile, had a "decoy duck" out, and, had it not been for some bubbling on the part of said decoy duck, there is little doubt but the outward coat of the rogue would have become very intimately acquainted with cow hide

Such stories as these will frequently get wind, and there is no stooping them—but a hint has sometimes a very beneficial effect.

Caxton had the merit of introducing the Roman printing as used in Italy; and his successor, Pinson, triumphed by domesticating the Roman letter. The dash, or perpendicular line, thus ||; was the only punctuation they used. It was however discovered that "the craft of pointing we I used makes the sentence very light." The more elegant comma supplanted the long uncouth ||; the colon was a refinement, "showing that there is more to come." But the semicolon was a Latin delicacy which the obtuse English typography resisted. So late as 1580 and 1590, treatises on orthography do not recognize any such innovator; the Bible of 1592, though printed with appropriate accuracy, is without a semicolon, but in 1593 its full rights are established by Charles Butler, s English Grammer In this chronology of the four points of punctuation, it is evident that Shakespear could never have used the semicolon; a circumstance which the profound Geo. Chalmers mourns over, opining that semicolons would often have saved the poet from his commentators.—D' Israeli's Amenities of Literature.

HOW TO HELP A MAN.—That eminent physician, Zimmerman, being ordered to attend Frederick the Great, in his last illness, the king one day said to him, "You have, I presume, helped many a man into another world." This was rather a bitter pill for the doctor; but the dose he administered to his Majesty was as judicious a mixture of truth and flattery. "Not so many as your Majesty, nor with so much honor to myself," was the reply.

A ROMISH NUT.—A Roman Catholic priest some time since, in Germany, entering the pulpit, took a walnut into it. He told the people that the shell was tasteless and valueless—that was Calvin's Church. The skin was nauseous, disagreeable, worthless, valueless—that was the Lutheran Church. He then said that he would show them the holy Roman Apostolic Church He cracked the nut, and found it rotten.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, AND A. W. ANDERSON, ASSISTANT EDITORS.

VOL. XIV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) NOVEMBER 28. 1845. NO. 5

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Bissa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr. R. MURRAY,
Cape Palmas,	Dr. S. F. McGILL
Sierra Leone,	J.S. THORPE Esq

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY
Richmond Virginia,	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. T. TRACEY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

From the Address to Youth.

CHAPTER II.

In calling you to a review of your duties, I would not have you unmindful of your degeneracy, yet I would have you feel, that, though in ruins, you stand forth as the wreck of no common creation; you are intelligent, moral and responsible still, and capable of restoration to a glory unequalled by man in innocence, or angels unfallen. God gave infinite value to man, by the impress of his own image; he spoke of his still higher value when redeemed, while all the movements of this world, and the revealed realities of eternity, stamp with infinite words your responsible immortality. No order of beings has created in heaven and on earth such amazing interest as the race of man; and each one of you forms a constituent part of that race for whom this interest is felt and each one of you is a partaker of that responsibility which it imposes. And if God never has, and never will overlook you, amidst the vast varieties of being; if he numbers the hairs of your head, and watches the moments of your rest, well does it become you to regard your being your relations, and your high responsibility.

What are the DUTIES which you owe YOURSELF

I. SELF RESPECT. By self-respect I do not mean pride, nor the aspirations of ambition, nor any kindred to these unlovely passions. Nor do I mean, that you should regard yourself as essential to the honour of the world or the glory of God: but I do mean that you should look upon those powers which God has given you, and upon those influences which arise from the character and circumstances of your life and regard all these as clothing you with value to others; viewing yourselves as susceptible of ennobling influences, and capable of imparting such influences to others; and as such, not to permit your nature to be debased, nor your influence to be vitiated. As youth, you should respect yourself, not so much for what you are as for what you may become, under the wise and gracious care of heaven. What expansion of mind you may attain along the track of line and through ceaseless ages! What riches of knowledge drink in from infinite wisdom! exalted worth and moral excellence received from the grace of God!

You are, indeed, to have no respect for yourself considered in valuation as to personal moral worth; for, of this you are destitute: but you are to respect yourselves for those principles of moral being which united with your rational powers, so distinguish you in the rank of created existence. On these your influence, your usefulness, your happiness depend. Existence, animal and rational, and even unbounded attainments of intellectual worth, without these moral principles, would neither create nor allow the cultivation of piety.

If you have not self-respect, those intellectual powers and moral principles will be neglected, waste away their useless and perverted energies; the rational and responsible soul will sink, the wreck and ruins of what was created valuable and exalted the miserable memorial of what might have been re-en-stamped with the image of its Author, and risen on high an eternal testimony of its Author,s glory.

Self-respect is not only essential to the improvement of our intellectual and moral powers, the securities and culture of virtue and religion but it is essential towards securing the respect of our fellowmen, and preparing the way for valuable influence among them.

Mark that man who has no respect for himself, and for your life, you cannot respect him, nor intrust any thing of interest to his care. You know he has or will become the victim of his own unhallowed passion; a prey to all the crowding and corrupting influences of a fallen world. He may for a time amuse the world, and yet the world despise him, and he early sinks useless and miserable.

Self-respect is the first successful step towards the reformation of injured character. No efforts will avail without this. This is one of the surest pledges of advancement and success in life, and it is one of the strongest barriers of protection which our Creator has thrown around us. Respect yourself, or neither God nor man will respect you. Respect yourself, and resolve to secure the respect of the wise and good; and as you advance in years, you will rise in life, find your associations with the intelligent and virtuous and be stimulated to constant efforts for increased worth and usefulness.

2. SELF-PRESERVATION is an imperious duty that rests upon you.

By this I do not mean simply, that you are bound to preserve your safety, health, and life. Self-preservation I extend far beyond this. Man is complex in his nature, and complex in his character; and by self-preservation, I mean a sacred regard to all his powers and faculties, physical and moral on which his good and the design of his existence depends.

On self preservation, every thing rests, which stands connected with the value and responsibility of probation. There is something more meant than the simple pleasure of existence and instinctive love of being, when we say it is man,s duty to preserve his life; for that life stands connected with reason and moral feeling, and the interest of others, while infinite and endless results are suspended on its continuance and improvement.

The duty here presented, which you owe yourself, is comprehensive, and embraces, First, the duty of preserving life.

Second, the duty of preserving health. Upon this, much of the value and pleasure of life depend. Neglect this, and you impair reason, relax energy, and early destroy life itself. When God has extended the number of our years to threescore and ten, the millions who are swept so early to eternity will present a fearful array of self-destroyers at the judgment day. Here it becomes our duty, to suppress inordinate desire, and quench the fire of youthful passions; to avoid excessive and exhausting labours, beyond what usefulness and duty demand; to guard against habits of living, that impair native energies, cloud the mind, and vitiate moral sensibility. We must avoid such society intercourse, and amusement; recreation and study, and I will add, religious services, as entrench on hours which God has given for rest, and which our nature demands; with all those extravagancies and exposures which so early spread paleness, and weakness, and disease over such multitudes of our youth, and which are peopling the grave with their millions of victims every year.

3. Self-preservation implies the duty of securing and preserving your liberty. I mean not freedom from chains, tyranny, oppression and servitude alone, but I mean also exemption from those oppressive influences, which circumscribe and control the free use of those principles which were made for freedom of action. It is your duty to stand aloof and free from those shackles that fetter the energies of the mind, and circumscribe the independence of thought. Not that you are to throw off respect for established principles of mental investigation and and research, nor with misguided impression of intellectual freedom, falsely called "free inquiry," refuse to acknowledge your obligation to superior wisdom, and to walk by the light of higher intelligence.

This is not liberty, it is not manliness; it is presumption, licentiousness of thought and feeling, the mark of madness and folly.

By liberty, I also mean freedom from that foreign influence which forbids your acting from convictions of duty. There are those, over whom unhallowed example, public opinion, and fear of the world, are more powerful than the voice of reason and of conscience, combined with the force of moral obligation.

They have no mind of their own, they have no liberty; they are often the slaves of the vain and abandoned.

By liberty, is implied, also exemption from those slavish habits of life which give the desire of indulgence a governing influence, and often ultimately bind their subjects in chains of vice and misery.

Exemption, too, from those powers of sin, satan, and the world, which so control reason and conscience, and war against the force of truth and the grace of God. It implies that freedom from selfishness and sin, which shall enable you to reflect upon God, a dying hour, and the opening scenes of eternity.

He is the freeman, whom the truth makes free:
Who first of all the bands of satan breaks;
Who breaks the bands of sin; and for his soul,
In spite of fools, consulteth seriously;
In spite of fashion perseveres in God;
In spite of wrath or poverty, upright;
Who does as reason, not as fancy, bids;
Who hears temptation sing, and yet turns not
Aside; sees sin bedeck her flowery bed,
And yet will not go up; feels at his heart
The sword unsheathed, yet will not sell the truth;
Who, finally, in strong integrity
Of soul, midst want or riches, or disgrace,
Uplifted calmly sits, and hears the waves
Of stormy folly breaking at his feet;
Now shrill with praise, now hoarse with foul uproar,
And both despised sincerely; seeking this
Alone—the approbation of his God,
Which still, with conscience, witnesses his peace.
This, this is freedom, such as angels use,
And kindred to the liberty of God,
First born of virtue! Daughter of the skies
The man, the state in whom she rules is free.
All else are slaves of satan, sin, and death."

III. It is your Duty to Regard your Reputation.

1. And as an essential element of a valuable reputation, I would place, first, VERACITY, a sacred regard for truth. "Dice veritatem semper et-exacte," speak the truth always and exactly, is a maxim which I would have deeply engraven on the heart.

I am not speaking of the influence of falsehood on society at large but of its influence on private, personal reputation. Let the impression be made, that your character for truth is suspicious, and you sustain an incalculable loss. Let the charge become fixed upon you, the charge of falsehood, of easy deviation from strict veracity, of exaggerating of miscolouring reports; I say, let this charge be fixed upon you, and you are ruined. Nothing but full confession of conscience guilt and shame, with protracted reformation can restore you to confidence. And what is more enviable than an unsullied reputation for truth? In the varied departments of life, with all the accumulating relations and cares of this world, that man, who stands forth in unimpeached and unimpeachable veracity, is a monument of moral worth, and his reputation is more than wealth and honour.

I know that there is often variation from strict veracity where the subjects are more private, unimportant, and momentary, which may be called mere wanderings or embellishments of description. But that person who will transcend the bounds of strict veracity, at one time, will do it again and again; if he will do it on one subject of trifling character, he will, of course, do it on those of more importance, where the temptation becomes increased. If in description of facts he will exaggerate, he will do so in other cases—he has no character remaining for truth and veracity—"speak the truth always and exactly." I would write it on my Bible, and read it daily: write it on your hearts, that it may never be forgotten.

2. The next element of a valuable reputation is respect for the reputation of others, which implies a character free from the spirit and habit of detraction. There is deeply embedded in our fallen nature, a tendency to slander, and to this, as youth, you are peculiarly exposed. It arises from native selfishness, and a consequent tendency to envy and rivalship. As distinction and possession, above what want demands, are chiefly relative, the more we depress others the more comparatively we are raised. Thus, this most unlovely, yet common trait of human frailty and dishonour, stands too prominent in the history of our race.

Added to all this, there is often pride of discernment in marking, and a pleasure in reading character, and also the pleasure of imparting information, even in spreading defects of character, which is of no use, but of injury to all. Thus, slander has its origin and secures its currency. But I am not speaking of its effect on others, but of the injury that falls on him who gives it rise and circulation. Do this, and your reputation is gone. You are feared shunned, and despised, and this, too, in the midst of your own fraternity. There is no character more unlovely.

Nor is this all: there is something in human nature that shows the poisonous influence of the spirit of detraction as it re-acts upon its author. The Bible, that so brightly reveals human nature, thus writes it, "The lying tongue hateth him that suffereth thereby." This is the principle. You will hate the man that you have slandered—and why? because he is the living monument of your guilt. You have injured him, and that is the reason why you will hate him, and you will seek more defects in his character to sustain your charge. Thus this cruel and guilty habit throws poison into your own soul, and weaves into your character the elements of misery, and clouds your reputation in the eyes of the world.

Allied to the subject before us, and as injurious to the reputation I would have you to enjoy, is officiousness in the affairs of others, which is often a rude intrusion into the hallowed retirement of private life. I will not, however, speak of its cruel inroad on domestic peace and tranquillity; how often it disturbs and destroys the repose of the sick and infirm, of whose weakness and trials you are neither able nor appointed to judge. I will not speak of its influence on the private occupations of men, in impairing credit and abating that confidence which is due them; nor of those unhappy and unholy feelings of suspicion and jealousy, which, are aroused and thrown through the public; all these belong to another place. I. speak of its influence on your own private reputation What is more harassing to your own hearts than to be prying into the secret of others! Have you not troubles enough of your own without rolling on your arm the burden of others! Why should you perplex your own mind by winding your way into the perplexities of others! Until they ask your sympathy, your knowledge, your advice, it will be wise for you to come not within their secrets.

An officious inquiry into the affairs of others is calculated to create the spirit and the habit of censoriousness and detraction. You can never officiously inquire into the private arrangement of others, without impairing reputation and forfeiting friendship.

As a general rule, I would say, know nothing, inquire not at all, say nothing about the private, domestic, or the more restricted professional habits of men, where you have no personal responsibility; and even where you have, be cautious how this responsibility is met, lest you impair your own reputation. Be not busy bodies in other men,s matters, was a wise remark written for your instruction in the word of God.

I have not been speaking of a habit which has no existence. It prevails every where; you are all exposed to it; and you know it is charged upon us as a national characteristic. Possess this trait of character, and you are an unwelcome visitor at every house. You are dreaded by all. No one feels safe from the inspection of your eye, and the profuse disclosure of your lips; and what a reputation! You soon throw yourself on an eternal quarantine, from the respect and confidence of all who respect themselves, and wish to guard their private interests from the public gaze. Unless you are the guardians of of the manners and habits of more private life, or those manners and habits bear directly on the public morals, it would be wise for you to know nothing about them; and even when they do, it will be wise for you to inquire, how shall that influence be corrected, and whose duty does it become to arest it! I have extended my remarks upon this point, which, though it may now seem unimportant to you, is connected with many endeared interests, and by it much of private character and friendship is often sacrificed forever.

There is another subject which I wish to present, and it is not that of officiousness, nor of slander, and yet it is somewhat allied to both. It is the disposition and habit of seizing the remark of free and unsuspecting conversation throwing them into new forms and, under the profession of friendship perhaps the requirement of secrecy, carrying them to persons and families of whom these free and unsuspecting observation were made. There is, and always will be, too much freedom of observation and remarks in the society of men, even respecting their own friends. We are all defective, and liable to err; and when we must all form our own opinion, and with more or lees freedom express it, there is great forbearance demanded in social life, as well as much watchfulness as to what we say. With all our clashing opinions and conduct, we cannot expect that all will see and feel alike, and it is natural to make the constantly recurring events, habits, and manners of social community, subjects of social review, perhaps of free, and sometimes severe remark. A habit which is by no means to be commended, for its indiscriminate indulgence, yet which will, from the nature of society, to some extent exist. The habit I have in view, is the abuse of this freedom of remark, criticism, perhaps stricture, or even direct censure of personal character and conduct, by carrying it home to the individual concerned. This is generally done in testimony of friendship, as an expression of interest in our behalf, to let us know how careful our informant have been of our reputation; and generally they will tell us how they supported us when unknown, when perhaps, they were the very persons to present us as subject of censure; and thus they will early seize the opportunity to secure our minds in their favour, at the expense, perhaps, of our best friends, who spoke of us freely, but with the kindest feelings and in language; too from its character and connexions, wholly diverse from the shade it assumes coming from its officious depositary. By this habit you will be regarded with distrust, and soon become an unsafe and suspicious witness of ordinary conversation. You take upon yourself the hazardous responsibility of being the interpreter and reporter of free and unsuspecting intercourse; you easily form the habit of officious tattling; and busy yourself with the private feelings of others, which serve only to harrass your own. And you gain no esteem, no confidence, no friendship, from those to whom you carry these free and unguarded expressions. You will be regarded, not as a friendly messenger of welcome and of profitable intelligence, but it will be said at once, that if you will bring such information you will also carry back the same, if you have it in your power. Thus you lose the confidence you vainly thought to gain, and of all the losers of each and every party, you lose the most. I had rather speak with injudicious freedom, or have my name presented with censure, than to be the messenger that bears it. Whatever be that freedom of remark or censure, be it mere stricture or downright defamation, who wishes to be the messenger of pretty or malignant slander! Both would fall harmless and die, were it not for pretended friends emblazon it abroad, and harrow up suspicion, unwholly and revengeful passion, in the bosom, that had been calm and undisturbed without it. We are not perfect, and we should not expect universal commendation. This you must not anticipate. But this I would have you desire, to regard all mankind as your friends, and cherish no suspicion of the sincerity of that friendship. This I would strongly desire; and never wish to have poured into my ear, to pain my heart and check the freedom of my intercourse and usefulness, whatever may have been said or done in an unguarded moment, or what may have been thought or expressed of me, perhaps with the kindest feelings, if not of general approbation and esteem. I would say, then, know all men as friends, and be an unsuspecting friend of all; and I would say, too, with feling and would enforce it on your consideration, never repeat to others what you have heard against them.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

British slave trading exterminated? It is a lie. There is no other word appropriate to the case. It is a lie—a gross, a palpable, an 'enormous' lie. It is proved to be a lie by Zulueta's trial. It is proved to be a lie by Mr. Forster's whitewashing committee."

Such was the exclamation of a London editor, about a year ago. Is it true? and if true what apology, what palliation can be offered? Here is the report of Zulueta's trial,—a London pamphlet of ninety-six pages,—and here is the report of "Mr. Forster's white-washing committee;" and here are other documents relating to the same subject —

Pedro de Zulueta, jr., of the ffirm of Zulueta & Co., London, was tried before the Central Criminal Court of the city of London, on the 17th 28, and 30th of October, 1843, on a charge of slave trading. It is not necessary to fatigue our readers with all the complicated details of the evidence. The facts material to the present question are as follows:

Zulueta & Co. were commission merchants, transacting business for Don Pedro Martinez, of Cadiz; Pedro Martinez, & Co., of Havana; Blanco & Cavallo of Havana; and others, in South America and the West Indies. From those houses, they received consignments of sugar, cochineal, and other merchandize, which they sold, and disposed of the proceeds according to the instructions received. Zulueta knew, from common report, that Martinez, of Cadiz, and Martinez & Co., of Havana, were engaged in the slave trade. He knew, in the same way, that Gallinas, on the west coast Africa, was a slave mart, though he professed not to know that there was no lawful commerce there. In the course of twenty years, he had shipped goods to the amount of £20,000, or £22,000, to Africa nearly all of which was shipped to Gallinas, on account of Martinez, and Martinez & Co. These goods appeared to be such as might be used for lawful purposes, but are needed for the purchase and subsistence of slaves. They had been consigned to different persons; sometimes to Pedro Blanco, who, Zulueta said, "was, for a certain time, an agent of Pedro Martinez on the coast." They also accepted bills drawn by Pedro Blanco and other "people on the coast," to be paid out of funds in their hands belonging to Martinez, Martinez & Co., or Blanco & Cavallo.

In 1839, a vessel called the Golupchick, under the Russian flag, but with a Spanish master and crew, and fully equipped for the slave trade, was captured on the coast of Africa, and sent to England, where the Russian consul interfered, and at length she was sold at auction. There was some uncertainty as to the real purchaser. The ostensible purchaser was Thomas Jennings, who had long been in the employment of Pedro Martinez. The purchase money was furnished by Zulueta & Co., on account of Martinez; and the vessel was mortgaged to Martinez as security. Zulueta at first instructed Jennings not to give more than £500, but afterwards paid £650. She was supposed to be worth £1,400. The vessel was then named the Augusta, and chartered by Martinez, through Zulueta & Co., for a voyage to Gallinas, with Jennings as master. She was taken from Portsmouth to Liverpool, received a cargo suitable for the African trade, and sailed for Gallinas; Zulueta paying the bills, on account of Martinez. She was consigned to three notorious slave traders at Gallinas.

On leaving the Irish channel, a heavy gale came on; the ship was damaged and endangered, and the crew insisted on putting back to Cork, not more than one hundred miles distant, with a fair wind; but Jennings pressed on for nineteen days, against adverse winds, to Cadiz. From Cadiz she carried letters from Martinez to the consignees at Gallinas. There was proof that touching at Cadiz for these letters was a part of the original plan of the voyage, as understood by Martinez and Jennings. The letters contained abundant instructions concerning certain slave trading operations; and one of them authorized the consignees to employ the Augusta in procuring supplies for the slaves on hand, or articles for the slaves on hand, or articles for the purchase of other slaves; and adds:—"You may also employ the aforesaid vessel in any matter of extreme urgency, and in the service of that factory; for I feel assured that the master will object to nothing." On arriving off Gallinas, she was taken by a British cruiser, sent to Sierra Leone, and there condemned. Her guilty connection with the slave trade was so evident from the letters found on board, that Jennings attempted no defence.

Zulueta's trial was for his participation in fitting out the Augusta. The question was, whether he was aware of the character of her voyage. The letters put on board at Candiz would not be used against him; though they would have been good against Jennings had he been on trial. The verdict was "Not Guilty."

It appears, hen, that in England a man may act as agent of the most notorious slave traders on earth, knowing such to be their uncontradicted and unquestioned reputation; that he may buy and charter vessels for them, to be used in the slave trade; purchase and ship supplies for the slaves in the barracoons, and goods to be bartered for slaves, and accept and pay their bills growing out of their slave trading transaction, and it is all lawful; provided that he knows the character of the business only by common report. If he should receive and execute an order to buy and ship so many pieces of cotton to be used in the slave trade, he would be guilty; but if he receives an order from a notorious slave trader to buy so many pieces of cotton, and ship them to well known slave traders at Gallinas, where there is no trade but the slave trade; and if he only executes that order, asking no questions for conscience's sake, it is all right.

The advantage which slave traders may derive from such an agency in England, are manifest. The slaves must be bought, almost wholly, with goods of British manufacture. The means of carrying on the trade are procured, of necessity, principally in England; and the rest in the United States, and other countries where the slave trade is unlawful. Agents in the countries from which the necessary articles must be procured, who can buy and ship them innocently, are almost indispensable to its most successful prosecution. Don Pedro Martinez is perfectly aware of the value of these arrangements. In one of the letters found on board the Augusta, dated "Cadiz, December 10, 1840,' and addressed to "Don Ignacio Perez Rollo, Gallinas," one of the consignees, he says:—"The friends at New York and London have replied to me, relative to their being willing to satisfy the bills you may draw on them; which would facilitate giving a somewhat greater impulse to business." No doubt it would, as it would enable them to purchase cotton, gunpowder, rum, and tobacco, more advantageously; but how are Zulueta & Co., of London, or Peter Harmony & Co, of New York, on whom he was to draw in preference, to know whether those bills represented the profits of the slave trade, or of the trade in palm oil, sugar, or cochineal? If the latter, it is evidently an honest business.

Let us repress our indignation for a few moments, and look at this matter calmly. Our laws on this subject, we believe, are somewhat stricter than those of England; but might nothing of the kind happen here? Suppose that Martinez sends a cargo of Mexican goods, the produce of "free labor"—for he deals largely in such—to Peter Harmony & Co., who sells them for him. He then authorizes "Don Ignacio Perez Rollo, of Gallinas," to buy so many pieces of cotton of any American trader whom he may find at Cape Mount, or Shebro, or the Rio Grande, and pay for it by drawing bills on Peter Harmony & Co. It is a very great convenience to the slave trader; but what is to be done about it? Peter Harmony owes the money, and must pay it; even if he knows what the cotton was bought for.

Take another case. In our April number we gave an account of the sale of the Atalanta, of New York, to slave traders, and of her sailing for Havanna with more than 400 slaves on board. Suppose that some agent of Martinez was the purchaser, which is not at all improbable; that he paid Captain Johnson for the Atalanta by a draft on Peter Harmony & Co; and that they are indebted to Martinez, as before supposed. In such a case, the New York house owes the money, and must pay it.

In fact, it is impossible for any merchant absolutely to secure his business against the possibility of being made indirectly subservient to the convenience of slave traders. Guard himself as he can, something that he sells may get into their hands; and the price of something that he buys may go into their pockets. All that can reasonably be demanded of a merchant, is, that he shall make no voluntary contribution to their success.

Another consideration. If Zulueta & Co. had no capital of their own, Martinez could not safely trust them with property, nor could they successfully transact his business, to the amount of some tens of thousands annually. It takes British capital to make a good London agent for a Spanish slave trader. British capital is employed in the agency for "sugar and cochineal," and so gets mixed up with the Spanish capital that traders in sugar, cochineal, and slaves, and becomes subservient to the slave trade. Any one may see how easy it is for a British merchant, of more avarice, than conscience, to let his capital get mixed up in this way, to almost any extent, without exposing himself to the law. And who can doubt that it is done—deliberately and profitably done—to a vast amount? Not improbably, more than half the capital employed in the slave trade, is British; and very possibly, a large part of the rest is American. This, of course, is mere conjecture; for if we were able to prove it against any American merchant, we should soon stop his operations. Still, when we think of the immense profits of the slave trade, the facilities for indirect and undetected participation in it, and the supremacy of avarice in many minds, there can be no reasonable doubt on the subject.

We will now look at another, a more direct and more startling case of subserviency to the convenience of slave traders. Lieut. Charles H. Bell, of the U. S. brig Dolphin, in a letter to the Secratary of the Navy, dated "New York, July 28, 1840," says:

"Most of the slavers sent into Sierra Leone have such articles on board as are used in trafficing for slaves. When the vessels are condemned, these articles are sold at public auction—are purchased by an Englishman there who is said to be the agent of Pedro Blanco, the great slave dealer at Gallinas. Whether this is the case or not, is of little consequence; they are put on board of an English cutter belonging to this man, who carries them to Gallinas, and lands them at his pleasure. This is well known to every person at Sierra Leone; and, in conversation with the Governor, when he made some remarks on the shameful use of our flag in this trade, I spoke to him on the subject; stated that the slave trade was encouraged and abetted by such proceedings under the very eye of his Government. He said he was sensible of it; but, as this was a legal traffic, he could not prevent it. British as well as American and French merchant vessels are also engaged in supplying these slave stations with provisions, and even luxuries, for which they are well paid, and for want of which they could not exist."

Incredible as these statements may appear, their truth is more than admitted by "Mr. Foster's white-washing committe;" in other words the "Select committe of the British House of Commons, on the state of the British possessions on the west coast of Africa." That portion of their report, presented in August, 1842, which relates to the subject before us, we give entire:

"We now come to the question which has of late excited so much interest and feeling—that of the facilities which British commerce is charged with having furnished to the slave trade, and to the extent and nature of the connexion which exists between them—a question which must be considered dispassionately and soberly, rather with a view to what is best for the object, upon the whole, and to what is practicable, than to what might at first appear to be desirable, and what might be perhaps a partial good, producing possibly, in other ways, a greater evil. Now, in the first place, it is fair to state that we have no evidence, or reason to believe, that any British merchant, concerned in the trade with the west coast of Africa, either owns or equips any vessel engaged in the slave trade, or has any share in the risks or profits of any slave trade venture. The charge is this, and it must be admitted, that whether by selling condemned slave vessels back to slave dealers, which is the rarer case, or, which is the more common, by selling to slave dealers lawful gods, which are afterwards employed in barter for slaves, (whether circuitously by sale to merchants in Cuba and Brazil, or directly on the coast of Africa,) the British merchant and manufacturer does, in common with the merchants of other nations, furnish very considerable facilities for the slave trade.

"It must further be admitted, that, owing to the equipment article in our recent treaties, which has prevented the actual slaver from hovering on the coast in safety, a large portion of the goods necessary for the slave trade is driven into vessels innocent in their apparent character, but serving the purposes of the slavers and that in consequence, a somewhat larger portion of this kind of traffic may possibly now pass directly from the English or other merchants to the coast of Africa than heretofore when those supplies went round by Cuba and Brazil in the slavers themselves, without risk of capture.

"Now an opinion has prevailed, and that in very influential quarters, and it runs through Doctor Madden,s report, that at least such direct dealing is illegal, and punishable under the statute of 5 Geo. 1V, c. 5 and, if not so already; the same parties would urge on Parliament to make it so by new enactment; and some even would extend it to all connexion, however indirect, in which a guilty knowledge of the destination of the goods or of the vessel could be presumed. Now, this view of the act is not unnatural, owing to the general and comprehensive nature of its language, and to the desire which must naturally exist to understand it in as comprehensive a sense as possible, for the obstruction of so odious and detestable a traffic as the slave trade. But, looking closely at the language of the act itself, and to the interpretation put upon it by the law officers of the Crown, as alluded to by the under secretary of the colonies, in his letter to Doctor Madden, April, 1842, and to the opinion of the attorney general in the case, inserted in the evidence, we cannot affirm it to be illegal now, and we shall presently state to the House why, however reluctantly we may come to the conclusion, we are not prepared to recommend that it should be made so.

"Now, in the first place, it is difficult to consider or to make that illegal which is and has been done at Sierra Leone for years, by a court of judicature, (in doing so, acting under treaties and under the sanction of an act of Parliament, namely,) selling publicly, and to the highest bidder, prize vessels and prize goods condemned for slave dealing indiscriminately, and without precaution or restriction, to persons of all descriptions, including slave dealers themselves, and which, in regard to vessels at least, had been practised in that colony, by persons of high character and station, unreproved. But, if it should be made illegal hereafter to sell a vessel to a party concerned in the traffic in slaves, the next question, and one that a legislative body must consider, is, in what manner shall such a prohibition be enforced? A bond that the vessel shall not be disposed of to a slave dealer has been proposed; but how shall the vessel be prevented from passing very shortly from hand to hand, till it reaches an unlawful owner? And is it not unwise for the law to attempt that which it has so little means of effectually enforcing? There seems no remedy for this, which, at Sierra Leone, in the heart of the slave trade, and where the vessel is often sold for half its value, is an evil substantially as well as in feeling, but that of extending the provisions of those treaties which direct that a slave vessel shall be broken up, not sold, and altering our own municipal laws to the same effect.

"But, in regard to goods and merchandise, should the committee advise the House to make such dealing illegal? Now, all the witnesses, even those who advocate this view most strongly, admit that legitimate trade, by which is meant the exchange of merchandize for produce, is most beneficial to Africa, and cooperates materially with the cruiser in his operations, whether directly by the assistance and information with which the British trader supplies him, or indirectly by diminishing the necessity of a trade in slaves, as the means of procuring European or other goods. They admit that nothing, therefore, would be more injurious to the interests of Africa than to interfere materially with the operations of lawful commerce. It appears, moreover, that in every place on the coast north of the line, (to which limits our inquiries have mainly been confined,) with the exception of perhaps two or three points, a lawful trade of more or less extent is or has been, carried on contemporaneously with and often, may generally, by the same persons as the slave trade. They have told us that the same goods, such as cottons, rum, tobacco, guns, and gunpowder, are employed in both trades; and that, although those employed in the slave trade are often of an inferior description, yet that quality alone will not furnish the means of distinguishing between the one and the other, and that, practically, there are no means of making such a distinction; they have told us that any restriction on traffic which they would recommend must therefore be confined to places or persons solely or principally concerned in the slave trade, and that the law should not attempt to interfere with any other. The question still remains, how this is to be carried out.

"With regard to those places where the slave trade has been extinguished, no difficulty will arise; but with regard to those places, not few in number nor of slight importance, where, as in Bassao now, and as it has been, and may be again, in the Bruss and Bony rivers, the most important marts for lawful trade upon the coast of Africa, a trade in produce and slaves is carried on together, and by the same persons; or where, as in Wydah and Popo, a trade in produce has been gradually growing up and gaining upon the slave trade, in proportion as the enterprise of the British merchant pushes on the one, and the vigilance of the British cruiser checks and cripples the other, how should the Legislature deal with them? Shall they be lawful or unlawful ports or persons? What is to legalize the traffic in such cases? What proportion, or what positive amount of lawful traffic? But, indeed, how is the lawful traffic to spring up at all under such circumstances of exclusion!

"Some witnesses have argued that this question of degree need not be defined, but may be left to be solved by the practical sense of a jury. But what jury? In England or at Sierra Leone! Under such uncertainties and obstructions would the most scrupulous trader deal with the coast of Africa, if left to the misinterpretation of such instructions as the nature of such a case will admit, by a supercargo, his vessel and goods are liable to be brought some hundreds or thousands of miles out of their course, to have the question decided by a jury, whether some person of some factory dealt with was principally or not engaged in the slave trade, it being unlawful if partially, in some unknown and varying proportion, so engaged.

"The question for the Legislature to consider is, whether it is worth while to do all this, to infuse so much risk and uncertainty into a trade which it wishes to encourage, which it looks to as one of the main instruments for the civilization of Africa for the sake of interfering with so small a proportion of facilities which commerce permitted at all with Africa, under her present circumstances must of necessity afford more or less to the trade in slaves. For, unless all other countries can be persuaded to take the same view, it must, indeed, be a small proportion, and little, indeed, will have been done towards the object; an obstruction will merely have been raised for such length of time as may be required for conveying the same goods from England, or from foreign countries, through other channels. It would be merely a transfer and a transfer to parties, less friendly to the object, and less under control. We have had ample evidence that foreign vessels already carry on this trade to a considerable extent; nor is there any right, by existing treaty with foreign nations, nor can it be expected that we should obtain it, to interrupt foreign vessels engaged in such a traffic. But, indeed, how would it be carried on? The right of search, in any shape, is one, as we know by experience, that requires the greatest delicacy in carrying out with the ships of friendly nations. But what kind of search must that be which would seek to ascertain, on board of an apparently innocent vessel, innocent in her build and in her equipment, and freighted with innocent goods, whether the destination of such goods was not made unlawful by some document hidden in the most obscure recesses of the vessel! How prolonged, how minute, consequently how irritating at all times, how vexatious if unsuccessful; how likely to be unsuccessful, if not guided by more obvious indications; how likely, consequently, to lead to disputes and collissions among nations most injurious, if not fatal, to that harmonious co-operation for the common object, which is so absolutely essential to success. It must not be lost sight of how large a share of these evils must be inflicted on those who are engaged in our own lawful commerce, if such a search be applied to them.

"Now, if we were bound by a rigid principle to do this, these arguments must be rejected, as not affecting a case of conscience; but in this case we are not trying the value of a rigid principle. The principle would be intelligible which dictated the absolute interdiction of all commerce with every place from which a single slave was exported; or, further still, with every place from which a slave trade was carried on, such as Cuba and Brazil; or if it dictated a prohibition to send goods where there was a probability that they might by exchanged for slaves. But this arbitrary and uncertain limitation, so little capable of being referred to strict principle, and yet so injurious to lawful commerce, can only rest on the ground of its expediency, of its tendency to attain or promote the the object; must submit to be tried by that test and so tried will be found wanting. It is no doubt galling to a zealous and gallant officer, engaged, in the service of his country and humanity, in watching anxiously a well-known slaver's haunt, to see foreign vessels, still more, vessels bearing his own country's flag, passing inwards and supplying them, though innocent of the motives, which are the medium of so atrocious traffic; it is not surprising, under such circumstances, that feeling should have arisen which appears in Doctor Madden's report, and in the evidence of several, especially the naval, witnesses. It is a feeling natural and honorable in itself, and we hope that the English merchant, animated, as he is by the same feelings of horror for the slave trade, will endeavor to extend the influence of these feelings through the whole circle of his transactions. But we cannot recommend that a provision so difficut to be carried out, so vexatious, and yet so ineffectual for its object, should be made the subject of legislation."

What answer shall be given to this reasoning? It cannot be answered. It is conclusive. While slaves can be bought in Africa and sold in some other part of the world, legislation cannot keep British commerce, or American commerce, from furnishing facilities for the slave trade. No one, we presume, thinks of establishing and enforcing an absolute commercial non-intercourse between Africa and all the rest of the world. Of course, then, a stop must be put to the selling of slaves in Africa, or to the buying of slaves in Brazil and in all other countries; or the trade will go on, and in defiance of all possible legislative enactments, will derive facilities from the general commerce of the world.

We conclude, therefore, that, in a certain sense the bare assertion of the London editor is true. The employment of British capital in furnishing facilities for the slave trade is not abolished; and what is more, it never can be abolished by the course of policy on which the British government has hitherto relied. For the sake of Africa, and of humanity, we rejoice to see that some of her leading men are at last adopting sounder views.

MARY EAST, THE FEMALE HUSBAND,

About the year 1736, a young fellow courted one Mary East, and for him she conceived the greatest liking; but he, going upon the highway, was tried for a robbery and cast, but was afterwards transported: this so affected our heroine, that she resolved ever to be married. In the same neighbourhood lived another young woman, who had likewise met with many crosses in love, and had determined on the like resolution; being intimate, they communicated their minds to each other; and determined to live together ever after. After consulting on the best method of proceeding, they agreed that one should put on man's apparel, and that they would live as man and wife in some part where they were not known: the difficulty was who was to be the man, which was soon decided, by the toss-up of a halfpenny, and the lot fell on Mary East, who was then about sixteen years of age, and her partner seventeen. The sum they were then possessed of together was about 30*l.*; with this they set out, and Mary, after purchasing a man's habit, assumed the name of James How, by which we will for awhile distinguish her. In the progress of their journey, they happened to light on a little public-house at Epping, which was to let; they took it, and lived in it for some time; about this period a quarrel happened between James How and a young gentleman. James entered an action against him, and obtained damages of 500*l.* which was paid him. Possessed of this sum, they sought out for a place in a better situation, and took a public-house in Limehouse-hole, where they lived many years as man and wife, saving money, in good credit and esteem: they afterwards left this, and removed to the White Horse at Poplar, which they bought, and after that several more houses.

About the year 1750, one Mrs. Bentley, who lived on Garlick-hill, and was acquainted with James in her younger days, knowing in what good circumstances she lived, and of her being a woman, thought this a good scheme to build a project on, and accordingly sent to her for £10 at the same time intimating that if she would not send it, she would discover her sex James, fearful of this, complied with her demand, and sent the money. It rested here for a considerable time, during which James lived with his supposed wife in good credit, and had served all the parish-offices in Poplar, excepting constable and churchwarden, from the former of which she was excused by a lameness in her hand, occasioned by the quarrel mentioned; the other she was to have the next year, if this discovery had not happened: she had been several times foreman of juries; though her effeminacy indeed was remarked by most. At Christmas 1755, Mrs. Bentley sent again with the same demand for £10. and with the like threatening obtained it: illused with success, and not yet contented, she within a fortnight after sent again for the like sum, which James at that time happened not to have in the house: however, still fearful and cautious of a discovery; she sent her £5. The supposed wife of James How now died, and the same conscionable Mrs. Bentley, now thought of some scheme to enlarge her demand; for this purpose she got two fellows to execute her plan, the one a mulatto, who was to pass for one of Justice Fielding's gang, the other to be equipped with a short pocket staff, and to act as constable. In these characters they came to the White Horse, and inquired for Mr. How, who answered to the name; they told her that they came from Justice Fielding to take her into custody for a robbery committed by her thirty four years ago, and moreover that she was a woman. Terrified to the greatest degree on account of her sex, though conscious of her innocence in regard to the robbery' an intimate acquaintance, one Mr. Williams, a pawnbroker, happening to be passing by, she called to him and told him the business these two men came about, and withal added this declaration to Mr. Williams,—"I am really a woman, but innocent of their charge." On this sincere confession, he told her she should not be carried to Fielding, but go before her own bench of justices; that he would just step home put on a clean shirt, and be back in five minutes. At his departure, the two fellows threatened James How, but at the same time told her, that if she would give them £100. they would trouble her no more: if not, she would be hanged in sixteen days and they should have £40. a-piece for hanging her. Notwithstanding these threatnings she would not give them the money, waiting with impatience till the return of Mr. Williams: on her denial, they immediately forced her out, and took her near the fields, still using the same threats; adding with imprecations, "Had you not better give us the £100. than be hanged?" After awhile they got her through the fields, and brought her to Garlick Hill to the house of the identical Mrs. Bentley, where with threats they got her to give a draft on Mr. Williams to Bentley, payable in a short time; which when they had obtained, they sent her about her business. Williams came back punctual to his promise, and was surprised to find her gone: he immediately went to the bench of justices to see if she was there, and not finding her, went to Sir John Fielding's; and not succeeding, came back, when James soon after returned; when she related to him all that had passed. The discovery was now puplic. On Monday July 14, 1760, Mrs. Bentley came to Mr. Williams with the draft, to know if he would pay it, being due the Wednesday after: he told her if she came with it when due, he should know better what to say; in the mean time, he applied to the bench of justices for advice, and Wednesday being come, they sent a constable with others to be in the house. Mrs. Bentley punctually came for the payment of the draft, bringing with her the mulatto man, both of whom were taken into custody, and carried to the bench of justies sitting at the Angel in whitechapel, where Mr. Williams attended with James How, dressed in the proper habit of her sex, now again under her real name of Mary East. The alteration of her dress from that of a man to that of a woman appeared so great, that, together with her awkward behaviour in her new-assumed habit, it caused great diversion.

In the course of their examination Mrs. Bentley denied sending for the £100; the mulatto declared likewise, if she had not sent him for it he should never have gone, In short, they so contradicted each other, that they discovered the whole villainy of their designs. In regard to the ten pounds which Bentley had before obtained, she in her defence urged that Mary East had sent it to her. After the strongest proof of their extortion and assault, they were denied any bail and both commited to Clerkewell Bridewell, to be tried for the offence: the other man made off, and was not afterwards heard of. At the following session, the mulatto, whose name was William Barwick, was tried for defrauding the female husband of money, and was convicted, when he was sentenced to four years imprisonment, and to stand four times in the pillory.

During the whole time of their living together as man and wife, which was thirty-four years, they were held in good credit and esteem, having, during this time, traded for many thousand pounds, and been to day punctual in their payments; they had also by honest means saved up between £4000. and £5000. It is remarkable that it has never been observed that they dressed a joint of meat in their whole lives, nor ever had any meetings or the like at their house. They never kept either maid or boy; but Mary East, the late James How, always used to draw beer, serve, fetch in and carry out pots herself, so consistent were they in each particular.

REDEEMING THE TIME.

Can time lost be redeemed? Alas no. It has gone to join the years beyond the flood. It never will,—it never can return. It is gone, and gone forever; with all the golden opportunities which it brought for securing the great objects of life, and preparing for immortality. And what an awful reflection will this be to the giddy follower of pleasure, on a dying bed! "Oh time," exclaimed an agonized youth, "it is fit that thou should'st strike thy murderer to the heart." When the value of time comes to be fully known, and the folly of misspending it is seen in its true light, then and not till then, will the full meaning of that fearful word remorse, be felt.

But though time past cannot be redeemed, nor its lost opportunities recross the great gulf which they have passed, it is yet possible to be "wise redeeming the time." Yes, reader, you may yet, if you will, redeem time from idleness, to spend in the improvement of the mind. You may redeem time from the listless and pernicious company, from idle chit-chat, from that too which leads to detraction and scandal, to devote to the service of the God in whose hand your life and breath is, and whose are all your ways. You who waste the precious moments of your existance in frivolity and pleasure, among the thoughtless and the gay, can now have no just conception of the amount of time which you might redeem, the noble purposes to which it might be devoted, nor the superior pleasure which it might afford you.

What is the time-waster but a murderer—a suicide! If he does not shed blood, he renders its pulsations useless, aye, more than useless. If he does not shorten the span of human life, he renders it a curse. If he rushes not unbidden into the presence of his Judge, "with all his imperfections on his head," he treasures up wrath against the day of wrath! What then can be a surer mark of wisdom than to redeem time.—Christian Watchman.

GOOD—BETTER—BEST: or three ways of making a happy world. Philadelphia: American Sunday School Union,

This book points out three ways of doing good, and they are designated by the three degrees of comparison in the title-page. The plan of the writer is, to unfold in a series of conversations, these there ways of making our fellow beings happy. We should perform a very ungracious task by telling what these three ways are; but this we can do, we can assure all, and the young especially, that if they will obtain the book, and commence reading it, they will find themselves led along in the most delightful manner, from scene to scene, and from picture, to picture till they will see clearly what these three ways are, and then we hope they will no longer hesitate in making their choice between them. Our excellent friend, Mr. Tappan the sweet poet of Boston, will hand them the book with pleasure if they will call on him at No. 5 Cornhill.

NOTICE.

The subscribers having been engaged for several years in the transaction of a general wholesale commission business, hereby offer their services to the public in that capacity.

Our business comprehending the leading articles of Drugs and Dye stuffs, Palm Oil, Ivory, Hides, Gum Copal, Peppers, Ebony, Gold Dust, and other kinds of African produce,—we flatter ourselves that with our knowledge of the different markets for these articles, we can present sufficient inducements to shippers to avail of our services.

Reasonable advances in money, or purchases of goods on order, will be made on all consignments when requested;—the consignees always being in possession of Bill-Lading of the articles shipped, which will be required to be made over to them in the form usual in such cases.

☞No traffic in spirituous liquors.

TWOMBLY & LAMSON,
15 and 16,
Commercial Wharf.

Boston, Mass. U. S. A.
July 21st, 1845.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, DECR. 28th, 1845.

There is every probability that the ensuing season will be one of uncommon scarcity. In consequence of the early rains the natives were unable to burn off their farms, and what little rice was made is nearly all bought up to supply the slave factories at prices which the colonists cannot afford to give. Our people have at last been taught a lesson which they have been too slow to learn—the precariousness of subsistence while they depend either on foreigners or natives for their supplies. This circumstance has given an impetus to the agricultural interest, and we may safely say that at no former period of the colony's history has there been so much doing in the farming way as at present.

On the 8 of December the Roanoake arrived with a reenforcement of missionaries and teachers attached to the mission of the M. E. Church. One of the gentle. the Rev. Mr. Benham is the Superintendant of the Mission. We trust their lives and health may be spared for usefulness in these dark corners of the world.

In this vessel there were 190 immigrants emancipated by the will of the late Mr. Hoe of Prince George county Virginia, for the express purpose of being sent to Liberia. We do not recollect having seen a more robust and healthy looking set of people, and we trust they will be an acquisition to the colony. By the activity of Gover nor Roberts the most of them are already on their final location up the river.

On the 16th December the barque Pons, of Philadelphia with seven hundred and fifty slaves, a prize the U S. S. Yorktown commander Bell, anchored in our harbour. When captured she had nine hundred and thirteen! Her compliment was fourteen hundred, but she was so closely watched by the H. B. M. Vessel the Cygnet that the Captain put to sea with nine hundred and thirteen, although the remaining five hundred were on the beach ready to be shipped. Shortly after she cleared the land the Yorktown fell in with her and hoisted English colors; the Pons ran up American colors. The Yorktown's boat preparing to board her she suspected all was not right and lowerd the American flag and hoisted Portuguese. The Yorktown's boat proceeded on board and finding no papers she of course became a lawful prize. Part of her crew was taken on board of the Yorktown; the Captain and few of the hands were left on board of her and she was sent up here to deliver the slaves up to the U. S. Agent. Only 14 days elapsed from the time of her capture until she reached this place, and in that time so closely was the hold packed one hundred and fifty died. Humanity shudders at the idea of 500 more being packed in the same space.

They were landed on Tuesday, when nearly the whole population collected on the beach to witness the sight. The colonists with the exception of a very few had never witnessed such a spectacle before. The slaves were much emaciated, and so debilitated that many of them found difficulty in getting out of the boats. Such a spectacle of misery and wretchedness inflicted by a lawless and ferocious cupidity so excited our people that it became unsafe for the Captain of the slaver (who had came to look on) to remain at the beach. Eight slaves died in harbour the day before they were landed and the bodies were thrown overboard. The prize master says as soon as a slave became helpless through debility or sickness those nearest would throttle him in order that his body removed they would have more room. They were all, men and women with the exception of two or three called headmen, landed in a state of perfect nudity!!

Doctor Lugenbell the U. S. Agent has put them all out with different persons who have taken them as apprentices. Those under age will be appreniced under the apprintice act of the colony, and adults will be bound for seven years. The Methodist Mission has 80 boys 20 girls which with the mission has been long a desideratum.

The Pons belongs to Philadelphia. She was sold by her captain at the Cape Verd Island conditioned to be delivered on the coast. The mate and her American crew took her to Cabenda and remained on board until she was ready to take in her slaves when they went as shore with her papers.

H. B. M. Ship Penelope lately, captured a steam ship fitted up for the slave trade. She was sent to St. Helena and condemned. There were 4 Americans on board which the Commodore brought with him and sent them down here in the Lily, Captain Newton to be delivered up to an American man of war. There being none here he took them back and they will remain on board of the vessel of the commanding officer on this station until some U. S. Vessel arrives.

H. B. M. Brig Lilly Captain Newton captured a barque at Cape Mount a few days ago. Her slaves were all ready and would have been shipped from Cape Mount in a few days if she had not been taken.

The difference between the date on the head of the paper, & that on the editorial head, requires explanation. Owing to severe domestic calamity we have not been able to give any attention to the paper for 8 or 9 weeks and consequently it has not been published regularly. In order to fetch it up we had concluded to date this paper for the last friday in December and by close attention to make up the lost numbers by additional issues, but the first side was struck off before we were called on for editorial. We however pledge ourself for back numbers.

H. T.

The Flag Ship of the African Squadron bearing the broad pennant of Commodore Skinner arrived on the 17th inst.——days from Port Prayo. Officers and crew all well. A, W. A.

MARINE LIST.

FORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Nov. 18. U. S. Ship Jamestown, Cunningham commanding from the windward.
" 21 Am. ship Madonna, Lawlin master, from Cape Mount: passengers, Mrs. M. E. McGill, Mrs. C. C. Jones, and Mrs. R. Canot.
" 23. French barque Amelia, Knudler master from the windward.
" " Dutch brig Mercur,——master, from the windward.
" 28. Col. sloop Nathan Bangs, Ammons mater from the leeward.

DEPARTURES.

Nov. 14 American ship Madonna, Lawlin master, for Cape Mount: passengers, Rev. F Burns and son, Mr. Urias McGill and Mrs M E McGill.
" " Am brig Robert, Brown master, for Sierra Leone.
" 22 U. S. Ship Jamestown, Cunningham commanding for the windward.
" " Dutch brig ——master, for the windward.
" 27 Am. ship Madonna, Lawlin master, for the leeward: passengers, Rev. Mr. Bushell and lady an Mrs. R. Moore.

POETRY

CATCH THE PROUD SPIRIT.

Bound like bright fetters of the pole
An abject slave to man's control?
No, give me Liberty! Natur's boon,
To raise the soul and cheer the gloom.

Tell not of brilliant halls of state,
In Columbo's boasted land of great,
With columns lofty on freedom based,
Luxuries sweet and luscious taste.

Of skies serene as "classic Italy's" pride,
Whom men beneath it soon can rise——
Posterity's boast,—unsullied names,
Stimulating sons with brightest flames.

"Catch the proud spirit" and depart,
Leave the shores of Flummery Art,
All, the friends may wail and others rail,
Bend thy canvass to the pleasing gale.

For prejudice unruled is law,
In man? kept to hew and draw,
Luxuries such, have no sweet taste,
For one who will not manhood waste.

No, Afric's coast is here my home,
And in freeman now can roam,
Beneath a sky whose solar rays,
Speaks better things in after days,

Monrovia, }
Nov. 21, 1845. }

MISCELLANEOUS

POLITICAL ECONOMY.

1. "But why should not each man make what he wants for himself, without going to his neighbor's to buy it?

Go into the shoemaker's shop, and ask him why he does not make tables and chairs for himself, and hats, and coats, and every thing he wants. He will tell you that he must have a compiete set of joiner's tools to make one chair properly; the same tools as would serve to make hundreds of chairs. And if he were also to make the tools himself, and the nails, he would want a smith's forge, and anvil and hammer.

2. And after all, it would cost him great labor to make very clumsy tools and chairs, because he has not been used to that kind of work. It would be less trouble to him to make shoes that would sell for as much as would buy a dozen chairs, than to make one chair himself.

3. To the joiner again, it would be as great a loss to attempt making shoes for himself. And so it is with the tailor, the hatter, and all other trades. It is best for all, that each should work in his own way, and supply his neighbors, while they supply him.

4. But there are rude nations who have very little of this kind of exchange. Each man among them builds himself a cabin, and makes clothes for himself, and a canoe to go a-fishing, fishing-rod and hooks, and lines, and also darts and bows and arrows for hunting, besides tilling a little bit of land. Such people are all of them much worse off than the poor among us.

5. Their clothing is nothing but coarse mats or raw hides; their cabins are no better than pigsties; their canoes are only hollow trees or baskets made of bark; and all their tools are clumsy. Where every thing for himself, every thing is badly done; and a few hundreds of these savages will be half-starved in a country that would maintain as many thousands of us in much greater comfort."— Whately.

6. The reason is that with us one man works principally at one thing, and thus becomes skilful, so that he can do more in the same time. If the shoemaker was to work half his time as a hatter, and the hatter as a shoemaker, there would be fewer hats and fewer shoes made then before, and besides that, not so good.

7. In changing from one work to the other they would lose time in looking for their tools, and getting things into order; and after they began to work, some more time would be lost before they could "get their hands in," as it is termed, so as to work to advantage.

8. Now, what is true of the shoemaker and the hatter, is equally true of all other trades. If their employments were mixed up, less would be made of every article; and thus every one would necessarily be poorer, because there would be less to be divided among them.

9. There is another reason. People would be less industrious: they would not only work to less advantage, but they would work less steadily. This may be easily seen by comparing a country blacksmith, for instance, who has a great many different things to attend to, with one in the city, who works only at one.

10. In proportion as men confine their attention to one operation, they become more industrious, that is, they work more steadily; and more skilful, so that they do more in the same time; and lastly, more ingenerious in finding out inventions to save time and trouble.

11. As an instance of this I would mention that it was a little boy who many years ago made one of the greatest improvements in the steam engine; for having nothing to do but to open and shut a valve at a particular motion of the engine, he observed that by tieing two strings to particular parts of the machine, it would open and shut itself; he did so, and thus all further trouble was saved.

12. In our back country it is necessary for a settler to turn his hand to a great many things; but in the cities and older parts of our country it is more profitable for a workman to keep at one employment, and get what he wants from others by giving what he makes better than they can, in exchange for what they make better than he.

SOCIAL MORALS.—No. 1.

1. We sometimes see neighbors trying to make each other unhappy, by inquiring into what is not their business, by telling you have stories about each other, and by enlarging and spreading about every fault they can find in gossiping from house to house. One tale-bearer can make a world of misery in any neighborhood.

2. Now, it is our duty to tell the truth and keep peace with all men We should study to prevent neighborhood scandal as much as possible, instead of being willing and ready to tell it again to the first person we meet with. Let us always do what is right, and whem others do what is wrong, do not be ready to trumpet it about for our own amusement, or another's injury.

3. If a man is unhappy from sickness, or age, or poverty, it is our duty to relieve him. But a wicked man is unhappy in the worst sense; for there is no misery so great as wrong doing. And still more, he is always the cause of wickedness in others. He is like a man sick with some infectious disease, which he is in danger of communicating to all that are around him. And still more, the pains of this life terminate at death, but the pains of wrong doing, at death, are infinitely increased.

4. Now, all these considerations teach us, that a wicked man, is, above all others, an object of pity. And hence, it is our special duty, to try to benefit him, by rendering him virtuous.

5. Many people say that if a man be wicked, we should shun him and let him alone. This is true, in one sense. We should not make him our companion, we should not put ourselves in danger of learning his wicked habits. If a man is a drunkard, we should not go and drink with him; if a man is profane, we should not associate with him.

9. All this is so, but this is no reason why we should not try to reclaim the drunkard, and teach the profane to fear an oath. It is one thing, to adopt men as our friends and associates, and an other thing to try to do them good.

The duties which we owe to men who are wicked, are the following.

7. I. We sould consider them, whem in affliction or distress, to be as truly objects of our pity as other men. That we should feel as much pleasure in relieving them, as in relieving the virtuous, is perhaps impossible. But this does not show, that it is not as much our duty to do so.

11. We should by all means in our power, labor to reclaim them from vice.

This may be done:

8. 1. By example. By acting virtuously ourselves, we administer the kindest, and frequently the most effectual reproof to the vicious. If we are in their company, therefore, we should always resolutely show, that we are on the side of virtue, and have no sympathy with vice. Though they may ridicule us, and dislike us, yet love to them, should teach us to bear this patiently, for their good.

9. 11. By precept. We should, by suitable conversation, endeavor to convince men of the evil of their course, and urge and encourage them to return to virtue. Advice of this sort, is generally, vastly more effective, if gvien in private.

10. 111. As the truths of morality are, by far the most efficient agents in restoring men to virtue, we should use all proper means to circulate them among men, not only by conversation, but also by the distribution of excellent books.

11. 1V. As all men are our brethren, and all men need moral assistance, it is, manifestly, our imperative duty to reclaim the wicked, as widely as possible. As, by far the greater part of men, are utterly ignorant of the way of reform, hence, it is our important duty, to send the truth every where, to the destitute.

12. V. Such is the darkness of the mind of man, and they are so obstinately bent on doing wrong, that we can hope for little success in this mode of benevolence, without the assistance of a higher power. God has promised to grant this assistance, in answer to effort.

Curious account of the first Appearance and progress of Water spouts.

"WHILE we were making remarks upon them, and comparing their different appearances, our attention was suddenly called by a loud hissing noise; and, turning about, we observed the sea on our larboard bow in a strange commotion, bubbling and rising up in hundreds of little sharp pyramidical forms, to various heights, alternately falling and rising within an apparent circle, whose diameter might be about sixty feet.

"It was soon evident that another water-spout was beginning to form in a critical situation for us not being half the ship's length off. All was alarm and comfusion. Captain P——was soon upon deck, but neither he nor any other on board knew from experience what was best to be done. It was nearly impossible to withdraw the eye from this object: the sea, within the circle of its influence, boiled up with increasing rage and height whirling round with great velocity and indescribable hissing kind of noise. At times, the water was thus raised nearly as high as the fore-yard: then sinking, as from some impediment or obstruction, and again commencing as before.

"We had all heard of firing guns at water-spouts and directions were given accordingly; yet, though we had several loaded, not one was found in condition, they only burned priming. Orders were then given to load a fresh gun; but excepting the mate, it was difficult to get any one to move, so riveted and fixed with gaping astonishoment were all the Lascars and people on board. While the mate was busy after the carriage guns, Captain P——and I concluded it would be right to try the effect of making a slight concussion in the air, by getting all the people to exert their lungs by loud cheers God only knows whether this did really produce any good effect, but we fancied so. I had a lighted match in readiness; and, when the mate had loaded and primed the gun, I fired it, and two or three salutes caused the whole to subside. The ship was not the least affected the whole time, except by the undulating swell when the water fell down again; yet, from the whirlwind kind of hissing, we were in moment ary expectation of seeing the yards and masts torn to atoms, and whirled into the air; and doubtful whether the whole of the ship might not soon be engulphed in the vortex."

WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

The "carnival week"—Confirmation of Mr. Bancroft and other appointments—Office seekers—Gen Almonte, the Mexican Minister—Reinstatement of Capt. Newton—Testimony in favor of Missions—Trial of Mc Currey, &c, &c.

WASHINGTON, D. C, March 15, 1845.

The carnival week—the week of pomp and pageantry outside, and inside of splicing bedsteads with chairs and bureaus and tables, and meting our sparing dinners for large fees, a mess of pottage for a birth-right—the week of show for the curious and gain for the avaricious, has past. The lovers of pleasure have sought other scenes, and the lovers of money have been feasting all the week on the broken meat and bread, the leavings of the last week. And so I forewarn your readers, if they seek for novelty and dainties they must just stop short with the paragraph of the letter of your Washington correspondent; for he has nothing to offer but a chapter of scraps and fragments. The Senate have been in session during the week, engaged chiefly in confirming executive appointments and entirely in executive business.

On Monday the nomination of the Hon. George Bancroft, Massachusetts, as Secretary of the Navy, was confirmed. It is understood that the action on his nomination was delered last week on account of the wish of some member of the Senate to examine Mr Bancroft's published letter in reference to the imprisonment of Dorr. That member on Monday withdrew his objection and the senate were unanimous in confirming the appointment of Bancroft. Among others I have noticed the following appointments. Hon. Alexander H. Everett of Massachusetts, is appointed Commissioner to China. Mr. E. has long been marked out by public opinion here as the man for that post. His experience as a diplomatist and his eminence as a man of letters give assurance that he will follow successfully in the steps of Mr. Cushing, both as negotiator and as a literary gleaner. The enviable post of Consul at Liverpool has fallen to the lot of Col. Armstrong of Tenessee. The Senate besides acting on executive nominations chose on Monday their Standing Committies. The list plainly shows that the balance has turned; and that there is in the new Senate a Democratic instead of, as before, a Whig majority. Yesterday also a treaty, understood to be the Zoll Verein or Trades Union, was under discussion in the Senate Chamber.

Thus far the executive changes in subordinate officers have not been numerous. It is supposed however that the entire change in the Cabinet—the Heads of Department—is ominous of future extensive changes among their subordinate officers. The press of office seekers, although sufficiently great, is said not to match the clamorous and unappeasable throng that worried poor Gen. Harrison to death. I have beed told that sometimes his porter had actually to force a passage for him, as he went out and in at the Presidential mansion through the vociferous and wrangling crowd that pressed upon him to fill his arms full of their letters of recommendation.

The last published chapter in the history of Texas annexation is the announcement of the last week, that Gen. Almonte, the Mexican minister to this government, has declared the termination of his mission, on account of the passage of the act for the annexation of the province of Texas. Gen. Almonte it will be remembered retired from Washington to New York last spring, while Mr. Tyler's treaty was in progress. He has remained there until a few weeks since he returned, to signify officially, that Mexico had regarded the passage of an act for the annexation of Texas as a declaration of war. Since the passage of the act in the Senate he has given to the Executive the notice above alluded to, and has addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, entering a solemn protest in the name of his government against the late act of our national legislature, declaring it to be an act of aggression the most unjust in modern history, the spoliation of a friendly nation of a considerable part of her territory. Gen. A. has demanded his pasports; and either has, or will soon repair to New York and embark for Mexico. The query has been started whether the next Congress, which will have to act upon the question of reception next winter, when Texas must, (if she chooses annexion) present her Constitution for approval by this government—the query is started whether the new Congress may not after a year or more of reflection, withdraw from the hesitating step taken by the last Congress. It is a question for those more conversant than your correspondent with the ever changing ebb and flow of the tide of popular and political feeling.

All agree in approving one of the last acts of the late President—his remission of the remaining term of the suspension of Capt. Newton, commander of the late ill-fated steamer Missouri which was burned at Gibraltar on her passage out conveying Mr. Cushing on his way to China. Every one sympathized with Capt. N. during the long and tedious sitting of the Court Martial before which he was tried some months ago; and the Court who suspended him did it reluctantly and from regard to future prevention of like disasters. The President mentions as his grounds for remitting the sentence of the Court, that the important, principle had been settled, and the punishment was a secondary consideration, and that nothing implicating the moral character of Capt. N. had been charged against him.—Christian Watchman.

THE GOLDEN PIPPIN.

There is a tree called Manchincel, which grows in the West Indies; its appearance is very attractive, and the wood of it peculiarly beautiful; it bears a kind of apple resembling a golden pippin. This fruit looks very tempting, and smells very fragrant, but to eat of it is instant death; and its sap or juice is so poisonous, that if a few drops of it fall on the skin, it raises blisters, and occasions, great pain. This tree and the fruit it bears, afford a striking emblem of the deceitfulness of sin. The appeals of sinful pleasures attract the eye, and dazzle the imagination. Their appearance beguiles the touch, and lures the taste. Sin blisters and pains the conscience, and kills the soul. Thus it is that multitudes are deceived by sin in a thousand forms, and led away into the paths of destruction

Sin deceives, misleads, and imposes falsehoods on men It deludes, beguiles, and cheats men out of heaven. It cuts off their expectation of pardon. Sin does all this. It inclines us to believe that some future opportunity will be more favorable to break away from its power. That though we continue its practice for the present, we shall gain strength to resist it in future. Men suppose they are very willing to abandon sin, to repent of it, but cannot, and must therefore wait a season till God is willing. How deluded?

Sin deceives men in respect to the comparative benefits of the Christian,s and a sinner,s course of life. It represents the Christian,s life as one of forced servitude and gloomliness, while the sinner's is one of liberty and great pleasure.

Sin deceives by its promises. The objects which it promises are not always obtained. It promises what it can never give. And when the poor objects promised are obtained, they never yeild the anticipated joy. In the end they always "bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder."

Sin often repeats its dictates. Though men have been deceived by it in thousands of instances, they still pursue the same downward course. How dangerous the condition of those who are under its influence? How anxious should every one be lest he be deceived, decoyed, and dashed upon some rock or quicksand, and ruin his soul forever!

"Sin has a thousand treacherous arts
To practice on the mind;
With flattering looks she tempts our hearts,
But leaves a sting behind."

"Let him, therefore, that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

BROOM HANDLES—Twenty-three boxes, containing some two thousand broom-handles, were shipped a few days since for London. We understand that some persons are raisng the brush in Ohio, and have obtained the handles from this valley, shipping the raw materials to England, and there manufacture the brooms—Northampton Courier.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, AND A. W. ANDERSON, ASSISTANT EDITORS.

VOL. XIV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) JULY 3 1846. NO. 18

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr. R. MURRAY,
Cape Palmas,	Dr. S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia,	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. De LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. T. TRACEY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

MILTON'S BLINDNESS.

We do not think that any but a blind man could have written the Paradise Lost. We mean a blind man who had once enjoyed sight. Let us try to substantiate this remark, and to show what influence Milton's blindness exerted over his poetry. That it must have exerted some influence—that Milton's poetry must in some respect be different from what it would have been had he not been blind—cannot be doubted. The slightest peculiarity about an author tinges his writings; and it is only because it rarely happens that the entire character of a person's writings is decided by any one peculiarity, that we are not more accustomed to regard this influence. But blindness is no ordinary peculiarity. Even if any person who has been in the habit of writing goes to Arabia, and comes back again, all that he writes afterwards will, to a certainty, be affected by that visit to Arabia. How much more will not a change come over the spirit of a man's writings who, after walking for forty-seven years in the light and blaze of day, passes at once and forever into an atmosphere of darkness! That Milton's blindness should not have affected his poetry, that there should not be a marked difference between the poems he wrote before he became blind and those he wrote after, is impossible. The only question is, whether this effect, this difference, can be ascertained. We think it can. It is no mere illusive, impalpable peculiarity, of which we are sensible, without possessing the power to lay hold of or describe it; it is easily detected. Nay, we are inclined to put the case so strongly, as to say that Milton's blindness was a requisite to his writing Paradise Lost.

When we affirm that Milton's blindness exerted an influence over his poetry, we do not mean merely that it enable him to withdraw his mind from external objects, and left him at liberty to pursue his daring theme. That was a decided influence, no doubt, but it is not the one on which we lay stress. Neither do we refer to the well-known passages in which Milton deplores his loss of sight. The insertion of a few such passages, if that were all, would not amount to much. Nor, lastly, do we refer to the influence which Milton's blindness must have exerted over his verse, in respect of its having obliged him to compose at length mentally, and then dictate, although this is by no means an insignificant consideration. We propose to show that Milton's blindness affected his poetry in a way more specific and remarkable than any of these that Milton's whole manner of conceiving, and describing external objects is that of a blind man; and that this manner of conceiving and describing things was so peculiarly suitable for his great poem, that it might be made a question whether Milton's blindness did not actuate his choice of a subject.

The conception which will be most familiar to a blind man, will be that of infinitely extended blackness. The world outside will be to him like what it would be to a man with the use of his eyes standing alone on a mountain-top in a very dark night, and looking upward. Now, a blind man who has once enjoyed sight will carry with him into his own black atmosphere a memory full of images of what he has seen; and when he tries to describe things by their appearance, it will be by an effort of recollection. He will amuse himself by painting, on the dark canvass stretched before him, those objects which he has most pleasure in recollecting—the white gable of his own cottage, the faces of his wife and children. The power of love will keep the recollection of such objects as these bright and vivid, while all other images are growing dimmer and dimmer. But there is a certain class of images, the recollection of which in a state of blindness would always continue to be easy and pleasurable. It would be difficult for a person who had been blind for some time to recall the appearance of such a flower as the violet; whereas he would retain to the last a remarkably vivid conception of white or luminous objects—a lamp, the mouth of a furnace, a streak of light, the sun, the moon, a ball of glowing iron, the ground covered with snow, the winter sky studded with stars. In fact, a man who had grown blind would excel a person still retaining the use of sight in all that kind of description which consists in the contrast of white and black, of light and darkness. Now, this power of dealing with light and darkness, as it were in masses, is exactly that which would be a qualification for writing such a poem as the Paradise Lost. Three fourths of the description in that poem are precisely of the kind in which a blind man would be preeminently apt and powerful. The beings whose actions form the subject of the poem are angels, described as moving to and fro in the universe, surveying creation from some remote point beyond its limits, or descrying a silver star in the distance far away, and winging their flight towards it. This sort of description must be easier to a man to whom space and blackness are the same thing, than it could possibly be to a man to whom space is colorless, or, at the most, a sort of faint blue transparency. The most important descriptions in the Paradise Lost consist, at bottom, of contrasts of blackness with light, light in the form of masses, or particles, or streaks, or discs.

To proceed to instances. It would be quite possible to prefix to the Paradise Lost a plate or diagram of the universe as Milton conceived it mapped out. At first, according to the poet, the whole infinity of space was divided into two huge regions or hemispheres, an upper and a lower, the one all light, the other all darkness. The upper or illuminated half was heaven, the abode of the angels, then the only creatures existing. The under half was chaos or night, a thick, black, turbulent element, as of universes in a state of pulp. No beings resided in it. But after the fall of the angels, space was laid out anew, and instead of only two regions, there came to be four. The bottom of chaos was converted into hell; and at the top, where chaos pressed against heaven, a huge cavity was scooped out of the blackness, into which the light rushed down. This cavity was man's universe. The principles of gravitation being imparted to it, all the matter within the swoop of this right-royal principle left the pulpy form in which it had hitherto existed, and congulated into balls or planets. Then the Divine impulse came, and the balls spun round each other, the planets round their suns, and the moons round their planets So that, bounded above by heaven, and beneath by the chaos out of which it had been cut, there existed now a new azure universe powdered with stars and streaked with galaxies. It was destined to be the residence of a new race of creatures. Hell the residence of the fallen portion of the old race, was separated from it by chaos.

This is the fundamental conception of the Paradise Lost. The infinity of space thus divided, first into two, and afterwards into four regions, is the scene in which the action of the poem is laid. Now, such a gigantic conception could not have occured to any except a blind man; or if it had occured to any one else, he could not have sustained it consistently throughout the poem. But how consistently has Milton sustained it! Thus, when he describes the rout of the rebel angels driven before the Messiah's thunder, the crystal wall of heaven

"Rolled inward, and a spacious gap disclosed.
Into the wasteful deep; the monstrous sight
Struck them with terror backward; but far worse
Urged them behind, headlong themselves they threw
Down from the verge of heaven; eternal wrath
Burnt after them to the bottomless pit."

It was Milton's blindness that gave him this grand figure. Reading the passage, one sees chaos, as it were, an infinite mass of solid blackness, and the descent of the angels through it like a red hissing fiery funnel. So in many other passages; that, for instance, describing the creation of man's universe; or the following one, describing Satan's glance into chaos, when, standing at the mouth of hell, he prepares to launch into it in quest of the new universe—

"Before their eyes in sudden view appear
The secrets of the hoary deep, a dark
Illimitable ocean, without bound,
Without dimension, where length, breath and height,
And time, and place, are lost, where endless night
And chaos, ancestors of nature, hold
Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise
Of endless wars, and by confusion stand."

If this passage had not the tone of a narrative, it might pass for a Lamentation on Blindness. Making his way through chaos, Satan at last emerges into the light of the new universe. Directing his flight first to the sun—

"There lands the fiend; a spot like which perhaps,
Astronomer in the sun's lucent orb,
Through his glazed optic tube yet never saw."

This splendid image of Satan alighting on the sun being like a spot dimming its disc, we can hardly conceive presenting itself to the mind of any but a blind man; but how readily to his!

The following is the poet's description of the creation of light—

"'Let there be light,' God said; and forthwith light
Ethereal, first of things, quintessence pure
Sprung from the deep; and from her native east.
To journey through the aery gloom began,
Sphered in a radiant cloud."

In this passage the influence of the poet's blindness appears in two ways. In the first place, as in the former passages, the conception is that of a blind man. All at first is profound darkness, a black atmosphere; but forthwith there arises a vapor-like something in the east, which slowly creeps westward through the gloom, like a mist from the sea. This is light. In the second place, there is a sort of sentimental lingering in the description, unlike what would be natural in the case of a poet not afflicted with that calamity, which made light so dear to Milton, and all the circumstances of its appearance so delightful to his memory.

Besides the passages we have selected, fifty or sixty others might be given. The only sort or description which five sixths of the poem required, or would tolerate, is precisely that in which the power Milton's blindness gave him of contrasting light and darkness on the great scale, and of conceiving luminous objects, enabled him to excel. No, doubt, if a man having the use of his eyesight had dared to attemp the subject of the Paradise Lost, he would, as a matter of necessity, have been obliged to deal with blackness and fire, chaoses and galaxies, just as Milton has done. No doubt also there are poets, not blind, whose imagination is at home in the vast and gigantic, who figure to themselves the earth as a brown little ball wheeling through space, and whistling as it wheels. Thus Shakspeare speaks of "striking flat the thick rotundity o' the world." Still, none except a blind man could have been so consistent throughout in that sort of description as Milton. But not only does he, more than any other poet, contrast fire and blackness on the great scale; he employs the same contrast as a means of representing what it would never have occured to any but a blind man to represent in that way. Thus, when Satan, seized in Paradise by Ithuriel and Zephon, is brought before Gabriel and his band of angels, he dares them to battle—

"While thus he spake, th' angelic squadron bright
Turned fiery red, sharpened in mooned horns
Their phalanx, and began to hem him round."

Who but a blind man could have fancied the appearance of the band of angels hemming Satan in like that of a crescent moon? But luminousness with Milton served as a means of describing everything. Satan, starting up when touched by Ithuriel's spear, as he was sitting in the shape of a toad at Eve's ear, is compared to the explosion of a powder magazine. Brilliancy is Milton's synonyme for beauty. The eyes of the serpent are glowing carbuncles, his neck is verdant burnished gold. The locks of the unfallen angels are inwreathed with beams of light; and their golden harps hang by their sides glittering like quivers.

But deduct those five sixths of the Paradise Lost in which the descriptions are all grand and gigantic—of spirits warring in heaven, toiling through chaos, or winging from star to star—their remains still one sixth of the poem in which, leaving the reagions of space, the poet condescends on our dear particular planet, and outpours his imagination in rich and luscious descriptions of earth's own scenes and landscapes, the fragrant woods, the blooming gardens, the daisied banks, and green overarching bowers of Eden's Paradise. How are these passages of rich vegetable description to be accounted for? Suns and moons and chaoses were easy: but whence got he the trees, and shrubs, and flowers?—that blind old man!

If we examine Milton's earlier poems—those which he wrote before he became blind—we shall find their characteristic to be luscious and flowery description. In this respect we know no one so like him as the poet Keats. Take, for instance, the following exquisite passage from Lycidas—

"Return, Sicilian muse,
And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
Their bells and flowerets of a thousand hues.
Ye valleys low, where the mild whispers use.
Of shades and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,

On whose fresh lap the swart star sparely looks—
Throw hither all your quaint enamelled eyes,
That on the green turf suck the honeyed showers,
And purple all the ground with vernal flowers;
Bring the rath primrose, that forsaken dies,
The tuted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,
The white pink, and the pansy freaked with jet,
The glowing violet,
The musk rose, and the well-attired woodbine,
With cowslips wan, that hang the pensive head,
And every flower that sad embroidery wears;
Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffodillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureat hearse where Lycid lies."

There is not a passage like this in all the Paradise Lost. If the poet, after being blind for some time, had attempted to rival it, he could accomplished the feat only by the help of a book on botany. Here is the passage describing Eve's nuptial bower in Paradise, and we may be sure that on this occasion Milton would lavish his richest beauties—

The roof
Of thickest covert was, inwoven shade,
Laurel and myrtle, and what higher grew
Of firm and fragrant leaf; on either side,
Acanthus, and each odorous bushy shrub
Fenced up the verdant wall: each beauteous flower,
Iris all hues, roses, and jessamine,
Reared high their flourished heads between and wrought
Mosaic; under foot the violet,
Crocus, and hyacinth, with rich inlay,
Broidered the ground, more colored than with stone
Of costliest emblem."

Beautiful still; brave recollections of his old loves, the flowers. But, alas, alas! the recollections are growing fainter and fewer in the mind of the blind old man. Yet as the images of his youth are growing dimmer and dimmer, he is fast nearing that life where he shall renew them all again, and where, amid the spheres of which he sung, and thrilling to a higher music than that which his soul loved so dearly on earth, his eyes shall no more shut out the light nor the colors of the little flowers.

Milton's earlier poems, we have said, remind us of Keats. No poet is so "lush" in description, to use his own word, as poor Keats. He knew the secret of the flowers, as if he had been the very bee that buzzed among them, and sipped their sweets. Now, had Keats suddenly grown blind, would he ever have forgotten the flowers, and would not his fine soul, then pent up and unwindowed, have employed itself building castles of sunbeams in the darkness within?

Anastic Printing.

Speaking of this new wonder, Chambers' Journal says:—in contemplating the effect of these astonishing inventions, it is impossible to foresee their results upon the ordinary transactions of life. If any deed, negotiable security, or other legal instrument, can be so imitated that the writer of, and subscriber to it, cannot distinguish his own handwriting from that which is forged, new legislative enactments must be made, and new modes of representing money, and securing property by documentory record, must be resorted to. A paper currency and copyhold securities will be utterly useless, because they will no longer fulfil the objects for which they, and instruments of a like nature are employed. Again, the law of copyright as respects literary property will have to be thoroughly revised. Let us, for an instant, view the case in reference to "The Times" newspaper. Suppose an early copy of that powerful journal to be some morning procured, and anastatyped in a quarter of an hour. The pirated pages may be subjected to printing machinery, and worked off at the rate of 4000 copies in each succeeding hour, and sold to the public, to the ruinous injury of the proprietors. The government newspaper stamp would be no protection, for of course that could be imitated as unerringly as the rest. This too, is an extreme case against the imitators; for a newspaper would have to be done in a great hurry. Books, maps, prints, and music, could be pirated wholesale, and at leisure.

Let us not be understood to apply any of these remarks to the inventors, as presuming for an instant, or by the remotest hint or inference, that they would be guilty of unworthy conduct. We merely state what is, we fear, inevitable when their inventions become public property, which, according to our information, from their extreme simplicity, is likely very soon to be the case.

The new process produces all the effects of stereotyping, with the advantage of taking the duplicate from a printed impression, instead of from the metal types themselves. So far, however, as we can ascertain, one disadvantage attaches to the new process, which is, that in working off impressions from the zinc plates, a kind of press must be used different from that employed for types—one partaking somewhat of the nature of a lithographic press. Till, therefore, the inventors proceed with their improvements so far as to cause the acid to corrode the interstices of the latter sufficiently deep into the plate, as to make them stand relief of equal height with types, we do not anticipate that, as a substitute for stereotyping, it will be so extensively used as they anticipate. It may also be remarked that the economy of this invention will chiefly be seen in works of limited sale. In such as the present, the typographical arrangements sink into bagatelle beside the enormous outlay for paper, an abolition of the duty on which would be of more use to such works than an invention doing away with every other expense whatsoever.

In another department of relief printing, there is no question that the anastatic process will cause a complete revolution, and that very speedily; namely, in illustrative and ornamental printing. Wood-engraving will be entirely superseded, for no intermediate process will now be necessary between the draught-man and the printing of his design. It is generally known that at present the artist draws in pencil his designs on the box-wood, and that the engraver, with sharp instruments, cuts away all the white parts or interstices, so as to cause the objects previously figured to stand in relief, that they only may receive the ink passed over them in printing. Unfortunately, many wood-engravers, from want of skill in drawing, do not render the intentions of the designer with fidelity. Now, however, all the draughtsman will have to do will be to make his drawing on paper, and that, line for line, will be transferred to the zinc, and produce, when printed, exactly the same effect as his original draught. A pen is recommended for this purpose, which may be used "on any paper free from hairs or filaments, and well sized. The requisite ink is a preparation made for the purpose, and may be mixed to any degree of thickness in pure distilled water, and should be used fresh and slightly warm when fine effect is to be given. In making or copying a design, pencil may be used, but the marks must be left on the paper, and by no means rubbed with India-rubber or bread. The paper should be kept quite clean, and free from rubbing, and should not be touched by the fingers, inasmuch as it will retain marks of very slight touches." A drawing thus produces can be readily transferred to the zinc in the manner above described for typography.

Two pages of the Art-Union are printed upon the new plan. Besides the letterpress, from which we derive our present information, are five printed drawings and an illuminated letter.

"The letterpress," says the editor, "was first set in type by the ordinary printer of the Art-Union, leaving spaces for the drawn or engraved illustrations, which having been set into their respective places on a proof of the letterpress, the whole was cast on to a zinc plate, and so printed off." Neither is it to printing of recent date only that the invention is applicable; transfers from books a century old have already been made. "Rare editions" and "Unique copies" will in a few years vanish from the counter of the book-sale and the shelves of the bibliomaniac. Now it is ascertained how exactly they may be counterfeited, not even Doctor Dibdin himself will be able to venture to pronounce upon a "genuine black-letter."

A little Lunch

Street Thoughts by a Surgeon.—In perambulating Oxford-street or Holborn, what a number of little ragamuffins I observe trundling their hoops! With what interest I contemplate their youthful sport; particularly when I regard its probable consequences! A hoop runs between a gentleman's legs. He falls. When I reflect on the wonderful construction of the skeleton, and consider how many fractures and dislocations it is liable in such a case, my bosom expands with gratitude to a considerate police, to whose non-intervention we are indebted for such chances of practice!

The numerous bits of orange peel which diversify the pavement oft attract my attention. Never do I kick one of them out of the way. The blessings of a whole profession on the hands that scatter them! Each bit may supply a new and instructive page to the Chapter of Accidents.

Considering the damp, muddy, state of the streets at this time of the year, I am equally amazed and delighted to see the ladies, almost universally, going about in thin shoes. This elegant fashion beautifully displays the conformation of the ankle-joint; but to the surgeon it has another recommendation. I behold the delicate foot, separated scarcely by the thickness of thin paper from the mire. I see the exquisite instep, unsheltered but by a mere web. I meditate on the influence of cold and wet upon the frame; I think of the catarrhs, coughs, pleurisies, pneumonies, consumptions, and other interesting affections, that necessarily must result from their application to the feet; and then I reckon up the number of pills, boluses, powders, draughts, mixtures, leeches, and blisters, which will consequently be sent in to the fair sufferers, calculate what they must come to, and wish I had the amount in my pocket.

VISITING SOCIETY FOR THE RICH.

Original Subscription, ... £21,000
In hand (and likely to remain) . . . 14,000

Benevolent persons, in this instance more ready to mind other people's business than their own, have founded a Visiting Society for the Rich. It employs upwards of a thousand visitors, who force themselves into the houses of the wealthy, inquire into their circumstances, give them advice whether they want it or not, and distribute tracts among them. The Bishop of London being otherwise engaged, Mr. Punch has been made president of this society. The nature of its operations will appear from the annexed report of one of Punch's lay readers, whose sphere of usefulness is St. George's, Hanover-square:—

"The results of your missionary's labors are, he regrets to say, very painful. A distressing amount of destitution, moral and intellectual, exists in the district under his inspection. Of a hundred persons interrogated by your missionary respecting their duties towards society, ninety-nine replied that they consisted in maintaining an appearance in it. Many when asked where they expected to go to, said they really did not know; others had not quite made up their minds; some answered to Cheltenham or Baden-Baden, and several named a concert or a soiree. A baronet, with ten thousand a-year, understood by charity, the obligation of paying the poor's rates; and his lady, the necessity of patronizing fancy fairs. A fashionable preacher, residing not ten yards from a court whose inhabitants were starving, had no idea who lived in it. Of fifty individuals who attended a place of worship, forty-eight admitted that they went there in their carriages. Nineteen out of twenty infants have been abandoned to nurses.

"Much physical distress exists among the rich population. Languor, low spirits, fainting, and headach, are almost universally in boudoirs and drawing-rooms. Their cause may be traced to ill-ventilated salons, overwork, and excitement in dancing polkas and waltzes, and to the dire necessity of tight-lacing. Both sexes are sadly troubled with imaginary complaints, which too often render them the prey of designing physicians.

"Pecuniary embarrassment, strange as it may seem, is common among the rich. Your missionary has an idea that this may be, in some measure, connected with their large house-rents, the number of carriages and servants kept, the frequent parties given, and the expenses incurred in dresses and jewelry. He suspects that a box at the opera (a necessary of fashionable existence) may sometimes be one source of difficulty. Another, perhaps may be the number of improvident marriages almost daily solemnized at the parish church. A rash gentleman often marries a lady with three thousand a-year, who spends five; the consequence is obvious. Your missionary has visited several hundreds of first-rate houses; in some cases with an introduction, in others having introduced himself. He has walked in, unasked, to evening parties; he has intruded on families just sitting down to dinner. He has asked all sorts question, without regard to delicacy; he has given much advice, little of which has been taken; and he has distributed numerous tracts, several most have been flung in his face."

Interesting from Hayti.—The barque Hecla, Captain Hoyt, arrived on Sunday afternoon from Port au Prince, whence she sailed on the 17th ult.

The intelligence from all parts of the island is interesting and important in a Haytien point of view. The inhabitants were kept in a constant state of alarm, fearing fresh outbreaks and revolutions.

The President, Pierrot had issued a proclamation, closing with "Vive la Liberte! Vive la Republique! Vive l'Independance! Vive l'Indivisibilited' Hayti!" and declaring the ports on the Spanish part of the island in a state of blockade, and that all vessels touching at any of them would be confiscated.

In the excitement and fear of the Haytien Government, several merchants at Port au Prince, supposed to be in league with the conspirators, had been ordered to leave the island. It was reported that all the French had also received directions to retire.

Amidst the uncertainty of affairs, however, and when Pierrot little knew whether his head was safe or not, a bit of clemency crept into his big black heart; and a few lives were thus saved for a time. Ten condemned politicians had been permitted to have another trial.

The following letter from our correspondent, gives a birds-eye view of the present condition of things in this distracted island.

PORT AU PRINCE, October 17th, 1845.

Since the attempt of the Reorerists, some four weeks ago, to re-revolutionize the government, the public mind has been kept in constant agitation. Business of all descriptions, has shrunk from its ordinary progress, before the portentous aspect of the popular feeling, and almost every day brings forth some additional evidence that the fruits of discord are fast ripening for the crisis. In the long protracted and unsuccessful efforts of the Government to reconquer the eastern part of the Island, the exhausted energies of the soldiery have given place to a fearful insubordination, and many of their principal officers seem to have become quite indifferent to the further orders of the President. The people in this and the Southern Department are getting weary of a war, which, every day, gives them less and less prospects of success, and which has already involved the Government in debt far beyond its ability ever to pay. The wealthy mulattoes seem to be especially objects of vengeance within the last few days without any assigned cause, some have been banished from the Island, and others who had removed to this city from other ports in the province and established themselves in business, have been ordered, at the sacrifice of their interests, to return without delay to the places of their former residence. This kind of proscription has already been carried so far as to excite quite a general apprehension. God knows what will be the result of such senseless legislation, (for rather dictation); but the tendency seems to be towards a further division of the Government, and it will surprise a few to see, in three months from this time, as many different governments or tribes in the present Haytien dominions.

American provisions are almost the only description of merchandise that meets with any sale, and with that our market is now pretty well stocked. Coffe comes in slowly, and sells readily at 13 ct. The Hecla leaves but one American vessel in port, the brig Ida, Capt. Stetson, of Philadelphia. Harbour and city quite healthy.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, JULY 3, 1846.

A CONJURER AND CONJURATION.

A few days ago a deputation of mentally disindividuals leading a physically diseased individual besieged Governor Roberts humbly beseeching him to help them. They were all from New Georgia. The boy for that is the sex of him who was in potent, had been sick a long time "sick too much". At length disease reached a crisis and "every body been think he go die one time." His friends were in paroxysms of grief. Just then a Cong, one of Captains Bells protagees came along. Prompted by benevolence, "no cry mamom" he said "your child be witch: nose you pay me I go make da witch come up." He commenced operations and the result was an extraction from the boy's belly of a leopard's claw and a handful of strange and odious larvae. These were all carefully preserved and brought down to the Governor. He however was skeptical and endeavoured to bring them over to his belief that it was all a delusion. All argument however was lost upon them and they returned home either mortified at his stolidity or chagrined at his obstinacy in resisting the conclusive evidence of the claw and the grubs which they had presented to him.

The affair was not to stop here. Truth cannot be suppressed. It was soon ascertained that another boy was similarly affected. The "doctor" was sent for who at once declared that "witch ketch em". A fine opportunity was now presented to convince the incredulous Governor or to expose his stupidity. At once he who was witched his friend and the doctor presented themselves at government house and solicited audience. "Nother boy" "said they" be witch all same da turner one and we fetch em and the doctor for let you see him take dem ting him belly. A crowd assembles and ourself in the number. The possessed with a most woe-begone and witched aspect of countenance was planted in a sartorious posture upon the floor; directly in front of whom and almost in contact, the "doctor" planted himself in a similar posture. Assuming a look of imperturable gravity and importance he prepared to operate. First he produced from a satchel a medley of herbs and roots; part of them he placed in a shell the others he chated in his hand. This done he produced a razor. He then fixed his eyes with a stern and intense gaze on those of the boy the "doctor's" hands at the same time moving alternately in a vibratory and rotatory motion. Soon he commenced his exorcisms using some cabalistic phrases which no one understood but himself. Soon "he look da devil," and his hand now stationary pointed directly at that part of the boy's body where diabolus had taken. Although found the devil was not yet captured: a more powerful charm was necessary to dislodge him. Having scarified a small space directly over the midrif he applied his mouth thereto and exerted his utmost power of suction. Whatever or whoever else could stand this charm it was soon evident the devil could not. That the conflict between the exorcist and the devil was fierce and severe was soon announced by a quivering of his muscles and an apparent involuntary movement of his arms. Victory however decided, in favour of the "doctor" who looking around upon the spectators with an air of satisfaction and triumph held the devil firmly in more than "durance vile" between his teeth. The believers in the operation signified their satisfaction by furtive glances at the unbelievers and by half suppressed smiles; which brought strongly to our mind Gay's fable of the jugglers:—

"But, when from thence the hem he draws, Amazed spectators hum applause."

We however were not to be thus discomfitted, but determined to submit this devil to a close and searching scrutiny. For this purpose we brought his satanic majesty under the focus of a powerful microscope and found him to be no more nor less than a piece of blue cloth wrapped with the fine fibres of the palm leaf in the form and size of an ordinary larva. This which the fellow had before he commenced operations concealed either in his mouth nose or throat was coated with clotted or coagulated blood, and to the naked eye very closely resembled a grub. Nothing abashed by this exposure he renewed his manipulation in order to extract another devil, but disgusted with the mummery and vexed at our want of authority to administer to the exorcist the moral and mental sanative prescribed by Moses we left the scene.

DROWNED.

Mr. Nathaniel Harris of Edina, in attempting to cross the river from Bassa Cove to Edina was drowned by the upsetting of the canoe. The melancholy catastrophe occured on the 17th instant. We are so far from feeling surprised at such occurrences that we are astonished they are so few. We have often trembled when we have seen from four to six persons crowded into a little hog-trough of a canoe going up or coming down the river whilst the edges of the kooner are scarcely above the surface of the water. A few days ago we saw a little death-during fellow paddling with might and main in a piece of hollowed timber truncated at both ends and which at best would in dimensions have hardly sufficed for a coffin if he had found the fate which he appeared to be seeking. Many of our people manifest a recklessness and temerity in this respect truly astonishing.

A FEAT.

Not long since some half dozen of the Congoes brought here in the "Pons" while engaged in clearing away bush on a farm on Bushrod Island started an enormous snake. As if apprised of the Congo predilection for snake meat his snakeship went off at full speed for the covert of his house, but the congoes as determined to have him as he was to get away raised a deafening yell and started in chase. The snake run in the direction of the house in the vicinity of which there was a large bug-a-bug hill which had been long abandoned by its builders. The snake reached this mound and had succeeded in getting one half his length in a hole in its side when one of the congoes to whose feet hunger and hope, and desire for a delicious repast had given wings reached the place. Quick as lightning the congo seized him by the tail and a severe struggle and trial of strength ensued the snake trying with all his might to pull his person in and the congo trying with all his might to pull the snake's person out. They were pretty nearly balanced and the struggle would have lasted some time had not a cutlass been brought to the contest. The snake was despatched and when measured was found to be fourteen feet long. It was of Boa species. The mound which he attempted to enter was afterwards dug down, and it was found to contain 150 snake's eggs measuring one bushel and a half. They were without doubt the eggs of the snake which was killed. We need not say it was a high day for the congoes. It was indeed to him a feast of fat things.

Numerous petty robberies have been committed of late. The unambitious villians have contented with carrying off poultry and vegetables, with an occasional snatch at an ill-secured window curtain. If these annoyances are continued we think the town Council should look to the matter and devise a remedy against them.

We have been informed that the supplies sent out for the negroes by the "Pons" will be shortly distributed. We would suggest as the most equitable mode of distribution that reference be made to the court books where the number which each colonist took is registered.

SELECTED EXTRACT.

GUM SHOES.

A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce gives the following account of the collecting and moulding of the caoutchouc in Brazil:

After dinner we were shown over the place, and entering the neighbouring forest, were shown the caoutchouc tree. They grow, in general, to the height of forty or fifty feet without branches, then branching up fifteen feet higher. The leaf is about six inches long, thin and shaped like that of the peach tree.—The trees show their working by the number of knots, or bunches made by tapping; and a singular fact is that like a cow, when most tapped, they give most milk or sap.

As the time of operating is early day, we were obliged to content ourselves with viewing the utensils and moulds used by the shoemakers, awaiting until next morning to see the modus operandi. Accordingly before sunrise we were at hand. The blacks are at first sent through the forest armed with a quantity of soft clay and a small pickaxe. On coming to one of the trees, a portion of the soft clay is formed into a cup and stuck to the trunk.—The black then striking his pick over the cup, the sap oozes out slowly—a tree giving daily about a gill. The tapper continues in this way, tapping perhaps fifty trees, when he returns, and with a jar, passing over the same ground, empties his cups. By seven o'clock the blacks came in with their jars, ready for working.

The sap at this stage resembles milk in appearance, and somewhat in taste. It is also frequently drank in perfect safety. If left standing now, it will curdle like milk, disengaging a watery substance like whey.

Shoemakers now arrange themselves to form the gum. Seated in the shade, with a large pan of milk on one side, and on the other a brasier, a which is burned a nut peculiar to this country, emitting a dense smoke, the operator having his last, or form, held by a long stick or handle previously besmeared with soft clay, (in order to slip off the shoe when finished,) holds it over the pan and pouring on the milk until it is covered, sets the coating in the smoke, then giving it a second and third until the shoe is of the required thickness, averaging from six to twelve coats. When finished, the shoes on the form are placed in the sun the remainder of the day to dry. Next day, if required, they may be figured, being so soft that any impression will be indelibly received. The natives are very dexterous in this work. With a quill and a sharp pointed stick they will produce finely lined leaves and flowers, in incredibly short space of time. After remaining on the forms two or three days, the shoes are cut open on top, allowing the last to slip out. They are then tied together and slung on poles ready for market.

There, peddlers and Jews trade for them with the country people; and in lots of a thousand or more they are again sold to merchants, who have them stuffed with straw, and packed in boxes to export, in which state they are received in the United States. In the same manner, any shape may be manufactured. Thus toys are made over clay forms; after drying, the clay is broken and extracted; Bottles, &c., in the same way. According as the gum grows older it becomes darker in colour, and more tough. The number of caoutchouc trees in this province is countless. In some parts whole forests of them exist, and they are frequently cut down for firewood. Although this tree exists in Mexico and the East Indies, there appears to be no importation into the United States from those places. The reason I suppose must be, that they are more prolific here.

The caoutchouc tree may be worked all the year; but generally in the wet season they have rest, owing to the flooded state of the woods, and the milk being watery, requires more to manufacture the same article than in the dry season.

TEMPTATION

[By Dr Daniel Feuly]

Satan playeth always upon advantage and for the most part he veth us that way to which we incline ourselves, through the weakness of our nature: he saileth ever with the wind. Is our knowledge in matter of faith deficient? he tempts us to error. Is our conscience tender? he temp teth us to scrupulosity and to much preciseness. Hath our conscience, like the ecliptic line, some latitude? he tempteth us to declination. Are we timorous and diffrustful? he tempteth us to desperation. Are we of a flexible disposition? he tempteth us to inconstancy. Are we stiff? he labours to make obstinate heretick schismatics, or rebels of us. Are we of an austere temper? he tempteth us to cruelty. Are we soft and mild? he tempteth us to indulgence and foolish pity. Are we hot in matter of religion? he tempteth us to blind zeal and superstition. Are we cold? he tempteth us to Atheism and flat irreligion. Are we moderate? he tempteth us to Laodicean lukewarmedness. The Chamelion when she feeth on the grass, to catch flies and grasshoppers, taketh upon him the colour of the grass; as the Polypus doth the colour of the rock, under which he harketh, that the first may boldly come near him without suspicion of danger; in like manner Satan turns himself into that shape which we least fear, and sets before us such objects of temptation as are most agreeable to our humours, natural desires and inclinations, that so he may the sooner draw us into his net. St. Gregory long ago noted this subtle device of the old serpent. "In fishing," saith he, "fit allurements for all sorts of men;" as fishermen have baits for fishes: for the luxurious he baiteth his hook with pleasure; for the ambitious, with honour; for the covetuous, with gain; for the licentuous, with liberty; for the factious, with chism; for the studious, with curiosity; for the vain-glorious, with popularity. Here then is our spiritual wisdom seen to be strong always, there where our enemy is like to lie in ambush, and where he goeth about to undermine us, to meet him with a countermine. To unfold this precept of wisdom even to the meanest capacity: Art thou by nature a lover of pleasure? bend thy whole strength against the sin of luxury. Art thou of a fiery disposition? lay all upon it to bridle thy passion of anger, and desire of revenge. Hast thou too much earth in thy complexion, and art given to the world? furnish thyself continually with spiritual lever to lift up thy heart and raise the thoughts and affections to heaven and heavenly objects. Doth the eminency of thy place bring thee in danger of highmindedness? let thy whole study be humility. Doth thy profession incline thee to contention? study peace to dissembling and cozening? study honesty: to extortion and exaction? study charity, and practice restitution: to corruption and receiving the wages of iniquity? let all thy prayers and endeavours be for integrity.—The Church.

A NEW WAY TO GET A DINNER.

The Irish are as remarkable for their wit as for their blunders. Somebody has set a story afloat about a man fresh from the Emerald Isle, who put quite a literal construction upon the phrase "meals included," which we see sported in the advertisements of steamboats and other public vehicles. This man lived at or near Schenectady, where he heard the breakfast bell ring on board a canal boat just starting out for Buffalo.

'Sure, captain, dear,' said he, 'an' what'll ye ax a poor man for travelling on yer illegant swan ov a boat!'

"Only a cent and a half a mile and found,' replied the captain.

'And is it the vittles ye mean to find, sure?

'Yes. And if you're going along, go down to breakfast."

Pat didn't wait to be told a second time, but having descended into the cabin and made a hearty meal, he came again on deck and requested that the boat might be stopped.

'What do ye want to stop for!'—inquired the captain.

'And how far have we come, just?' asked Pat.

'Only a little over a mile.'

Pat thereupon handed the captain two cents, and coolly told him that he believed he would not go any farther with him, as Judy would wait her breakfast, not knowing that he had breakfasted out.

The joke was so good that the captain took the two cents, ordered Pat ashore, and thanked him for his patronage besides.

SLIGHT CAUSE OF WAR.—When the French had possession of the Valley of the Ohio, a feud arose between the Shawnee and delaware Indians, in the Valley of Wyoming. The children and women of each tribe were gathering fruit upon the Wyoming side, when a dispute arose between them concerning the title to a large grasshopper, caught by one child and claimed by another. This involved the question of boundary and territoral right. When the warriors returned from the chase, they took part with their respective women—a fight ensued—the Shawnees were defeated, and expelled from the Valley by their conquering rivals. (See Hist. Coll. of Penn.) "Let him that readeth understand."

FACTS WORTHY OF NOTICE.

It is a fact, that nine-tenths of the inmates of our Poor-Houses were brought there directly or indirectly by the use of intoxicating drinks.

It is a fact, that three-fourths of all the convicts in our State Prisons, were hard drinkers previous to the commission of the crimes for which they are now imprisoned.

It is a fact, that the greatest sufferers from disease, and those whose maladies are the most difficult to cure, are those who are addicted to the use of intoxicating drinks.

It is a fact, that all who commit suicide in this country, only one in the hundred are the immediate or the remote victims of intoxicating drinks.

It is a fact, that in all families where the children are dirty, half naked and ill fed; the rooms filthy and in disorder, the husband cross and discontented, and peevish, and the wives salterns, ill tempred and quarrelsome, one, if not both the parents are drinkers of intoxicating drinks.

It is a fact, that those who least frequently attend the worship of God, and shock the ears of modest people by their vulgarity are spirit drinkers or spirit-venders.

It is a fact, that it is a rare thing to see a keeper of a liquor shop where the poison is retailed, in any church.

It is a fact, that most, if not all the evils above recounted, originate in the licensed dram-shops in the State and Nation.

It is a fact, if these facts do not convince the voters of the State of New York, that it is their duty to put down at the ballot-boxes a traffic so destructive to the souls, bodies and estates of men, they would hardly be convinced though one rose from the dead.—New York Tribune.

A LEARNED COLORED MAN.

Our readers will probably, recollect, that some two years since, we published an article which was inserted in a large number of our exchange papers, giving an account of a Slave in Alabama, who was a self-taught man, having learnt the alphabet, by inducing his masters children and others, to make the letters one at a time, on the door of his blacksmith shop. In this way he familiarized himself with the letters, and their names. He then learned to put them together, and make words, and soon was able to read. He then commenced arithmetic, and then English grammer, and geography. It was also stated that he is now able to read the Greek Testament with ease, has some knowledge of the Latin language, and even commenced the study of the Hebrew language, but relinquished it in consequence of not having suitable books. It was stated that he studied at night, till eleven or twelve o'clock.

From the proceedings of the Synod of Alabama, at their meeting on the 23d October last, we make the following extract in reference to him.

"The purchase of the slave Elis, the learned blacksmith, occupied the attention of the Synod, and as there was a deficiency in the amount necessary to the purchase of himself and family, a subscription was taken up to make up that deficiency, amounting to $608. The Synod of Mississippi united with the Synod of Alabama in this purchase and confer with the Assembly's Board of Missions in reference to transferring Elis to Africa as one of their Missionaries."

PLUMP AND PLAIN.—A Southern Editor makes the following frank announcement:

"We shall not support any man for office short of Ten Dollars, besides the subscription fee. But the lawyers charge for attending to an assault and battery case, which is a light and lovely occupation compared with that of editorially attending to a candidate's case, to say nothing of the awful wear and tear of conscience in this peculiar branch of our business."

PRESENCE OF MIND.—A boy returning home from Montreal, with price of a pair of, oxen, was lately accosted by a highwayman, who presented pistols, with the usual order "stand and deliver!" The boy being alarmed pulled from his pocket the purse containing the money, which fortunately dropped on the road; the robber immediately jumped out of his sleigh which was then some yards in advance of the purse, and ran back for his longed-for treasure, when the boy with great presence of mind took hold of the reins, and drove off as fast as he could, with both horses and sleigh. The robber then fired his pistol, the contents of which passed through the back of the sleigh, and between the boy's legs. The boy reached home in safety, and after examining the sleigh, found in the box of it, which was locked, the sum of three thousand franc.

HAPPY CAMBO, OR, THE CONVERTED SLAVE.

Cambo, who was a slave in one of the southern states, on being desired to give some account of his conversion, proceeded as follows:—

'While in my own country, (Guinea,) me know nofin of de being of a God; me thought me should die like de beasts. After me was brought to America, and sold as a slave, as me and noder servant of de mane of Bess were working in de field me began to sing one of my old country songs—"It is time to go home"—when Bess say to me, "Cambo why you sing so for!" Me say, "Me no sick, me no sorry, why me no sing?" Bess say, "You better pray to your blessed Lord and Massa, to have massa on your soul." Me look round, me look up, me see no one to pray to; but de words sound in my ears, "Better pray to your Lord and Massa!" By'm by, me feel bad; sun shine sorry, birds sing sorry, caun look sorry, but Cambo sorryer dan'em all. Den me cry out, Massy, massy, Lord, on poor Cambo!' By'm by water come in my eyes, and glad comes in my heart. Den sun look gay, birds sing gay, caun look gay; but poor Cambo gladder dan'em all. Me love my Massa some; me want to love him more.'

INSURING MEETING HOUSES.

A friend requests us to speak a word in season, on this subject. And we think the suggestion an important one. The last year has been remarkable for the number of fires, both by means of incendiaries and ordinary casualties, and meeting houses have come in for a full share of the burning. And, for causes which need not be named, meeting houses are peculiarly exposed, and it is worth all its costs, for any parish to have insurance upon their houses of worship.

But our exhortation mainly respects the weaker societies, which in case of a loss of their house by fire, are not able without aid from abroad to rebuild. The more able societies are more in a way of being insured. And to the Christian public it is of less consequence, whether they be or not. For their loss is not a public loss. But the feeble societies who are not able to rebuild, owe it not only to themselves, but to the public, and to the cause of Christ, to effect upon their houses an insurance of a part of the value, so that in case of fire, they would have no need to go abroad for aid. Their failure, to do it, operates to make the neighbouring churches their insurance companies. To let their houses stand uninsured in expectation, that in case of fire, the neighbouring churches will rebuild them, is equivalent to spunging the amount of the insurance out of the neighbouring churches.

And when a house of a feeble church is actually burned, the loss falls ultimately upon the missionary cause. Cases have recently occurred, where churches have found it necessary to put by their annual contributions, to certain benevolent objects in their turn, in order to help to rebuild burnt meeting houses in their neighbourhood. This illustrates the operation of the thing. Feeble churches have no right, in this way, to make the benevolent societies their insurance companies, to pay their losses by fire. The cost of insurance is a trifle; and the feeble societies that pays it will more than regain it, in the strength which will accrue to them from their honest dealing.

We hope that there are none in our churches, that have a superstition against insurance. Because we should be strongly tempted to suspect, that their superstitions were conspiring with their purse. And if such a superstition should occasion the loss of a house, it could not furnish the funds to rebuild it. A word to the wise is sufficient.—N. E. Puritan.

MARINE LIST.

FORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

June 18. Col. sloop Perseverance W. Jones master, from the leeward.

" 26 H. M. C. M. Brig——,——commander, from the leeward.

" 27 Dutch brig ——,—— master, from the windward.

DEPARTURES.

June 13. British schooner Davis, Townley master, for England.

" 23. U. States Store Ship Southampton Lieut H. W. Morris commander, for the windward.

" 28. Am. barque Chatham, Bearse master, for New-York: passengers, Rev. A. D. Williams and lady, Messrs T. Canot, H. J. Roberts, E. Bettler, Drayton, and Mrs. Williamson, and Mrs. Lauva.

" 30. Col. sloop perseverance, W. Jones master for the leeward.

July 2. H. M. C. M. Brig——— commander for the windward.

POETRY

COLD WATER SONG.
BY PIERPONT.
AIR—"Auld Lang Syne."

Shall o'er cold water be forgot
When we sit down to dine?
O no, my friends, for is it not
Poured out by hands divine?
Poured out by hands divine, my friends,
Poured out by hands divine:
From springs and wells it gushes forth,
Poured out by hand divine.

Cold water, too, (tho' wonderful,
'Tis no less true, again)—
The weakest of all earthly drinks
Doth make the strongest men:
Doth make the strongest men, my friends
Doth make the strongest men:
Then let us take that weakest drink,
And grow the strongest men.

And as the bells of tulips turn
To drinks the drops that fell
From summer clouds—then why should not
The two lips of a belle?
The two lips of a belle, my friends,
The two lips of a belle?
What sweetens more than water pure,
The two lips of a belle?

The sturdy oak full many a cup
Doth hold up to the sky
To catch the rain, then drinks it up,
And thus the oak gets high;
'Tis thus the oak gets high, my friends,
'Tis thus the oak gets high,
By having water in its cups;
Then why not you and I?

Then let cold water armies give
Their banners to the air;
So shall the boys like oaks be strong,
The girls like lilups fair,
The girls like lilups fair, my friends,
The girls like lilups fair;
The boys shall grow like sturdy oaks,
The girls like lilups fair.

PEEL'S PATHETIC APPEAL TO DANIEL O'CONNELL.

I GIVE thee, Daniel, all I can,
Though poor the offering be,
The Maynooth Grant is all, my Dan,
That I can yield to thee;
I might give up the Irish Church,
But if I did, what then?
My friends would leave me in the lurch,
I mean, my party men.

Perhaps 't is just, perhaps 't is fit
That I should more concede;
But then the House won't suffer it
They won't, they won't indeed.
Believe me, I my conscience pinch
Much more than words can tell,
To grant thee thus a single inch;
And thou wouldst take an ell!

Oh! do be quiet, Daniel, pray,
Be moderate, I implore;
Take what I cede; another day
I may allow thee more:
Keep Ireland out of water hot,
I beg thee, on my knees'
And I won't say that she shall not
Have justice—by degrees.

Punch

JUDÆ CAPTA.

DARK is the flow of Siloe's stream,
And Zion's walls are low;
Deserted Judah's cities seem
To mourn their children's woe.

Yet mourn not Judah, for the Lord
Will yet his arm extend,
Help to his suffering sons afford,
And Jacob's ills shall end.

From glowing realms of eastern light,
From evening's softer skies,
From where the Seven that rule the night,
In cold conjunction rise.

From southern climes, where'er they be,
Where'er thy sons may roam,
A remnant yet their Lord shall see,
And find their promised home.

A NEW article of import has been introduced by the Trent steamer, from the West Indies in new potatoes; which have been successfully cultivated in the Bermudas for the early supply of the English market, grown from the best seeds. The climate and soil is well suited for their growth, and about a ton has been brought over as a sample by the above steamer. In boiling they are said to be even of superior quality to those of home produce being less watery. The same vessel has also brought over a quantity of pine apples, preserved in their juice in bottles, which are likely to be a very valuable addition to the kitchen.—Morning Post.

MISCELLANEOUS

WONDERFUL EXPLOIT OF BENJAMIN CLOUGH.

THE whaling ship Sharon, of Faithaven having been some time cruising for whales in the vicinity of the Caroline Islands, put at in Ascension, the 15th of October, 1842, for wood, water and recruits. The requisite supplies being obtained, preparations were made to proceed upon the voyage, when eleven of the crew deserted, and being secreted and protected on shore, all efforts to retake them were fruitless. The ship sailed again on the 27th October, with a crew of seventeen men, all told, four of whom were natives of King's Mill Groupe, and two of other islands in the South Sea. The intention was to touch at Bay of Islands or Port Jackson, to make up the complement of men.

On Sunday, Nov. 6th, lat. 2 20 N., lon. 16 E. whales were raised, and both boats lowered in chase, leaving Captain Norris, a Portuguese boy, named Manuel Jose dos Reis, who acted as steward, and three of King's Mill Islanders, on board. The boats soon succeeded in capturing a whale, which the ship ran down to and took alongside—they continuing in pursuit of others. At 3 o'clock, P. M., the mate's boat being about a mile and a half from the ship, her signal was discovered at half mast, and he immediately pulled towards her. The singular and unaccountable management of the ship for some time previous, had already been remarked by those in the boat, and excited the liveliest apprehensions as they approached her. Coming up upon her quarter within speaking distance the boy who was aloft, and had cut the main-top gallant halyards, told Mr. Smith, the mate, that the Islanders had killed Captain Norris, and were in possession of the ship. Just then, one of them, armed with a cutting spade and entirely naked, leaped upon the taffrail, and, brandishing his weapon with most furious and menacing gestures, dared the crew to come on board. The other two were also naked, and stationed one at each side of the ship, where they had collected all the whaling craft, billets of wood, hammers, belaying-pins, in short, everything that would serve as a missile or offensive weapon, determined to repel any attempt to board. The fourth native of the same islands was in the boat, and one of the mutineers addressed him in his own language, telling him, it was supposed, what they had done, and inviting him to join them. He made a gesture of disapproval, upon which the other caught up the cook's axe and hurled it at him with such precision of aim, though a ship's length distant, that it cut through the back of his shirt as he stooped to avoid the blow. A shower of missiles followed, thrown with such force, that the bone belaying-pins were broken into several pieces on striking the boat, but fortunately no one was seriously injured by them. The mate then ordered Manuel to cut the main-top gallant sheets and maintopsail halyards, and to go forward on the stay and cut the halyards of the head sails and clear them from the yards, which was done. The task of retaking the ship was evidently one of extreme difficulty and danger, for the mutineers had the advantages of position and a plentiful supply of arms, with the resolution and skill to use them effectively, so that the second mate and his crew, who had in the mean time come up, were called to consult upon the best course to pursue.

It was proposed that both boats should advance and board the ship, one upon each side, at the same time; but Mr. Smith, upon whom by the melancholly catastrophe on board, the responsibility and duties of master had devolved, thought that a proper regard for the interest of the owners, as well as for the safety of the men under his command, required him to avoid all personal risk, for which reason he proposed that both crews should take the other boat and proceed to the ship, leaving him alone to await the issue. This proposal met with no favor, the men declaring a wish rather to start for the nearest land, five or six days' sail distant, and the second mate relishing it so little that he suffered his boat to drop astern out of talking distance. Mr. Clough, the third mate, who acted as Mr. Smith's steersman since the ship was abandoned had darted his lance several times at the naked savage on the rail, but for want of sufficient warp it fell short three or four feet at each trial, he requested therefore that the boat might be pulled within reach, as the fellow kept his position without flinching, and insolently defied him; but the mate thought the danger too great, and refused to gratify him. He then offered to go on board over the bows, if the boy would cut the fore-royal stay and let the end fall overboard, so that he could ascend by it to the jib-boom with a lance warp in his teeth: but Manuel had become so exhausted, by fright and fatigue, that he was unable to get up to the royal mast-head to execute his part of the task.

His next plan, and the one he executed, was that both boats should pull ahead of the ship, and when it was quite dark, taking every precaution to avoid exciting the suspicions of the mutineers, he would jump into the sea, and passing close by the side of the ship, enter her by the cabin windows. The ship and boats were surrounded by sharks, attracted probably by the carcass of the whale killed in the morning, to defend himself against which, he took a boat-knife in his teeth, and let himself into the water as silently as possible. At the same moment the ship took aback, and it became necessary to swim—but to "strike out" and make the best of his way, would cause a sparkling of the water, and betray his approach to the look-out, so that he was obliged to "walk water," by which scarcely any agitation was made, and almost as little progress. It was a tedious passage of more than an hour and a half in duration, terminated at length by diving under the ship, seizing the rudder at the heel, and ascending by the after part of it to the starboard cabin window, through which he made his entry. Two large sharks were close to the boat when he left her, and kept him company the whole time without offering to molest him, and the knife, which luckily had been useless, he felt upon the transom as he got in at the window.

He then divested himself of his clothing, that the enemy might have no advantage over him on the score of nakedness should they come to close quarters, and applied himself to listening to the movements upon deck; as these indicated that there were yet no suspicions of his presence, he proceeded to search for arms and ammunition. Two cutlasses were soon found, and amongst all the muskets, two only were fit for service, so far as he could judge by careful handling—it was too dark to see. Every locker and drawer in the cabin was ransacked for powder and ball, which being found, the muskets were loaded, and placed with the cutlasses at the foot of the cabin stairs. While engaged in loading a fowling piece, he heard a step in the gangway, and some one descended the stairs, hitting the arms at the bottom and knocking them down upon the floor. Mr. Clough ran to the spot, but unable to see anything, groped about by the intruder's feet, till he caught hold of a cutlass, with which he run him through the body; as he drew it out, a struggle ensued for the weapon, and both fell on the floor—the officer luckily uppermost; planting his knee upon his breast, he took out one of his eyes, and with a good deal of trouble, brought the edge of the sword to bear upon the back of his neck, and made an attempt to cut off his head—he pulled it back and forth several times; but it was an awkward operation, for the other kept hold of the sword and struggled violently, wounding Mr. C. severely by twisting the blade several times in his hand.

After a while he became quiet, and supposing him to be dead, Mr. C. got up; but the other immediately rose and struck about furiously with the cutlass, hitting him at almost every pass until, exhausted probably by loss of blood, he uttered a slight groan and fell upon the floor. Going again to the stairs, the officer saw another in the gangway with a cutting spade pointed towards him, when feeling for a loaded musket, he succeeded, after snapping twice, in putting a ball through his heart. At the same moment the spade dropped, or was thrown down, taking effect in the thick part of Mr. Clough's arm, and the blood gushed so violently from the wound, that he supposed the artery to be severed, and began to give way to unpleasant reflections, when the third came to the gangway, armed also with a spade, and endeavored to look into the darkness below. Mr. C. made several ineffectual attempts to gain another musket, but his right hand and left arm were both disabled. The man stood still a few minutes, then dropped his spade and walked forward. Mr. Clough now hailed the boats, which were so near that he could hear the conversation going on amongst the men. He told them that two of the mutineers were dead, himself dangerously wounded, and urged them to hasten on board. They said they did not believe that more than one had been killed, as they had heard but one gun, and did not consider it prudent for them to come near him; so the wounded man had to sit down and suffer his blood to flow, for his right hand had became so stiff and sore that he could not use it to place a bandage on his arm. More than half an hour having elapsed since the hail, and no further news being heard, the boats ventured alongside.

A light being struck and brought into the cabin, the floor was found covered with the blood of both combatants. The man who had first entered the cabin was reclining on the transom, still grasping the cutlass, and with it the boat knife left by Mr. C. when he came on board; one of his eyes hung upon his cheek, and his body was covered with gore; he was still alive, but did not move, and made no noise but a kind of suppressed groan. One of the men stabbed him twice with a boat spade, and Mr. Smith discharged a musket at him; he was then caught by the hair, dragged upon deck, and thrown into the sea. The deck presented a shocking spectacle—all dabbled and tracked with clotted blood; the mangled and headless body of the unfortunate captain was lying there, as was that of one of his murderers, which was unceremoniously thrown over the side, while the remains of Captain Norris were collected and reserved for burial the next day. The surviving mutineer jumped overboard and swam some distance from the ship, but returned during the night and hid himself in the forehold. When the crew attempted to take him out, the next day, he made some show of resistance, but at last came on deck and surrendered himself. He was put in irons, and taken to Sydney, where he was left in prison when the ship sailed.

The Sharon completed her voyage, under the command of Mr. Smith, more successfully than could have been expected after such a melancholy and disheartening interruption—Mr. Clough remaining on board as second mate. To his daring and almost unaided exertions are to be attributed the return of a valuable ship and cargo, and, what is far more important, the preservation of the surviving crew from the miserable fate which must have overtaken them had they persisted in seeking the nearest lands in their boats. The owners of the Sharon have shown their appreciation of his services by giving him the command of a fine ship, and it is to be presumed that other parties who have escaped a heavy loss, will not withhold such a testimonial of their approval, as will at at once gratify him and incite others, under like circumstances, to emulate his conduct.

LITERATURE GOING TO THE WALL.—The following advertisement seems to open a new field to men of letters:—

INTELLECTUAL PAPER-HANGINGS,

in which the writings of various authors are inserted in ornamental patterns, &c., &c.

There are many authors who will no doubt be very happy to treat with the trustees of public buildings, and we shall ourselves have much pleasure in supplying the walls of Westminster Hall, at per yard, according to quality. We have fitted up a few panes in our office-window with specimens, and a sheet of jocular paper-hanging may be seen in daily operation at 92 Fleet street.

We should say that various authors should be selected to do the mural literature for various apartments. George Jones, who must by this time be sadly in want of a job, would be invaluable as a writer for sleeping-rooms; and Jenkins, if he is to be found, could undertake to cover the walls of the servants' hall with belles-lettres of the most appropriate character. The industrious author of "Jack Sheppard" might do the whole of the paper-hanging for Newgate; and some of our dramatist could furnish the walls of the condemned cell with productions of a genial nature. We are happy to see the paper-hangers coming forward in aid of the literature of the country, which has had no such friends since the old original trunk maker whose services to the cause of letters are recognized by Sir Gilbert Norman in Mr. Jerrold's new comedy of the two, we prefer the celebrity of the walls to the semi-immortality of the portmanteau; for though the latter may last longest, the former is calculated to bestow a larger popularity. The literature of the trunk seldom meets the eye of any but the owner and the custom-house; while the author who.

"Paints a panel or adorns a wall,"

is sure of his productions coming under the observation, at least, of all classes.—Punch

A LUSUS NATURE.—The Court Newsman tells us that the queen and Prince Albert postponed their visit to Claremont on account of the royal children having been "unexpectedly attacked by the hoopin-cough." The Court Newsman being a perfect courtier, has of course no right to expect that anything so common as the hoopingcough should approach the royal infants. Our contemporary appears to be utterly taken aback at the idea of the vulgar hooping-cough having made its appearance in the nursery at Buckingham palace. How it got there is a marvel to the Court Newsman, who uses the word "unexpectedly" to mark his sense of the impertinent intrusion which the malady has been guilty of.—Punch

A carman of New York city, who has been rescued from the way of all moderate drinkers: takes an excellent method of uniting preaching and practice, as his business card exemplifies

GEORGE T. HALL,
CART NO. 3012,
Residence 45 Elizabeth Street.

Old Alcohol I will not cart,
But all things else with all my heart;
Old Dick and I have now good dinners,
Come sign the pledge, ye drinking sinners.

A German physician has just published a medical tract in which he says Ladies of weak nerves should not be permitted to sleep alone.

London paper.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, AND A. W. ANDERSON, ASSISTANT EDITORS.

VOL. XIV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) JULY 17 1846. NO. 19

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr. R. MURRAY,
Cape Palmas,	Dr. S. F. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. De LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. T. TRACEY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

ARMED SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

SEEING clearly the mote that is in our brother's eye, let us not neglect a considerable stock in our own. By what right do we authoritatively interpose to regulate under penal laws the conduct of foreigners? What right has one nation to interfere with the citizens of another, except for its own protection! Admit that we have a right to enforce our moral convictions vi et armis on alienations, and we acknowledge the right of Rome, if she can, to impose Popery on us—of Islam to introduce the Koran and polygamy. We arrogate the right to meddle with the citizen of the United States in such way that one state of the union dares not pretend to act towards another—in such mode as that encroachment which now causes war between the sovereign states of the Swiss Confederation. Observe, if we speak only of moral conviction and free consent, we must negotiate without cannon at our backs, without diplomatic reserves, or custom-house bribes. The custom house bribes are out of place, because we do not seek to purchase a benefit conceded to ourselves, but to dictate what another government shall do to its own subjects, according to our code. Our claim is a monstrous violation of sovereignty, to which nothing but meanness or cowardice will induce any foreign country to submit.

The limits of our just interference are very clear; they are the limits of our ordinary jurisdiction—territory and allegiance. If we have come to certain conclusions as to what is crime, we have a perfect right to enforce the rule within our own territory and upon our own subjects. Let us abolish slavery, if we will, and show, if we can, that it is not only virtuous, but prudent, safe and profitable to do so. Do not let us burden our servants with the duty of enforcing English laws on Spaniards, Portuguese, French, and Americans, all along the coast of Africa and America. Such an enterprise would be clearly impracticable and silly; it has failed for half a century. Limit the police-restraint to our own jurisdiction and territory. Let it be piracy for an Englishman to engage in the slave-trade, and few Englishmen will run the risk of death or perpetual exile for any share of profit. Above all, enforce the law, fully and without qualification, that every man standing on soil owned by Britain is a freeman; admit no qualification to that rule; grant that it may cause you to harbour a few runaway criminals, but say, that so long as a nation consents to own slaves and makes freedom a crime, you will not venture to discriminate between the culprit and the innocent fugitive at the suit of the slave-owning state; do all that, and you do all within your jurisdiction to secure personal freedom. That done, let your colonists compete to their hearts' content with slave-traders in obtaining labor from Africa. There is no chance that under cover of such migration a slave-trade would arise; for as you refuse to recognize any bond—as you begin by regarding every man as a freeman, and acknowledge no obligation except such as he may incur after your recognition of his liberty—you would frustrate the whole end and aim of slave-trading. You make the transfer of the slaves from dealer to purchaser impossible. Slave-traders deal in slaves, not in freemen; could you convert the cargo of a Baltimore clipper, on landing, into so many Yankee citizens defying ownership, you would have very few Baltimore shippers investing money in that trade. —Spectator, I. Mir.

FREE OPINIONS FREELY EXPRESSED.

We take the following temperate and well merited rebuke, by comparison, in a speech of Lord John Russell on the occasion of his being presented the freedom of the City of Edinburgh.—ED. COL. HER.

"It was accounted by a Roman historian a rare felicity of the particular time in which he wrote, that he could both think what he pleased and venture to say what he thought. Now that is not only a great privilege and happiness itself, but it is a mode in which truth can be ascertained and in which the welfare of the whole community can be best promoted. I will venture to say that in no quarter does there now exist such freedom in forming opinions, and such freedom in expressing them as now exists in our own country. I need not, I suppose, allude to those countries on the continent of Europe where monarchy is still unchecked by representative institutions. In one of these countries, a friend of mine, who was endeavoring to pass some books at the custom house, happened to have some of the books of Plato in Greek. The custom-house officers said, "these must be stopped, as there may be something improper in them." This friend replied that "these were works of an ancient philosopher." The custom-house officer retorted, "but what do we know that they may not contain something against the government." [laughter and applause.] It is not, certainly, worth our while to discuss whether, in these countries, they have greater freedom than we have here; but if we go to free countries such as France and Spain, where they have representative institutions, we will find that freedom of expression and the liberty of the press are checked by laws—it may be necessary laws—which have been passed within the last few years. But if I leave Europe, and go to a country which many quote as an example of freedom to all the world—the United States of America—even then I do not believe there exists that uncontrolled power of the expression of opinion which we have the good fortune to enjoy in this country [applause]. It was but the other day that a gentlemaman having one of those names which are not uncommon in that country—a gentleman of the name of Cassius Clay—set up a newspaper, with a view to argue the abolition of slavery—that most detestable, un-Christian, and horrible institution of slavery. His press was seized by force. The persons who seized it sent it away, and told him he was no longer to venture to print anything against slavery; and he was now endeavoring, and probably endeavoring in vain, to recover damages from those persons. They contend that to set up a newspaper which will argue against slavery as an institution is a nuisance which ought to be suppressed by force and violence. Do I ask you, then without reason—am I not justified in saying, that, of all the countries on the globe, there are none where is a greater power of forming public opinion, and of expressing that public opinion, from one extreme to the other; from the extreme of declaiming against our constitution as too democratical, and proposing to go back to the reign of the Stuarts, and to the other extreme of denouncing the Crown and the aristocracy, and endeavoring to obtain the abolition of those institutions? I say, from one extreme to the other there is no lattitude of opinion which men may not dare to form, and man may not dare to express [applause].

THE BLIND PREACHER.

BY WILLIAM WIRT.

As I traveled through the county of Orange, my eye was caught by a cluster of horses tied by a ruinous old wooden house, in the forest not far from the road side. Having frequently seen such objects before in traveling through the states, I had no difficulty in understanding that this was a place of religious worship.

Devotion alone should have stopped me, to join in the duties of the congregation; but I must confess that curiosity to hear the preacher of such a wilderness, was not the least of my motives. On entering, I was struck with his preternatural appearance. He was a tall and very spare old man; his head, which was covered with a white linen cap, his shriveled hands, and his voice, were all shaking with the influence of a palsy—and a few moments ascertained me that he was perfectly blind.

The first emotions that touched my breast were those of mingled pity and veneration. But how soon were all my feelings changed! The lips of Plato were never more worthy of prognostic swarms of bees, than were the lips of this holy man! It was the day of the administration of the sacrament—and his subject was of course, the passion of our Saviour. I had heard the subject handled a thousand times—I had thought it exhausted long ago. Little did I suppose that in the wild woods of America was I to meet a man, whose eloquence would give to this topic a new and more sublime pathos, than I had ever before witnessed.

As he decended from the pulpit to destribute the mystic symbols, there was a more peculiar, a more than human solemnity in his air and manner, which made my blood run cold, and my whole frame shiver.

He then drew a picture of the sufferings of our Saviour—his trial before Pilate—his ascent up Calvary to the crucifixion. I knew the whole history—but never till then, had heard the circumstances so selected, so arranged, so colored! It was all new—and I seemed to have heard it for the first time in my life. His enunciation was so deliberate, that his voice trembled on every syllable, and every heart trembled in unison.

His peculiar phrase had that force of description that the original scene appeared to be at that moment acting before our eyes. We saw the very faces of the Jews; the staring, frightful distortion of malice and rage. We saw the buffet; my soul kindled with a flame of indignation—and my hands were involuntarily and convulsively clenched.

But when he came to touch on the patience, the forgiving meekness of our Saviour—whom he drew to the life, his voice breathed to God a soft and gentle prayer of pardon on his enemies, "Father forgive them for they know not what they do"—the voice of the preacher, which had all along faltered grew fainter and fainter, until his utterance being entirely obscured by the force of his feelings, he raised his handkerchief to his eyes, and burst into a loud irrepressible flood of grief. The effect was inconceivable. The whole house resounded with the mingled groans, and sobs, and shrieks of the congregation.

It was sometime before the tumult had subsided so far as to permit him to proceed. Indeed judging by the usual but fallacious standard of my own weakness, I began to be very uneasy for the situation of the preacher. For I could not conceive how he would be able to let his audience down from the height to which he had wound them, without impairing the solemnity and dignity of the subject, or perhaps shocking them by the abruptness of his fall. But—no, the descent was as sublime as the elevation had been rapid and enthusiastic.

The first sentence with which he broke the awful silence, was a quotation from Rouseau: Socrates died like a philosopher, but Jesus Christ like a God!

I despair of giving you my idea of the effect produced by this short sentence, unless you could perfectly conceive the whole manner of the man, as well as the peculiar crisis in the discourse. Never did I completely understand what Demosthenes meant by laying such stress on delivery.

You are to bring before you the venerable preacher: his blindness constantly calling to your recollection old Homer, Osgood and Milton, and associating with his performance the melancholy grandeur of their geniuses; you are to imagine that you hear slow, solemn, well-accented enunciations and his voice of affecting trembling melody; you are to remember the pitch of passion and enthusiasm which reigned through the house; the preacher removing his white handkerchief from his aged face, (even vet wet from the recent torrent of his tears,) and slowly stretching forth his palsied hand which held it, begins the sentence—"Socrates died like a philosopher"—then pausing, and raising his other, with warmth and energy, to his breast, lifting his "sightless balls" to heaven, and pouring his whole soul into his tremulous voice—"but Jesus Christ like a God!"

If he had been in deed and in truth an angel of light, the effects could scarcely have been more divine. *W*hatever I had been able to conceive of the sublimity of Massilon or the force of Bourdaloue, has fallen far short of the power which I felt from the delivery of this simple sentence.

If this description gives you the impression that this incomparable minister had anything of a shallow theatrical trick in his manner, it does him great injustice. I have never seen in any orator such a union of simplicity and majesty. He has not a gesture, an attitude, or an accent, to which he does not seem forced by the sentiment he is expressing. His mind is too serious, too earnest, too solicitous, and at the same time, too dignified, to stoop to artifice.

Although as far removed from ostentation as a man can be, yet it is clear from the train, the style and substance of his thoughts, that he is not only a polite scholar, but a man of profound erudition! I was forcibly struck with a short but beautiful character which he drew of your learned and able countryman, Sir, Robert Boyle; he spoke of him as if "his noble mind had, ever before death, divested itself of all influence from his frail tabernacles of flesh," and called him, in his peculiar emphatic and impressive manner, a "pure intelligence; a link between men and angels."

This man has been before my imagination almost ever since. A thousand times, as I rode along, I dropped the reigns of my bridle, stretched forth my hands, and tried to imitate his quotation from Rosseau: a thousand times I abandoned the attempt in despair, and felt persuaded that his peculiar manner and power arose from an energy of soul which nature alone could justly copy. As I recall at this moment, several of his awfully striking attitudes, the force with which my blood begins to pour along my arteries, reminds me of the emotion produced by the first sight of Gary's introductory picture of his Bard.

THE PROPHET ON HIS WAY.

The following from the N. Y. Evening Mirror, was furnished by Mr. Lester, U. S. Council at Genoa.

Having to deal with all sorts of characters, and being confined for many days to my office in the dullest details of business, it is a great relief sometimes to meet with an old genius who breaks up the monotony of life, and has his own story to tell. Not long ago I was favored with a call from two persons in one day, of a singular description, and they were the last two I ever expected to meet. The first was a Yankee from Worcester, Mass. He was a long, lean, shabbily-dressed fellow—but I'll stop and give you a more particular description. About three o'clock in the morning, I heard a thundering knocking at the door by which I knew a stranger was there, for all Italians ring a bell when there is one to ring. The servant opened the door, and ushered in the stranger. He seemed to be a young man, not more than eight and twenty—tall, lean, most particularly lantern jawed, and what the Yankees call bony. He had on a pair of cow hide shoes of an enormous size, into the soles of which not less than half a pound of horse nails had been driven, if I could judge by the clattering his feet made on the marble floor as he came in. Between his shoes and the bottom of his pantaloons, (no small distance,) were clearly visible a pair of Yankee knit, mixed wool socks, and still a little above the socks which had fallen down a little over said shoes, was visible quite a piece of lean and somewhat hairy leg. Since I have begun at the bottom to describe my hero, I will go up, and end where common historians begin—at the head. But really the feet were some of the most conspicuous things about his person. His pantaloons were of home made bottle green woolen, and cut by somebody who was not particularly lavish of cloth, for they set as tight to his skin as they could conveniently. His vest which did not come down quite to his pantaloons, was a "linsey woolsey' fabric, with a standing colar and large brass buttons, which had probably been used for a coat. He had on a cotton shirt, (unbleached,) and around his neck a high black patent leather stock and on his head a hair seal skin cap. If you will in addition to this description, picture to yourself a face unshaven for a month, of the most undescribable solemnity and sternness, you have the man.

As he entered, he came up to me with his cap still on his head, and pulled down over his ears, he said,

"Be you the United States Counsel?

'Yes, sir.'

'Well, I'm a prophet of God, and my worldly name is———. I was born in Worcester, in old Massachusetts, twenty-eight years ago, or thereabouts. I lived in sin and iniquity, like all the rest of the folks in Worcester, till nigh three years ago, when the Almighty revealed to me his son as he did to Paul; I was struck dumb, and, like Paul, after his dark season, [illegible] wonderful signs, sights, and [illegible] brought out into great light. Right off I see that everybody else was [illegible] the people was leading 'em all to perdition [illegible] full voice, and like Noah, I [illegible] but like the Asp [illegible] their ears and kept on [illegible] it was revealed to me [illegible] of God, spoken of in Malachi, and [illegible] prophets, that were to come before the way for the second coming of Christ; and that as he would appear at Jerusalem at such a time, I must go there and prepare things for his coming; so, I am here 'in the spirit and power of Elijah,' and I am bound for the holy city. If you wish to escape the last trial of wrath that is just a going to be poured out, help me on my journey.'

'Well, sir,' I replied, somewhat 'used up' I confess, by the prophet's communications, 'I am glad to see you. Won't you take a seat friend? You are on your journey, then, by the first boat?'

'O yes, sir. I must go quick, too.'

'All right. We can take you there by steam, and that's faster than the old prophets used to travel, I expect, except now and then, some of them, who took, like Jonah, the belly of a whale for a cabin. But I hope you are not in such great haste but you can pass a day or two with us here; we have a fine city, filled with palaces and works of art.'

'Oh! I care no more for these 'ere things than Paul did when he stood on Mars Hill, and see the whole people given to idolatry, I must be on my way, I have yet to get to jerusalem and keep a holy fast of forty days before Christ can come, and I don't want to delay the Lord Jesus, you see.'

'Oh no of course not; I should be very sorry to have you do that; I don't think we ought to do such things. But tell us a word about your mission.

I have a great interest in your mission I have not seen such a man for many a day.'

"Well, just as soon as this revelation come, I sold out my earthly goods to get a little money, and left friends and home for you know what our Lord said, that if a man didn't 'hate his father and mother," &c. I got to Boston, and found a steam-ship a-going to leave the next day for England, and I took passage, we was 13 days at sea. The same day we got to Liverpool I went to London in the cars, and the day after I got there I went aboard an English vessel, and we sailed here to Genoa in 18 days. So you see it's only 33 days since I left my father's house in Worcester; I've gone so fast, because God was on my side, and everything was overruled for me his servant and chosen prophet.'

'Yes, I see; well now which way do you go?'

"I want to go the quickest way to get to Jerusalem, on'y I must go by the way of Rome, for it has been revealed to me, as it was to Paul, that I must be persecuted and suffer at Rome; she is the mother of harlots, the beast, the false prophet, satan's seat, and no prophet of God can go there without persecution; I shall be there in prison twenty days as has been revealed to me, and suffer great torments and tortures, for which I am prepared, and then God will come to deliver me from prison, as he did Peter and Silas, and I shall go on my way to Jerusalem.'

'Why, my friend, it seems to me that if they are to handle you so roughly in Rome, I should give them the slip and go some other way.

"Oh no, I am commanded to go to Rome and proclaim to the pope that the day of God's judgement is come, and that in few weeks he will be cast into the bottomless pit.'

'And what do you think the holiness will say to this interesting piece of intelligence?'

'He will order me to great torments—but God will deliver me.'

"Well my friend, tell us something about the state of things in Jerusalem after you get there.'

'Well as I was saying, I don't want to detain the Lord Jesus, nor keep him waiting for me, so I shall get on the ground as quick as possible. Then I shall keep a holy fast of forty days. When this is done, the Lord Jesus will be revealed from heaven, and set up his kingdom in Jerusalem. Then the day of reckoning will come for all the world. All creeds will be burnt up, and judgement taken on all priests, churches and wicked men, and a little while given them to repent, and if they don't do it. Christ will destroy them all. The Jews will all be gathered to Jerusalem out of all nations to which they have been driven, and all the holy dead shall be raised to live and reign with Christ; I shall be his prime minister, and great prophet. This will last 365,000 years, and then the world will be burnt up, or burnt over, and a new world made out of the old one, and we shall live on it forever and ever, even to all eternity. Hell will be in the centre of the earth, which is nothing but fire and melted lava, and there they will be burned forever and ever, even to all eternity.'

'But do you really believe all this, my friend?"

'Believe it! Why I know it, for it's all been revealed to me, and I can't be mistaken.'

'But what if Jesus Christ don't come when you have finished your fast?'

'Why, he will come.'

'Well, but if so strange a thing should happen as that he should not come, what would you do!

'Why, you may just as well ask me what if there was no Jesus Christ! But I have stayed here too long already; I was going right away, but the captain told me I must have a passport, or the earthly powers would stop me; I want to go, make it out as quick as you can.'

'You shall have it in an hour friend.'

'And I'll pay for it now; what will it cost? I've got a little money left.'

'Oh I don't charge prophets anything for passports, and will get the governor and police, and papal consul to vise our passports gratis, and you can go on board the steamer Virgil this evening, and be off for Rome without delay.'

'Well then, I'll stay here till it comes.'

So the prophet took off his cap, and put it on the floor by his side, and taking out a pocket bible, turned to the prophecies, to read by himself.

All this scene, thus far, seemed to me at the time the most ridiculous I ever beheld; but when the first novelty had passed, and I saw the poor deluded man turn to his bible, the blessed revelation of God, and con its sacred page with that intense gaze with which no man looks but an honest man, it was by far the saddest sight I ever witnessed. I thought of his friends, and their entreaties that he would stay at his home, in the beautiful town of his birth, and pass his days peacefully; I thought of the care that had worn him thinner than a shadow, in pursuit of a shade, and of the disappointment that awaited him when he reached the holy spot, where the Saviour of men died, and on which I doubt no more than he, that he will stand again at his second coming, while I sat gazing at the poor victim of delusion before me, and heard the involuntary sigh that now and then came from his restless spirit, I felt a sadness which I cannot describe; I could have wept over the man, but I could not smile at him again I made out his passport, sent it to be signed by the proper authorities, and then went with him to the steamboat office, saw him on board the steamer which was just weighing her anchor for old Rome. I have heard nothing from him since. He had money enough to take him to Jerusalem, as he was willing to undergo any privation. His health was declining evidently; he was wasting away like a man with the consumption; his life was being burnt out of his heart by a slow fire. Before now he has probably reached Jerusalem, and not unlikely he has died of hunger and disappointment, without the gate of the Holy City, where the dogs have eaten his flesh and the vulturers of heaven have picked his bones.
—Boston Mail.

NATIVE ORNAMENTAL TREES.

The spirit for ornamenting public grounds, roadsides, and dwellings with shade trees is rapidly increasing, and it is a laudable spirit and when restrained within proper limits with a judicious arrangement of the trees, it adds much beauty to the rural landscape. What can be more grateful to the traveller under the burning sun of summer, than to enter a long avenue of shade, afforded by the spreading elm or beautiful maple which his ancestors have planted by the sides of the highway; and how can we better acknowledge our gratitude than by planting others for posterity.

It should be the first object with every one who builds a house, to plant shade as well as fruit trees, if he has land sufficient for the purpose.—We often hear people lament the want of these things, which they might now have been in the full enjoyment of, had they planted at the proper time.

We are under no necessity of sending to Europe, or any other quarter of the globe, for ornamental trees. Although the European mountain ash, hores-chesnut, and some others are very beautiful, yet the American forest contains a much greater variety of species, many of them beautiful, and some magnificent the magnolia and liriodendron for instance. The elm and sycamore or buttonwood are well adapted to lawns and public roads' where there is ample room for their gigantic and spreading growth they are among our most majestic and stately trees. We have five species of the maple in Worcester county and they are all found within six miles of where I am now writing. The rock or sugar maple is a fine variety; it makes a deep shade, and the dying leaf in autumn exhibits a splendid variety of colors. The red flowering is very showy in April, when it is loaded with brilliant scarlet flowers. The white is of large growth and is a fine ornamental variety; the leaves are white underneath, and when agitated by the wind have a singular appearance, this species is found on the Nashua river. The striped maple is of small size the bark finely striped with black and green. The mountain maple is found at the base of Wachuset and other places in this vicinity, and is among the smallest class of trees. The cornus florida or dogwood as it is called in the Western States is a species, the flowers, which appear in May, resemble single white roses, and are very numerous; it grows from thiry to forty feet high.

The liriodendron or tulip tree is most magnificent when in blossom; the flowers resemble tulips, and are hung in profusion on the branches. The red bud is a small fine flowering tree, being covered with flowers of a red color before the leaves appear. The ash is remarkable for the beauty and symmetry of its growth but is among the last to put forth its leaves in the spring, and the first to shed them in autumn. The mountain ash is fine for ornament, its clusters of scarlet berries remaining after the fall of the leaf, and often times through the winter.

Among the evergreens are the silver fir, which is extensively used for ornamental purposes.—The arbor vitæ is very fine and singular in the flat growth of its branches. The black or double spruce is of very regular growth, of a pyramidal shape and worthy of cultivation. The white pine is much employed at present for ornament; it is a graceful and stately tree. The hemlock may be ranked among our most beautiful evergreens, and bears a near resemblance to the European yew. Evergreens should be planted the first of June, when they will succeed as well as deciduous trees which are planted at the regular time.

I might mention many other varieties, but these will suffice, as almost any tree becomes ornamental when set in a proper place.

Much additional beauty may be imparted to shade trees, by selecting such varieties as are of rich colors when changing in autumn—for instance, the red flowering maple, whose leaf is changed to a brilliant scarlet—the hickory to a golden yellow—some of the oaks to crimson—the ash brown—and many other varieties, constituting every shade of color, all intermingled like the tints of the rainbow a scene which no pencil can paint, and no one can contemplate but with admiration.

Boston Cultivator.

Important from the Rio Grande.—General Taylor at Point Isabel—Attack on his camp Repulse of the Mexicans, and destructon of Matamoras!

The steamship New York, Capt. Windle, arrived in port on Sunday evening, having left Brazos Santiago the afternoon of Wednesday, the 6th instant. Her news is important, and of the most gratifying description.

Our last previous accounts came down to wednesday, the 29th ult. Capt. Walker of the Texas Rangers, having come into Point Isabel on the evening of the 28th ult., from his desperate encounter with the Mexicans, had volunteered to carry despatches to Gen. Taylor. We now learn by the New York, that, in that desperate attempt—so desperate as to be thought fool-hardy—he fully succeeded. Gen. Taylor learned from him the critical situation in which Point Isabel was placed, and the imminent danger of its being carried by an overpowering force of the Mexicans. He promptly determined upon a movement which should protect Point Isabel and re-establish his communication with his supplies. Accordingly the evening of Friday the 1st instant, he left his camp opposite Matamoras with the main body of his forces, determined to cut his way through, leaving behind him, for the defence of the works opposite Matamoras, between 700 and 800 troops.

This movement of Gen. Taylor upon Point Isabel was effected without encountering a single Mexican. In place of molesting him, they concentrated their troops about the camp which he had just left.

On the morning of the 3d Gen. Taylor despatched Capt. Walker back to the camp for intelligence the gallant ranger executed his commission with success, returning to Point Isabel the afternoon of the 5th. He reported that the Mexicans taking advantage of the supposed weakness of the camp commenced an attack upon it in front the morning of Sunday, the 3d, with all their batteries from the opposite side of the river, and simultaneously with a detachment of their forces on this side the Rio Grande, in the rear. The Americans hotly returned the fire. The attack in the rear was immediately repulsed, and in less than thirty minutes the Mexican batteries were silenced and the city of Matamoras battered down. The loss to the Mexicans in the action variously set down. While no account makes it less than 200 the latest report in regard to it, which we find in the Galveston News, carries it as high as 700. The Americans lost but a single man, it is said, who was killed by a shell. None were wounded so admirable was the state of the works before Gen. Taylor left them. The town of Matamoras is a complete ruin; there are scarcely houses enough left standing to serve as hospitals for the wounded.

This attack and repulse' however, is considered but the opening of the campaign. Cannonading was distinctly heard at times, down to the hour of the departure of the New York. Gen. Taylor set forth on the 6th instant to return to his camp with ample supplies. The Galveston News states that when he left Point Isabel, there was not the slightest doubt entertained that he would have to cut his way to his entrenchments through vastly superior numbers of the enemy, who were known to be posted in large forces among the almost impassable thickets of chaparral on the road with a determination to cut him off, if possible, in his attempt to regain his other forces. The number of the Mexicans is entirely vague and uncertain, though all the statements agree in estimating them at not less than ten thousand, while many accounts put their numbers at 15 or 20 thousand. All accounts agree also in stating that the Mexican forces were rapidly flocking in from all quarters. How many crossed the river could not be told, though the News thinks it would be reasonable to presume that a large part of their forces would be brought into requisition to dispute the march of Gen. Taylor. They could not but see the importance of cutting him off, and would doubtless employ all their advantages of local knowledge, skill in horsemanship and all their acknowledged resources in stratagem to accomplish their object. Gen. Taylor anticipated a formidable and desperate oppoition to his march, but determined to accomplish it or perish.

Thus reasons the News, and accordingly anticipates intelligence of a decisive general action. We are greatly inclined to doubt whether the Mexicans would venture to attack General Taylor's whole force, although they so out-number him; but should they do so we are confident that we shall have a glorious victory to recount. One account before us states, however, that General Taylor had not left Point Isabel, and probably would not leave there before the arrival of further reinforcements— he having full confidence in the ability of the troops left in camp to maintain their position against any odds.

The arrival of the New York at Point Isabel was most opportune. It will be recollected that she had nearly 200 regular troops on board under Lieut. McPhail, as well as several field pieces these were all safely landed. Even without the arrival of further reinforcements, the post at Point Isabel must have been so strengthened as to place its safety beyond reasonable doubt. Martial law has been proclaimed there and at Santiago, and every man pressed into the service. But ere this further support has reached Point Isabel from this city and Pensacola.

The accounts from Texas in regard to volunteers are by no means satisfactory. The greatest apathy seems to prevail throughout the country.

Col. Hays of the Rangers, with his force of about 400 men, stationed in the San Antonio country, determined to march at once for General Taylor's camp, as soon as he learned that it was in a critical situation; nor would it surprise us to hear that Col. Harney, with his dragoons, had done the same thing.

A CHILD OF SORROW.

During the late festive season,—when those who thought at all, reflected that, eighteen hundred and forty-three years ago, the religion of the heart, bringing peace and good-will on earth, came to soften the rigor of the religion of form,—a little girl, not six years old, had been observed by a lonely lady, sitting day after day on the step of a door opposite to her house. It seemed to belong to nobody; but, at a certain hour, there it was, wrapped in an old shawl, crouched on the cold stone, and rocking itself pensively backwards and forwards, more like an ailing old woman than a melancholy little being mingled not in their sports, but sat silent and solitary.

Soon afterwards it was seen to peep about the area of the lady's house, and look wishfully at the kitchen windows. The lady, who was kind to children, thought that the little girl might be trying to attract her notice, opened, the door suddenly, and offered it some gingerbread. When the door opened, there was a strange, eager expression in the child's eyes; but when she saw the lady she looked scared and disappointed. The kind voice and manner soon reassured the startled child, who thankfully took the offering, broke it up into little bits in her hand, and carried it to the door-step opposite, where she again took up her station. Another child, seeing the gingerbread, came up to the solitary infant, who gave the new-comer some, and, by her gestures, the lady thought that she was informing the other child whence the gift came. After waiting a considerable time without eating her gingerbread, the poor little girl rose dejectedly and went away, still looking back at the house.

A day or two afterwards, the same child was seen lingering about the pavement near the area, and holding out a bit of sugarcandy in its tiny fingers through the rails.

The lady, who thought that the child was come to offer it out of gratitude for the gingerbread, went, down into the area; but, as soon as she apeared, the child ran away. Soon again, however, the child was at its old station, the door-step opposite. The lady had mentioned this to her only female servant as very odd, but received no observation in reply.

One morning the door was opened to receive a piece of furniture, and the same child again suddenly appeared, and advanced stealthily towards the door. The lady, who was near, said, "I see you!" when the child immediately retreated to her door-step.

"This is very extraordinary," said the lady to her servant; "I cannot make out what that child vants."

"Madam," said the servant, bursting into tears, "it is my child."

"Your child!—But go, bring her in. Where does she live!"

"With my sister, and she goes to school. I have told her never to come here; but the poor thing will come every bit of playtime she gets. That day you thought she was offering you some sugarcandy, I had been to the school and given her a penny; when school was over, she came to give me a bit of the sugarcandy she had bought. Oh, ma'am, have mercy,—forgive me! Do not send me away!"

The lady, who had known adversity, and was not one of those rigidly righteous people who forget the first principles inculcated by the divine Author of the Christian creed, looked grave, it is true, but did not shrink from the lowly sinner as if she had the plague, although she had become a mother before she had been made a wife, by the gay cavalier who had deceived and forsaken her. Nor did she turn her out upon the wide world, in the virtuous sternness of her indignation. To the great horror of some of her neighbors she told her servant, that her child might come to see her every Sunday, beginning with the next. When the child, who was no longer the moping creature which it had been before it was admitted to the mother, heard this, she immediately and anxiously inquired, "How many days and nights is it to Sunday?"

Some may sneer at this; to me there is something painfully affecting in the quiet, subdued demeanor of this offspring of shame, timidly watching to obtain a glimpse of her who had borne it, at an age when happier children are never without those greatest of enjoyments, the caresses of a mother. Think of the misery of this poor child, driven, from the mere instinct of longing for its parent, to the staid demeanor of age, whilst the other merry little ones were sporting around it. Think what she must have suffered, as she gazed, day after day, at the frowning door, that shut out more than all the world's value to her. Think of the suffering mother, dreading to lose, with her place and character, the means of supporting her hapless, prematurely old infant.—Oh, man, man, thou hast much to answer for!—Living Age.

TEACHING THE DEAF TO SPEAK. The first successful attempt to teach a person deaf from his birth, to speak, was made about twelve or thirteen years ago, according to the following paragraph, which we copy from a newspaper published in 1834:

Singu'ar. A successful attempt has lately been made by the Abbe Jamet, director of the hospital of Bon Sauveur, in Normandy to teach a person who has been deaf from his birth to speak! He lately exhibited his pupil at the academy of Caen, and many questions were addressed to him by signs and in writing, all of which he answered verbally without hesitation. The tone of his voice is represented as being very singular; and produces an unnatural effect. He is a nephew of Cardinal Lafare and is eighteen years of age. This is a very interesting circumstance, and the possibility of teaching the deaf to speak, being ascertained, we doubt not that a system will soon be established, by which all those unfortunate individuals, who have hitherto been considered as necessarily dumb, will be enabled to communicate their wants and opinions, to their fellow beings, without being compelled to resort to the inconvenient mode of writing and making signs,

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, JULY 17 1846.

The Cutter "Fox" arrived on Saturday the 11th inst. rom Grand Bassa. The members of the Legislature for that county came up in her,

The legislature of Liberia, commenced its extra session on Monday the 13th inst. Our readers may remember that at the annual session, it adjourned to meet when the despatches should be received from the American Colonization Society in answer to the request made by the Legislature of 1845 in reference to the sovereignty of Liberia.

NAVAL.

The U. S. Brig Dolphin John Pope Esq. Commander arrived in our harbor from Porto Praya on the evening of the 8th inst. She made the run in six and a half days—all well.

The United States Frigate "United States," bearing the broad penant of Commodore George C. Read, came to anchor on the evening of the 10th, inst.

Commodore Read succeeds Commodore Skinner in the command of the U. S. Naval forces on this coast—all well.

The Dolphin sailed on the 14th for the leeward coast, and on the evening of the 16th. The United States left for the same cruise.

We sincerely hope, that the gallant officers of these ships, may be successful in their efforts, to prevent the flag of their country, from being longer used, to cover the abominable traffick in slaves.

The crises is at hand for the people of these colonies to meet to gether to consult about the affairs of the Commonwealth. The subject of the Independence of Liberia is now the main topic of discussion. Every one have something to say about it. Free interchange of views ought to be sought for and obtained. All party feelings, if any there are, ought to be thrown aside to make room for its dispassionate consideration. It is, not strange, that a difference in opinion, should exist as to the action necessary to be taken in the premises, and tho' others may hold ideas on the subject, at variance with ours, it would be improper for us, to treat them with indifference—nor would it be decorous in others, to attribute to us, unworthy motives, because we differ from them. Whatever may be the result of this important movement it is supposed that all will be affected alike in its operations.

The extra session which closed its deliberations, on Wednesday night, had this subject before it, and it was discussed with the most perfect freedom and animation The council room throughout the session, which lasted three days, was well filled with spectators, who listened with the deepest attention to all that was said for and against the measure. Of course that body, could not make any final disposition of the subject. It is the people's business; and the Governor is directed to convoke them for the purpose of bringing the subject before them, for their determination.

We are not prepared to say, when the convention of the people will take place. It is presumed, that the executive will order it, when the state of the weather, and other attending circumstances will permit them to assemble without much inconvenience to themselves or embarrassment to their affairs.

We owe it to ourselves, to our children and to those who may come after us to consider and ponder well, before we enter upon a new and untried state of things. To engage in this work, with a hope of a successful termination, it is all important that a spirit of unanimity should prevail among the people. Let a conciliatory feeling pervade every breast.

Commodore Read visited the shore yesterday morning. He made several calls before he left it, and expressed himself as being gratified with the appearance of the town &c. He dined at the Government House and at 4 o'clock left for his Ship. On his way from the Government House to the wharf he was honored with a salute from Fort Norris.

A petition signed by 24 Monrovians, praying for the abolition of the law imposing a tax of $500,00 on grog shops, was before the legislature. The petition was received and ordered to lay over till the annual session. Judging from the way it was received, we are quite sure, that the prayer of the petitioners will avail nothing.

THE AFRICANS BY THE PONS.—A number of these people are living wild in the woods, and at night come in town and carry off cattle &c. Within the last fortnight six milch cows and a number of sheep, hogs and goats, have been carried off by these marauders. Unless a speedy stop is put to the ravages of these thieving scoundrels, we will very soon be as poor as "Job's Turkeys." We have considerable sympathy for these people and the community in general would willingly assist in taking care of them;—but such is the disposition of some of them that they prefer, notwithstanding you may lavish upon them much care and expense,—to live a wild life in the woods, exposed to the inclemency of the weather, rather than live with the colonists where warm and comfortable quarters can be obtained.

NEW RICE.—We are gratified to have the pleasure of informing our readers, that Rice is ripening very fast. In fact some proprietors have already commenced cutting. We feel quite confident that large supplies will soon be in market.

The people of the county of Grand Bassa, are far before us, in every branch of industry. They are systematically at work planting coffee, arrow-root, &c., to exchange for foreign productions. While the people in this county, expend annually, more than one thousand dollars for foreign soap, and the best part of their time in discussing politicks or some other unimportant subject; they occupy their time im making soap in sufficient quantities to satisfy their wants, and in the honorable and praise worthy employment of their farms.—

Our readers will find on the second page an account of an engagement between the Mexicans and the forces of the U. States. We think that it will be read by many of the people of Liberia with considerable interest. We know that there are a large number in the colony, whose sympathies are for the American people in any case, and we have inserted this account for their gratification. We sympathize for the weak and the oppressed.

For the Liberia Herald.

On Sunday the 12th inst. at noon the interesting and impressive ceremony of Baptism was performed, opposite Mr. Cheeseman's wharf. The inclemency of the weather did not prevent a large number of spectators from assembling on the wharfs, to witness this truly christian duty. The administrator spoke very eloquently on the occasion, and all listened to his remarks with the greatest attention. Two persons were immersed—others were to have been down from some of the upper settlements, but I suppose the heavy rains prevented them from being present.

The Rev. Mr. Anderson was the administrator.

H.

LIST OF OFFICERS ATTACHED TO THE U. S. SHIP UNITED STATES, JULY 16TH 1846.

Commodore George C. Read.

Captain Joseph Smoot. Lieuts. H. H. Bell, G. A. Prentiss, A H. Kilty, John Rodgers, Wm. H. Brown, G. H Scott, Wm. D. Hurst. Fleet Surgeon T. Dillard: Asst. Surgeon E. K. Kane, H. O Mayo: Purser H. Bridge: Chaplain Wm. McKenney: Act. Master S. J. Shipley: First Lieut. Marines, T. T Sloan: Capt's Clerk P. H. Brown: Purser's Clerk S. Henrigues: Com's. Sec. Wm. Waln: Passed Midshipmen R. B. Riell, C. H. B. Caldwell R. W. Shufeldt W. W. Roberts: Midshipmen J. M. Murphey, S. D. Spence, J Dancis, E. T. McCauley, Wm. De. Koven. C. M. Mitchell: Boatswain M. Hall: Gunner D. Rankins: Carpenter C. Jordan Sailmaker J. Frazer: Master's Mate George D. Dods: Passenger Lieut R. Perry.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

MUSIC A PEACEMAKER.—One of the most deligh ful characteristics of music is its pacificating tendency. It may be employed as a grand mediator or peacemaker among men, Harmony of sound produces harmony of feeling. Can it have escaped the observation of any reflecting man, when present at a crowded musical festival, what a heterogeneous mass of human beings was before him? Competitors in business, rivals almost sanguinary in politics; champions of hostile creeds, leaders of conflicting schools in art or philosophy; in fine, a collection and full assortment of contrarieties and antagonisms; and yet the whole company is fused into one by the breath of song! For the time being, at least, enemies are at peace: rivals forgot their contests, partisans lay aside their weapons, and the bosoms that harbored acrimonious or vindictive feelings, over which time seemed to have no power, are softened into kindness. All respond alike, all applaud in the same place; and men whose thoughts and feelings an hour before, were as far asunder as the poles, or the east is from the west, are brought as near together in feeling as they are in space. Who will deny homage to an art that can make men brethren even for an hour! If music has such power over men is it not evident that it will have still greater power over children?

THE Ephesians banished Hermodorus the philosopher for this only cause, that he had the reputation of an honest man, and lived in great modesty and frugality: the tenor of thier decree was, that no man should be better husband of his estate than the rest, or excel others in any particular; for, if he did, he must be forced into exile.

PAPAL ATHEISM.—AN ANECDOTE.

In the year 1682, the Russian ambassador, at that time in Paris, had a young man in his train, a member of the Greek Church, on whom the Jesuits, ever anxious to make proselytes, prevailed to be baptized in the Roman Catholic Church. The youth being initiated into all the mysteries of popery, great rejoicings were made, in consequence of such a valuable acquisition to the Catholic Church, and the young Russian being called before some of the French nobility, the Jusuits who had converted him asked him in their presence, with triumphant complacency, how many Gods there were. To this the novice answered, "There is not any God, for I ate him on Easter Sunday.

THE BLIND BRIDE.

THE following poem derives its origin from a romance of real life, the scene of which is in one of our midland counties. A young lady of great beauty and accomplishments was suddenly deprived, by an inflammation, of the sense of sight. Nevertheless, instead of sinking, under so heavy a dispensation, into listlessness and melancholy, with an admirable spirit she returned her chearfulness, and continued all her former pursuit as far as the privation would allow. She continued to play, sing, walk and even ride out on horseback—preserving a bright mind, amidst her darkness, and a happy countenance. Soon afterwards a gentleman returned from abroad, who had been the companion of her childhood—and her lover in his boyhood. Touched by the noble spirit with which she bore her calamity, and still retaining his old attachment to her, he offered his heart and hand for her acceptance—in spite of the urgent counsel of his friends, and even the remonstrances of the lady herself. But he remained firm to his purpose: and the verses were composed, as if addressed by him to his Blind Bride.

Thou seest me not, my own dear bride;
Yet bright thy smile, my *E*sperance,
As when we sported side by side,
Or mingled in our playmates' dance—
Thy step, as then, is light and free,
Thy stirrup firm and fearless still:
Such power abides in constancy
Of faith and hope, and steadfast will.

I love thee then, my heart's first joy,
I love thee now, and tenfold more
Than when the saddened stripling-boy
Left thee and thine, and England's shore.
One lingering gaze behind I cast:
Thy young eye watched me from the hill;—
O had I deemed that look thy last!—
But here thou art, and dearer still.

Thy mind's a kingdom all my own;
And like the lark, in morning air,
Thy playful voice, whose minstrel tone
Can charm away my every care,
The peace which pure high thoughts impart,
The scents, the sounds of jocund earth,
Are thine—and more than all, a heart
That beats for thee and feels thy worth.

What though alike unmarked by thee,
The noonbeam and the noontide ray,
'Tis mind, and heart, and converse free.
Turn gloom to joy, and night to day.
Then cheer thee, love; where'er we go,
My step, my thought, shall wait on thine:
Thy spirit, tried in weal and woe,
My Esperance, shall strengthen mine.

AN ILL TIMED SHOT.—A French diligence was lately travelling on the road between Lagny and Paris, with its complement of passengers, and among them several Parisian sportsmen on their way home. One of these gentlemen on account of the crowded state of the vehicle, was compelled to take his seat on the outside with the conductor. —The heavy machine in which twenty-six persons were heaped up had nearly reached Chellis, and the horses were moving with rather an unsteady pace, when suddenly a flock of partridges rose up from a field on the side of the road. The sportsman, who was seated by the conductor; immediately pointed the gun, which was double-barrelled and fired it.

The sound of this explosion alarmed the horses, who broke the reins, sprung forward and upset the carriage into a ditch. Cries of pain and alarm arose, the conductor and the passengers who had suffered least endeavored to disengage themselves that they might assist the others, and some of them hastened for help to the next village. But at that moment the gallop of horses was heard, two riders advanced in all haste; they were the gens d'arms attracted by the report of the gun.

"Gentlemen," cried the officer, "your hunting permit if your please"

"Talk about hunting permits," answered the unlucky author of the accident. "Help us to get out the passengers from the diligence, and we will explain afterwards."

"Every thing in its time," replied the police officer if there are peole wounded, send for a doctor, but in the meantime give me your hunting permit, or I shall arrest you."

The huntsman searched turned his pocket, his game bag inside out, no permit. He was then obliged to give his name, surname, his domicile and profession, of all which the officer took note—Meantime groans had succeeded to screams, six travellers one of whom had his left arm broken, were waiting on the other side of the ditch—it was a sad sight but it was necessary to go through the formalities of the law.

Finally, at the end of an hour the travellers who were most injured, were allowed to return to Lagny—The police officers rendered no assistance but their proces verbal recompensed their partridges for the alarm which had been given them by the ill-advised sportsman. This episode of the new game laws will necessarily have a sequel in the correctional police court—Paris Journal des Debats.

BONAPARTE'S OPINION OF CHRIST Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, and myself, founded empires: but on what foundation did we rest the creations of our genius? Upon force. Jesus Christ alone founded his empire upon love; and at this hour millions of men would die for him.

It was not a day, or a battle that achieved the triumph of the Christian religion in the world. No, it was a long war, a contest for three centuries, begun by the apostles, then continued by the flood of Christians generations. In this war, all the kings and potentates of the earth were on one side; on the other, I see no army but a mysterious force, some men scattered here and there in all parts of the world, and who have no other rallying point than a common faith in the mysteries of the cross.

A bashful wooer, not long since, wishing to pop the question, did it in the following singular manner—taking up the young lady's cat, he said, "pussy, may I have your mistress?" It was answered by the lady, who said, "say yes, pussy."

SIGNS OF PROGRESS.—The Planter's Banner, (La.) says that recent news was formerly heard by a horse in full gallop—afterwards by a steamboat—then by a locomotive and railroad—and now by a streak of lightning, as an emblem of Morse's Electro-Magnetic Telegraph.

MISCELLANEOUS

Written for the Lady's Book.

THE DREAMS OF LIFE.

IN life there are three dreams. The first is the dream of youth; and how delightful! The youth is tempted to wish he may never awake from it. He has never tried the world, and its falsehood remains to be proved. He lives for his friends, and in their happiness consists his own. That there is such a thing as false friendship, and hollow-hearted friends, he has never dreamed. He has heard others speak of them but the words fell unheeded upon his ear. He lays in a state of security, as a vessel upon the bosom of the treacherous waves, which the next moment may yawn and engulf. At last some shock of confidence betrayed, awakens him from his dream of enjoyment. But even then his eyes are only half opened. Another and still a ruder shock at last completely awakens him. Never can he enjoy so pleasing a dream. Often will his memory look back upon it as the happiest dream of his life and brighter will it seem to him than when he was really in the enjoyment of it.

"How blessings brighten
As they take their flight"

The second dream is of Fame. Many are the hours which are spent in this strife. Many are the better feelings of his nature which are sacrificed for this unsatisfactory shade. Home and friends are forsaken. The place of his early boyhood is left, and distant lands are visited in the search. The field of battle, with its dreadful sounds and sights of horror, are resorted to. Sometimes that for which he has sacrificed so much eludes his grasp and he sees some one more fortunate, not more deserving, receive the meed of praise, which is due to himself. But even if this dearly bought, and much prized fame is awarded him, when he finds himself in the possession of it he wonders if it is for this he has been toiling; this empty prize, this fleeting shadow! Not to gain the love of his fellow creatures has he been laboring, but to receive the cold praise of thousands, to whom his name is but a word, and its sound familiar sound. False friends and flatterers surround him, for he is in too lofty a station to have real friends, who would dare reprove his follies, or give him advice. Love has departed, and fear has usurped its place. This dream was less pleasant than the first, and the awakening was painful. Twice has he raised the cup of pleasure, and found it at first sweet and pleasant, but the dregs were very bitter.

And now another dream is stealing over him he sees that those who are the possessors of wealth are bowed to, courted and flattered, he now dreams that happiness is to be found in wealth, and accuses himself of folly, for not having before discovered it. As this thought passes through his mind he feels himself slightly touched, and a voice near him says; —"Follow me."

"Whither shall I follow and who?" he asks

"You shall see," replies his guide. He follows him treading dim alleys and streets which are the abodes of wretchedness in all its forms. At last they stop before a hovel. There is a small window the panes of which are almost all gone, and in their stead tattered garments. One of these is displaced by the wind.

"There are riches even in this hovel," said his conductor.

"I cannot believe it," he said

"You shall see," answerd the guide.

They looked in. There is an old man seated in the room who is the very personification of wretchedness. His features are pinched by cold and hunger. He rises from his chair, and goes to a strong ironbound box which stands in the room. He opens it with a trembling hand and looks fearfully around. Bag after bag of gold is lifted from the chest. He opens them, and commences counting the gold, weighing each piece in his hand before he drops it in the bag a gleam of something like joy lights up his haggard countenance. After counting, they are returned to the chest which is carefully locked and the key hid.

"Here is wealth," said his conductor. "What think you of the happiness.

"But," said he, "this is wealth perverted"

"Alas!" said his guide, "and how often do we find it is so. But I see my warning is in vain.

He turned to look at his guide, but he had disappeared in some of the windings of the alley. For some time this scene leaves an impression upon him but is shaken off and he bends all his powers to the acquisition of wealth. He gains it, but happiness does not come with it. He now finds himself old and infirm. The grave is just ready to close upon him. He feels that all his wealth is of no avail.

But is there no happiness for man upon this earth? Is his whole life to be a life of misery? O, no! There is another, too pure and blissful for earth. It is a dream of Heaven and it is not all a dream. This it is which will preserve him from all temptations here and conduct him to a happy home hereafter.

M.

Philadelphia.

MAN MAY DIE OF GLANDERS.

A MAN, 55 years of age was accidentally wounded in the cheek by one of the upper-jaw teeth of a glandered horse, while he was attempting to give the animal drink. The wound bled a good deal at the time; it was bathed first with salt and water and then with flowers steeped in brandy. He remained quite well until the next afternoon, when he was seized with shivering and general malaise. He was hot and restless during this (the second night, and complained much of headache, pains in different parts of the body, more especially in the seat of the wound. The face became affected with Erysipelas, the edges of the wound looked of a bluish cast, and were covered with phlyctenæ: there was exceeding prostration of strength and spirits; the breathing was hurried and oppressed, and the pulse very rapid and small. The pains in the joints, especially in the left hip, right knee, and lower part of the leg on this side, immediately above the ankle, were exceedingly severe.

For two or three days, the symptoms appeared to become mitigated under the treatment that was adopted; but on the seventh day we read that, in addition to the symptoms already enumerated, there was a sanious discharge from the right nostril, and petechial spots scattered over the surface of the body. The patient who was every now and then delirious, frequently complained of intense pain in the left hip the integuments over which were swollen and œdematous. On the 13th day the following is the report of the symptoms; dorsal decubitus extreme prostration, pain and stupor alternating with delirium, severe headache, eyelids œdematous and of a livid hue, the conjunctivæ deeply injected incipient fopacity of the corneæ; wound suppurating freely; the malar bone exposed; discharge of bloody matter from the nostril; the nasal mucous membrane red, sprinkled over with sanguinous crusts, but without any visible ulcerated spots; lips sooty [illegible] yellowish and filthy; intolerable [illegible] fetor of the exhalation; numerous brown [illegible] mingled with livid areolæ, over every [illegible], and confluent on the nose and [illegible]; enormous "empatement," but without any sense of fluctuation of the left hip; decided fluctuation immediately above the right ankle; a various looking eruption on the abdomen and extremities, with phlyctenous and livid spots between the pustules. The patient died next evening.

Dissection.—Passing over the description of the wound itself and of the cutaneous eruption, we may notice that the abscess above the right ankle was found to be situated under the fascia of the leg, and extended inwards into the substance of the muscles. The nasal mucous membrane was of a very dark color, much softened in texture, and infiltrated with purulent matter, here and there were pustules and ecchymosed spots especially on the surface of the spongy bones; The tonsils and the pillars of the fauces were bedewed with pus. The epiglottis was œdematous, and speckled over, at one part with minute sanguinolent spots.

The lining membrane of the larynx and trachea very highly congested and dotted over with numerous whitish papulæ like the incipient cutaneous pustules. Cellular texture underneath the sternum and pleura emphysematous; considerable serous effusion within the left pleura; lungs containing numerous sub-pleural purulent nodes, which varied in size from that of a pea to that of a pigeon's egg, disseminating through their substance. The blood within the heart and large vessels was very black, but there were no coagula.

The reporter made some experiments on asses with the purulent discharge of this patient. Some of the pus from the nostrils and from the abscess near the right ancle was taken on the day preceding the patient's death and inserted, by pretty deed scarifications, into the flesh about the shoulders of a healthy and vigorous ass. The animal speedily exhibited all the symptoms of acute glanders and died on the seventh day after the experiment.

The post-mortem appearances were in every respect such as are usually found after fatal cases of the idiopathic disease.

M. Landouzy quotes with approbation the remark of M Bouley that "Acute Glanders is a highly contagious disease; contagious by the product of the nasal secretion, contagious by expired air; contagious by the blood; and contagious by the tissues of the dead body. After the fever of incubation when the virulent eruption takes place the infected animal exudes, so to speak the morbific matter from every pore." The observations of MM. Rayer Breschet and others, have most satisfactorily showed that the disease is transmissible to other animals besides those of the solipedous family; for example, to dogs, sheep, and goats. A recent, melancholy case at the Hopital Necker clearly establishes the fact that it may be conveyed from one human subject to another; one of the internes at that hospital having died of the disease caught by examining the body of an ostler who had fallen a sacrifice to it.

It appears that in the three years from 1837 to 1840, no fewer than 27 persons have died in Paris of the glanders. M. Landouzy condemns the too common practice in the French metropolis of feeding dogs and sheep with the flesh of horses that have died of the disease.

* * * * *

"As to any essential difference between the acute and chronic forms of glanders, we do not belive," says this gentleman, "that such exists; and the adoption of the contrary opinion has on more than one occasion led to a fatal security. We know of many indubitable cases of Farcy communicated from horse to man and vice versa. If the identity of these two affections, and if the circumstance of their passing from the acute to the chronic state and from the chronic to the acute, warrant certain scientific distinctions, they will not permit us without great rashness to estalish any legal distinction."—Gazette Medicale.

THE RICH AND THE POOR.

INSTANCES multiply of that better spirit which is abroad in the demeanor of the rich towards the poor. The Marquis of Londondery has been entertaining his tenants in Ulster, with a good fellowship that is as likely to have added the excellent results observed in the management of his Irish estates—their comfort, good keeping, and freedom from pauperism—as the more direct kind of management has done. It must have made the tenants willing coadjuters of the landlord in the general improvement, instead of reluctant or perverse pupils. Something of the same kind is seen in Yorkshire, at the dinner given by Mr. Brandling, a coalowner, to a great body of his workpeople. Kindness has been the rule on his property, for a century; and it is observable that his people stick to him through "strikes" with a kind of familiar fidelity supposed to be all but extinct at this day. It shows that neither master nor men have driven hard bargains, but that both have been willing to concede in times of pressure one way or the other, so as to preserve a level of good understanding. Meetings have been held at many places throughout the country to establish baths for the poor. This is one of the most interesting manifestations of the newborn zeal, because suggesting less than any the posibility of selfish motives and an eye to the quid pro quo. No present return can be expected from the hot water dispensed, save a return in good feeling. Broadly speaking, too, the want of cleanliness has been one of the most striking and forcible bars to intercourse between the richer and poorer classes: the rich invite the poor to take down that bar; and if it be true that many are so poor and miserable and so lost in squalor that they cannot help themselves, undoubtedly many others of the class will seize the opportunity; so that "the Great Unwashed" will cease to be the nickname of a class. It is remarkable, in all these meetings, that the exercise of intelligent kindness very powerfully helps men to a better understanding of each other, of each other's motives, of mutual circumstances, and therefore of questions between different classes. Besides the immediate and obvious advantages, therefore, this kind of friendless really aids the advance of all things good.

Lord Willoughby d'Eresby's promulgaton of a plan for improving the condition of the agricultural laborers is a cognate demonstration, and interesting in that way not less than in the merit of the particular suggestions. If all parties were to set themselves in this manner, irrespectively of faction and in earnest good faith, to discuss what we can do for each other, we might not jump at once to absolute wisdom, but very sensible improvements must begin on the spot, and many of the most noxious bitternesses must pass away at the word.—Spectator.

From Sears' New Pictorial.

THE PATHWAY OF SCIENCE.

WE have been reading of the wonderful properties of the electro-magnetic telegraph, and it has set our fancy afloat in the wide field of speculation. The mind soars upward and onward, awakened in all its energies, struggling, grasping, expanding, with the magnificent conceptions which are awakened in the pathway and the progress of science!

Science? what is it? where was it engendered? What are its achievements, and what are the limits which God has ascribed to its astounding developments? Did it belong to antiquity, or is it ours? Science! In the academy, in the lyceum, or the porch at Athens, shall we search for it? Will we go to the dark ages to trace its footprints? Those ages, with their "wonderful" and "illuminated" doctors, and their magnificent creeds. Ages which brought the hoary-headed Galileo, before the soleman convocation of the wise and learned, to pronounce upon him, through seven grave cardinals, the anathema of the church—"That to maintain the sun to be immoveable and without local motion in the centre of the world, is an absurd proposition false in philosophy, heretical in religion and contrary to the testimony of the scripture; that it is equally false and absurd in philosophy to assert that the earth is not immoveable in the centre of the world, and, considered theologically, equally erroneous and heretical!" The dark ages, with Copernicus imprisoned by the pope to recant his "absurd dogmas?"—with Faustus flying from Paris after his fatal bibles had been exposed for sale—the dark ages with the ponderous tomes of Thomas Aquinus, Abelard Duns Scotus, and Peter Lombard, piled up on groaning shelves—the science of the dark ages! We come to the Baconian era. Bacon, the genius of inductive science, is born. He defines its lines and teaches its limits. His pathway is upward—amazing developments!

"Earth's disemboweled! measured are the skies!
Stars are detected in the deep recess!
Creation widens! vanquished nature yields,
Her secrets are extorted! art prevails;
What monument of genius, spirit power!"

Science has been manifesting God

Where is God in nature? The illiterate and the savage see him in the whirlwind and the storm, but in ten thousand beautiful combinations is he revealed to the scientific. The earthquake causing mountains to totter on their basis, ocean to heave her immense volumes in august majesty to the sky, and bare her profound caverns—the earthquake thundering rivers from their channels, rocking down cities, and swallowing them up in yawning abysses—these are God to trembling man universally revealed—God in his might, in his awful magnificence! But, oh, to a few only is he in the soft beauty of the landscape, the meandering stream, the tippling fountain, the cascade, the zephyr bearing on its wings Flora's balmy fragrance, the blade of grass, the pebble, the shell—God the kind and attentive parent, God the benefactor, the friend, ministering with equal hand to the great family of living existence.

Take up the book of astronomy—Go with the astronomer and contemplate the illimitable empire of worlds, and, like Newton, overpowered to trace the great law that connects them together. Examine your own earth, if you please. See it selecting with mathematical precision the only permanent axis out of an infinity of others on which it might have revolved. Observe the position of that axis too—perpendicular or parallel to the ecliptic, where would have been the seasons and animal? What else would have reigned throughout this wide domain but solitude? dreary, dreadful, interminable solitude. The poet was not over-enthusiastic when he exclaimed—

"An undevout astronomer is mad!"

Contemplate with the chymist the great law of definite proportions without emotion. Trace the polarization of light, the magnet, electricity's subtle and powerful fluid prevading nature—see with the mineralogist the regular-formed and polished crystals which the great Architect has fashioned—the earth unboweled to the geologist, its mighty mountains penetrated to trace their structure and arrangements—its fossils sought out and interpreted in evidence of rolling thousands and thousands of ages! Examine with the botanist and the anatomist organic sensible nature. Every where and everything excites an insensity of emotion! All is great, all is wonderful, all is exemplicable! Or if mental philosophy be admitted to the dignity of science, the single discovery that the laws of association which influence memory are in themselves indestructable—that an affection of the body stimulates their action—that submitted to certain modifications the whole train of past thoughts, feelings, and affections, which now seem shrouded in the dark vista of the past, may be completely developed so that no one item of life shall be lost. This fact, if clearly established, completes the dignity of the effect, man, and the cause, God, and is a field for the exercise of deep and profound thought.

THE EARTH.—The surface of the earth is 196,862,266 square miles, and its solidity 257,726,934,416 cubic miles. Not more than one fifth of whole earth is habitable by man. The mean depth of the ocean is about three miles, and mean height of mountains above the level of the ocean is one and three fourth miles.

Distribute this land over the bottom of the ocean, and the waters would immediately rise to such a height as to cover the whole face of the earth. The mean annual temperature of the earth is fifty degrees.

DAMON, the preceptor of Pericles, was banished by the Athenian Senate, and his goods confiscated, by a decree of ten year's exile, for no other reason than that he was thought to have greater share of wisdom and prudence than was common to the rest of the Athenians.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, AND A. W. ANDERSON, ASSISTANT EDITORS.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) OCTOBER 16 1846. NO. I

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearages are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. D. DAVIS.
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Stone,	Mr. R. MURRAY,
Cape Palmas	Dr. S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia,	Rev. W. MILNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. I. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. P. TRACEY,
Philad-lphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

THE DAUGHTER OF ISRAEL.

BY MARY V. SPENCER.

In a large and splendid apartment, filled with the most luxrious furniture of the fifteenth century, and partaking in its florid architecture of the oriental style then so prevalent in Spain, sat a young and lovely female. Her attire was that worn by the wealthier Jewesses in the seclusion of their private apartments. The silken tunic, the rich robe, and the turban were all there, but it needed not this picturesque dress to heighten her beauty. Of all her sect, Miriam, the daughter of Baruz, was admitted to be the most lovely. In the poetical language of her people she was called the rose of Judah, that being her father's tribe.

She was sitting at a desk, with a small parchment before her as if engaged in writing. But now the pen was held listlessly in her hand, and the expression of her countenance was one of deep thought. Miriam, though young and beautiful, had already seen trouble. Unknown to her widowed father, she had secretly become a christian; and had been accustomed, during his absence, to attend the ceremonies of this new faith. Hitherto she had delayed to acknowledge her conversion publicly, for she knew it would break her father's heart; and as he was an old man, whose years would probably be few, filial affection induced her to keep secret her change of faith. Yet; day and night, she put up prayers for his conversion; for her bosom yearned to see him too a christian.

The many trials she had to undergo in consequence of this struggle between filial love and her new religion; had, hitherto, been made comparatively light, by the counsel and sympathy of one she had learned to love with all the truth and fervor of her eastern race. The student, Salvado; as he was called, was a Christian of the old blood, whose fathers had fought against the Moors in the mountains of Asturias, and who inherited all the high intellect and manly courage of his ancestors. Miriam had formed an acquaintance with him at the house of a mutual friend, for at the period of our story the wealthier Jews often formed intimacies with the higher classes, and indeed intermarried with them, as the genealogies of some of the oldest families of Spain will prove. No two beings ever came together, more fitted for each other, than Miriam and the young student. Both were beautiful, both were enthusiastic, both possessed souls of the loftiest stamp. It was to Salvado's eloquent teachings that Miriam principally owed her conversion to Christianity. And, yet, though long betrothed, no one knew the fact but themselves. Miriam dared not tell her father, for he would sooner have seen her in the grave than wedded to a Christian; and Salvado was a poor student, with no inheritance but noble blood and his father's knightly sword. So the lovers agreed to wait for better times. Then is youth not hopeful?

The betrothal had continued for about a year, during which Miriam and her lover met frequently though secretly, when Salvado received a summons to return home and abandon his studies, the uncle who had hitherto supported him at the university having died. He was now altogether penniless, having scarcely money enough left for the journey, but he immediately set forth, taking a melancholy farewell of Miriam. "I will return ere long," he said: "keep a good heart: perhaps I may win fortune and come to claim you soon. After I have had a settlement of my father's poor estate from the executors of my uncle, I shall join the camp and seek to win wealth and renown by my sword. I will write to you as often as I have opportunity to send by a trusty hand; and if ever you have occasion for the aid of a friend, call on me, and, though at my vigils as a knight, I will fly to you succor." Miriam promised and with many tears parted from her lover.

Time passed, and in the interval great changes took place in the position of the Jews in Spain. The popular opinion began to run strongly against them: always a despised people, the hatred of the mob began to find vent in open persecution. Already the monarch was meditating their expulsion, that most fatal measure to the prosperity of his kingdom, from the effects of which Spain has not yet recovered, nor ever will. The Jews were in consternation. In a few months, the edict came, and then consternation gave place to despair.—Forced to sacrifice their goods, compelled to leave their native land, the persecuted Hebrews cast themselves in the dust and put on sackcloth and ashes. But this was not the whole of their miseries. The populace, upheld, as they thought, by the royal edict, broke out into riots, almost daily, in which they sacked the homes of the wealthier Jews, and often murdered the inoffensive owners.

Poor Miriam was in despair. To acknowledge her conversion now and desert her father would seem the blackest perfidy: to go into exile would be to lose Salvado forever, and all the dear hopes connected with him. At length she resolved to write to him, to summon him to her side, and then to take a final farewell of him, telling, him she could not desert her father in his extremity. Yet when she took up the pen to indite this missive her heart almost shrank from the task. Hot tears fell on the parchment, and even when, more composed, she remained in deep thought.

Suddenly she started from her reverie, for a low, hollow murmur, like the sound of the autumn wind, penetrated to that retired chamber. She had heard such a sound once before, when a furious mob sacked the house of the Rabb Benjamin, her cheek turned ashy white. The noise increased and drew nearer; while the faint hope she had entertained that her ears deceived her, vanished away. There was no longer any doubt that there was a rising of the populace. Louder and louder their shouts approached: Miriam trembled with vague apprehension. Snatching a crucifix from her bosom, she kissed it fervently and had just replaced it, when the door of her apartment opened and her aged parent rushed into the room, alarm depicted on every feature of his countenance.

"The God of Abraham protect thee, sweet one," he exclaimed. "The spoiler is up: the Ishmachites are abroad. Haste to get some of your most valuable jewels and fly with me by the back way. Hark, there are the blows upon the outer door: the wolves will soon be in the fold of Israel!"

Even while he was speaking, a noise as if a battering ram was being used against the heavy gates of the house, shook the walls; accompanied by a succession of huzzas, as when a crowd cheers on the efforts of the more daring portion of its members. Miriam knew, therefore, that no time was to be lost: there was a riot among the populace; and the reputed wealth of her father had drawn the mob to his house, which they intended to sack. Life itself probably depended on her speed. Taking up, therefore, the parchment on which she had been writing, she thrust it into her bosom, and then hastily collecting the most valuable of her jewels she hurried them into a casket, her father assisting her with trembling hands.

"Alas! alas!" he said while thus occupied, "the glory has departed from my house. We will go forth beggars into a strange land. Oh! Miriam, beloved of my heart, the image of thy blessed mother, how will it fare with thee now after my aged head is laid in the dust? I thought to leave thee the richest, as thou art the loveliest of our tribe, but now thou wilt be a beggar among thy people—like the wild coneys, having no home but on the hills. God, of my fathers," he continued, looking to heaven, "verily, thou hast laid the rod heavily on us. The chosen of thy right hand are delivered to the Philistines—we wanderers on the earth—oh! when will the days of our tribulation and sojourning be over?"

His words were cut short, as well as their further progress in collecting valuables, by a crash which shook the house to its foundation, followed by a shout of triumph from the crowd; and instantly the feet of the infuriated mob was heard in the courtyard below.

"Fly, fly, never mind the jewels—better life and poverty than death by such hands," said Miriam, recoiling with horror at that shout, and dragging her father away from his task. "We shall barely have time to escape into the back street—throw over yourself this cloak: I am sufficiently disguised by my veil."

Taking the old man's hand in hers, she hurried along the corridor, into which the room opened. Their way led for some distance along the passage, which was separated from the court-yard, now filled with people, only by a thin wall; and at every step Miriam expected to hear the door at the upper end give way, when they would be immediately visible to their pursuers—She could hear the blows on it increasing in rapidity, and urging her trembling limbs forward with an increased pace, she had just gained the door of exit when the entrance give way. As she hurriedly emerged into the narrow street behind the house the mob rushed into the corridor.

The door was hastily closed behind her and then she looked up and down the narrow thoroughfare, uncertain which way to proceed, for her father, whom age and terror had rendered incapable of thought, stood beside her, gazing bewildered into her face. To the right, where the narrow lane abutted on the main street, she heard shouts as if the mob was in great force in that quarter: so she turned her footsteps toward the left, and hurried on, dragging her father with her. She hoped that her flight had been unnoticed by the mob, and that she might gain the end of the street undiscovered: then, if there was no crowd in that quarter, or if their disguises proved effective, she might escape into another part of the city and find refuge with some of their sect until the riot was over.

But these hopes were of short duration. Horror, and regret at leaving his possessions, had so far overcome her father, that he was now as helpless as a child, and Miriam found herself almost compelled to carry him along. Their progress, therefore, was comparatively slow, and they were already a considerably distance from the outlet of the lane, when the door by which she had fled was opened, and a rioter looked out. A glance down and then up the street discovered the fugitives: and immediately a dozen of the mob rushed out yelling, and gave pursuit. Miriam shrieked, and make an effort to drag her father forward still faster; but the effort was vain: the rabble made two steps where she advanced one.

"Father," she cried despairingly, "cannot you haste. See, they gain on us, and will tear us limb from limb. If we can only gain yonder outlet before them, some archway or open gate may afford us a shelter. A single minute may be enough to baffle the mob."

"I cannot fly faster—I feel as if the angel of death was passing over me—my limbs totter and my heart is still," he said, "leave me to my fate—and the Lord God of thy fathers and my fathers bless thee!"

As he spoke, Miriam notice that his eyes grew glassy, and a ghastly paleness overspread his countenance. His feeble limbs gave way beneath him, and he would have sunk to the ground if his daughter had not supported him.

This was a terrible moment for Miriam. To desert her father in his extremity was not to be thought of, yet remaining would do him no good and would seal her own fate. Death was not in itself so terrible; but she had heard of the outrages perpetrated by the rabble on their victims, and she shrank, with maidenly modesty, from the profanation. These thoughts flitted rapidly through her mind, as she heard the exulting cry of the mob, when they saw her father sink down: then, all selfish considerations passed from her mind, and she grew absorbed in her dying parent.

"Father," she said, kneeling, and supporting his dying head," father! Oh! he is dying," she cried agonizingly, looking to heaven, "son of God intercede for him.

The old man faintly opened his eyes which rested upon his daughter's tearful countenance. It was the last glow of his faculties, rallying from the stupor of approaching death. There was all the strength of earlier manhood in them now.

"The God of Israel protect thee, my child," he said, "I go to join Abraham and the patriarchs of old. The Lord is forgiving—he may yet save my murderers—I see the blessed in heaven and there are Gentiles as well as Jew——"

His voice ceased, his head fell back, and Miriam felt the weight in her arms increased. But her heart throbbed with joy at the words he had spoken—was there not forgiveness in them for her?—oh! could it be that the dying have glimpses of futurity and learn then a charity they knew not while they lived?

But this thought was succeeded by the reflection that her long loved parent was dead, and that his remains, in another moment, would be the prey of a brutal mob. At the thought she started up: and now, for the first time, she perceived that her pursuers had halted a few paces distant, as if awed for the instant by the unexpected spectacle of death.

It was a subject for a painter. There lay the corpse, with uncovered countenance that undefinable expression which ever dwells on the faces of the dead, checking the mob with sudden awe; and over it stood Miriam, her slight, woman's form drawn proudly up, confronting the rioters with the haughty bearing of a priestess, whose shrine has been broken into by sacreligious hands. —At a little distance was the rabble, huddled together like a pack of hungry wolves, suddenly startled by the appearance of some new and unexpected foe.

It might have been a minute that the two parties stood thus regarding each other. At length Miriam, as if remembering her duties to the dead, stooped reverently down and covered the face of the corpse. Whether it was that the mob had, by this time, recovered from their astonishment, or that the stony countenance had been what withheld them, no sooner had the daughter performed this act of filial love, than the rabble all at once, appeared to recover from their consternation, and a voice from their midst gave utterance to their rage, by crying out,

"He only counterfeits death. Down with the unbelieving Jews. No mercy to the scum of Israel.

That ribald challenge found an instant echo in the bosom of the listeners; and with a hungry howl, like jackals scenting a prey, the mob rushed forward.

Miriam' at the first sound of the speaker's voice, had sprung before her father's corpse. She saw, in the faces of the mob, that death would soon be her portion also, and she resolved to perish in the effort to preserve her father's remains from insult The thought of her lover, even in that awful moment, was present to her mind, in a wild wish that he could have been there to succor her.

"Back," she said, waving her arm as the mob rushed on, "have ye no mercy for the dead. I am a Christian. Oh! then spare my father."

'Thou liest," said one who seemed the leader of the rabble, and whose eyes glistened as he saw the rich jewelry on her person. "Thou a Christian—thou, a child of that impious dog! Ha! ha!—believe her not, comrades. Come on."

The crowd, which had been checked by her words and manner, seeing their leader at these words lay hands on the maiden; rushed on again. Miriam sprang back, at the same moment, flinging herself on the body of her father, when suddenly she saw a troop of horse, headed by a cavalier, wheel into the lane from its outlet.

"Hold, you villains—stand back there," came an authoritative voice, "The first man than touches this maiden dies!" said the cavalier, checking his horse in full career as he reached the corpse.

At this sudden a portion the mob stood aghast: they looked at their own number and then at that of the horsemen; and finding themselves outnumbered sullenly hung back. Only their leader ventured to speak, but he, too, let go his hold on Miriam.

"They are Jews, Sir Don, and our lawful prey.;'

'Jews! you knave," said the cavalier as Miriam, recognizing his voice, sprang into the arms of her lover, who had alighted the moment he checked his steed. "I will certify this maiden to be a Christian; for I heard her say so myself just as we wheeled the corner. See here," and with the words, he drew from her bosom, and held aloft, by the chain to which it was attached, the jeweled cross that himself had given her.—"Now back, ye rabble, or I will order my horsemen to charge into your midst."

His words were too authoritative, aided by his display of force, to be disputed, and the mob were fain to hasten back to the house and content themselves with its plunder. With this, the cavalier had no disposition to interfere, as he knew that neither his force, nor that of the whole municipality, could withstand the populace there. He, therefore, ordered his followers to take up the dead body of Miriam's father, and lifting into his saddle her now senseless form, he galloped, with his troop, away.

Our story is told. It only remains to explain, in conclusion, that Salvado was no longer a poor scholar, but a grandee of Spain, having come into possession of a title and large estate by the death of a distant relative. The instant he heard of the risings against the Jews, fearing for Mirian, he had hastened to her side, though his relative's affairs were yet unsettled. Arriving at the time of the riot, and finding he could not reach the house in front, he bethought him of the entrance in the rear —how opportunely the reader has seen.

The father of Mirian had a decent burial, and, in due time, she became the wife of Salvado, having first acknowledged herself to be a Christian. Some of the proudest families of Spain are descended from the

DAUGHTER OF ISRAEL.

COMMUNICATION.

For the Herald.

United States Frigate "United States" bearing the broad Pennant of Commodore George C. Read; Captain Joseph Smoot Commander.

Monrovia Harbor Sept. 17th 1846.

SIR:—In compliance with your request I give you a hasty sketch of our cruize from your interesting Town of Monrovia, to the leeward as far as Cabenda, a Portuguese settlement; notorious, I am informed, for its extensive commerce in slaves.

We left your harbor at fifteen minutes past six P. M. on July 17th after completing our supply of wood and water, for our leeward cruize. And sailed along the coast generally, in sight of land, with moderate head breezes, and favorable weather corresponding with the season here, and arrived at Cape Palmas, on the 22d of the same month, where we remained until the 25th, procuring a little fresh beef and vegetables for the crew; as I was not on shore there I can not pretend to give you any description of the place. I was informed, however, by some of the officers who were on shore, that here the colonists were doing very well, and were also very sanguine of their ultimate success in civilizing the country and increasing the emegration to their colony from the state of Maryland.

The country in the interior is said to be fertile and well timbered; but of the resources of this portion of your territory, you and your readers are capable of imparting more information to me than I am to you.

We left Cape Palmas on the 25th July and continued down to Acra, which we reached on the 29th of July, and only remained there a part of two days. I was on shore there, consequently, for a very short time; and was struck with the number of people, who appeared to be running about the town, and apparently not engaged in any business, or lounging about their doors as apparently having nothing to do. Their fruits here are very fine, but I saw no great indications of the cultivation of the soil in the vicinity of the town. But from the number of well trodden paths I saw running into the interior I imagined that there must be considerable trading from the interior of the country of Acra with their products, and the Beeves, the best I saw on the coast, were purchased here by the Purser, and a considerable quantity of Ox's, Pigs, Poultry and Eggs, together with Pine Apples, Soursops, were purchased by the various messes of the ship. The country must abound in black monkeys, as the natives brought many of the robes made of their skins, and the skins separately, to sell on board the Frigate. They also brought the grey monkey skin but not so many of them as they did of the black monkey skins.

The Town appeared to contain many hundred houses built on very irregular streets and with apparently no design in its plan; the streets forming a kind of perplexing labyrinth as far as I could see from the short distance I was able to penetrate. The people are all dissolute and strongly addicted to get every cent of money by extortion that they can. Our very short stay here prevented us from getting a very distinct idea of their occupations or resources. The location of the Town is rather pretty, and the country, as is usual along the western coast of Africa—mountainous and hilly, with many valleys intersecting them. Left Acra on the 30th of July. We hove to off Elmina, and anchored off Cape Coast Castle for a short time. At Cape Castle, there are three towns, English, Dutch, and Danish. We saw but little of either of those places. They are all very finely situated on a plain standing on and defended from the surf by an elevated and perpendicular rampart of rock. They have all Forts on which the national flags flaunt gayly to the wind. The English town has a melancholy memento, attached to it as being the receptacle and——— of one of the neat and simple hearted of the Poetesses of our day. She married the Governor of the English possessions and followed his fortunes to this country; but died in consequence of having taken an over dose of Prussid acid which she had been accustomed to use in minute quantities for a spasmodic disease to which she was liable. We continued on still going to the leeward, until August 7th, when we made Princess Island, and anchored near the shore; here we took in water, and hauled the seine some day or two catching a considerable quantity of very excellent fish. We remained there until the 11th of August, and sent our clothes ashore to be washed, and ironed. They were returned on board in a condition of cleanliness very little improved, if not in fact in many cases deteriorated and done up in a style that would have made a Broadway dandy exhale into a vapour, which, indeed, the clothes appeared to be contemplating, as they were nearly damp enough to wring the water out of them. There was a general condemnation of the———of the fair sex of the famous Princess Island, and many a prayer for their future reward for the very great improvement they had made in the appearance of our wardrobe, by carefully washing all the starch out and putting none in, our shirt collars or bosoms, but tastefully variegating them with specimens of their tattooing. Ah! my fair laundresses, the great care that I saw you exert when on our knees, gently dragging them through the water and then throwing them hither skelter in every direction without any regard to the colour of the soil upon which the garment reposed whether it was a verdant grass or a dirty beach; on many a memento was left with us of the skill of the water nymphs of Princess Island in the abstruse art.

The scenery of this Island is the boldest and most picturesque we have seen any where in our cruize. The mountains rise from some distance above their bases in a single pinnacle running up into air to a great hight like some huge tower of solid rock hewed out by nature to commemorate some wonderful feat of her volcanic action, or like a pillar made by the hands of men to mark the spot where lived the lord of the town that crows the neighboring mountain, now looking like the ruins of one of the old German Castle a heap of ruins, yet retaining the shape of its former rotundity and magnitude for many feet above the hight it occupies, and covered with a drapery like the Castles of old England o' Joy. Tower and monument alike.

Madame Parriera has a number of her slaves settled here at this spot; but she herself lives in a different part of the Island, in the town of St. Augustine, where she has established a Catholic Chapel, and has Priests for the conversion of the natives, and the religious education of her slaves, whose efforts to improve their morals, I should not suppose had been very efficient judging from specimens I saw on the Island at this settlement. The water is very abundant and good here, and is easily obtained from different streams which run through the many valleys that intersect the mountains at that part of the Island. The surf generally runs high at all other places on the coast, when there is any thing of a swell on the sea, but here we had no high surfs, and found no difficulty in forcing our ship's boats on the gently declining strand used for landing the boats.

There is an old fort here built by the Portuguese, which has some old honey combed swivels laid under the port holes, and I saw three Portuguese coloured soldiers, who looked as honey combed and rusted as the old swivels, and equally as dangerous to any adventurous face that might attack it. It is a lonely spot in all its uncultivated wilderness, and if touched by the hand of civilization and refinement would be the Paradise of the western African ocean; as it is now, in its natural beauties the Queen of the seas.

We left there the 12th of August and run down to the mouth of the Gaboon River, where we again came to anchor off the mouth of it, some distance from it; a missionary and his wife, settled in the native town, came on board the Frigate having been brought close along side from the river by the U. S. Brig Dolphin. We remained here only a short time anchored at a considerable distance from the shore, and of this place, I know nothing except, that like the whole of the western coast of Africa it is sickly near the coast and mountainous in the interior; we saw the effect of the river on the colour of the sea extending for miles, and making its——

From thence we went to the termination of our leeward cruize this time; and about from 1500 to 1900 miles from Monrovia, we arrived there after a tedious cruize on the 21 day of Sept. We stopped there only for a few days finding no provisions scarcely, in the whole place. We saw several large buildings said to be slave factories, and I doubted whether the great pretended scarcity was not rather a ruse among the slave dealers: for there are many roads running into the interior that had the appearance of being much travelled. More slaves are said to be sent from this Port to Brazil than any other on the western coast of Africa. The Town of Cabenda is built on the declivity of a hill, and on the plain which crowns the summit of it. The hill is circular and irregular terraces forming flat surfaces for the erection of their buildings and for the formations of their yards.

Their houses are built principally of Bamboo. Posts latticed with thin bamboo, leaving small interstices for the air to circulate freely, and the rain is prevented from the outside by the porch or verandah that surrounds the house, and is covered by the same roof that covers the house. The natives here of both sexes are very dissolute and immoral in their actions. They have a manufactory, or several of them worked by their slaves in which they fabricate neat mats from the Palm leaves of various colors, which are quite neat.

In our cruize the entire crew enjoyed excellent health, and we have lost on our trip out, and while on the coast two men, one from accidentally falling from the fore Royal yard, and the other from a disease so common to every country. We have had no serious cases of disease incidental to the coast of Africa. This is to be accounted for by the attention paid to ventilating of all the lower decks of the ship by means of wind sails, which act as ventilators keeping the lower decks as cool and as pure as the upper decks, and the vigilance of the officers in having every part of the ship neat and clean as a new pin, every nuisance is removed as soon as discovered and the crew are fed on good salt provisions when we are at sea, and when we are in port they have good fresh provisions and plenty of vegetables furnished them; these are the causes why they have suffered so little on their cruize; and during their remaining in port no man is permitted if possible to be on shore after sun down; and in no contingency that can be avoided is he allowed to stay on shore of a night. I believe that it is the miasm of the shore generated during the night, proceeding from the same causes that produce the bilious diseases of the United states.

A SUB: OF THE FRIGATE.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS.
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

NOTICE.

The subscriber wishing to adjust his affairs requests all persons to whom he is indebted to present him with the amount of their claims, and he also earnestly requests those who are indebted to him to pay him forthwith that he may be enabled to pay his creditors.

H. TEAGE.

Monrovia
Sept. 29th 1846.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. OCTOBER 16 1846

IT is rumored that, the British government have sent out instructions to their Naval Commanders, to take immediate possession of Cape Mount;—and that troops are now being embarked at Sierra Leone or at some other British port for that purpose. The reason assigned for this determination of Her Majesty's Gov. ernment, is, that the Chiefs of Cape Mount, in violation of their treaty stipulations, permit the slave trade, still, to be carried on in their dominions.

Although we are as anxious as any people can possibly be, for the abolition of the accursed traffick in slaves; and would willingly tax ourselves, to assist in puting it down,—nevertheless, we cannot give our hearty concurrence to the plan now contemplated, for its suppression at that place. If the British Government take possession there, we need no longer hope, to have it form a part of the territory of Liberia—we have been sanguine, that at no distant day, we would be enabled, by fair negotiation with the chiefs of the country, to have it under the authority of our laws;—and the fact is too well known, that at whatever place we have the right to exercise our authority, the traffick in slaves cannot exist. The acquisition of the territory of Cape Mount to the British Crown, cannot in our opinion be an object of much importance to that power, as the resources of the country, are the same as those of any of the countries lying between Sierra Leone and Liberia. But the adoption of any plan, that will place this territory beyond our reach will materially cripple our operations, and confine the limits of Liberia to a space too limited in extent, for the exercise of that salutary influence which we fondly hoped to introduce among the tribes surrounding us. If the British Government have the right to take possession of Cape Mount or any other country adjoining to Liberia, for a violation of treaty stipulations in regard to the slave tade—will not that Government, if the Government of Liberia pledges itself that the slave trade shall no longer be continued in such place or places, act with that benevolence and magnanimity which ought always to characterize a great and powerful nation, make the violators of the treaties accountable to the Government of Liberia, instead of taking forcible possession of their countries, at the hazard of sheding of blood? We are supposing, that the main object of the British Government is, to destroy the slave trade, and not for the acquisition of territory,—and we further suppose, that the violation of the treaties gives the complaining party a right to the territories, of those, who refuse to comply with their treaty obligations.

We are opposed to the Africans being deprived of their lands, without a fair equivalent is paid to them, for it, and in no instance, after purchasing their lands have we ordered them to remove from it, on the contrary they have invariably been urged to remain and adopt civilized customs.

We are particularly interested about the territory of Grand Cape Mount. Twenty years ago we sent missionaries there to instruct the natives in the truths of the Gospel—they were well received and hospitably entertained—a peice of land was granted to them;—a friendly intercourse was kept up between them and the colonists, and many of their children are now living in the colony, understanding and following our customs. For more than ten years, scores of our enterprising citizens lived among them, and carried on an extensive commerce, which benefitted both parties—and but for the savage war that has raged there for more than ten years, and which has nearly depopulated the country large numbers of our citizens, would now be residing there.

Within the last week, we have had several indications of the passing off, of the rainy season, in the low muttering of thunder, and the piercing intrusion of lightning, through our windows and bed curtains. We are poor complaining mortals, and know not when we are well off. At one time, we complain for the want of rain, and when we have it, we murmer because it is too plentiful. For the last four months, we have been grumbling, most unmercifully, because of the continual rain. It is said, that in no one year, in the last ten years, have we had as much rain as in this year. The interior traders have, in consequence, been prevented from coming down with bullocks, which will account for the present scarcity of fresh beef.

On Monday last the Schooner "Pearl" and the Cutter "Eliza Frances" in attempting to come into the river, grounded on the bar;—the Pedler grounded first —and strange to say, that the Eliza Francis then some two hundred yards from the bar, instead of putting back, continued to come on, and grounded within a few yards of the Pedler. It was ebb tide, and as the Francis draws but little water, she was soon got off, without damage:—not so with the Pedler; she remained on the bar 'till Wednesday, when through the kindness of Captain John Pope of the U. S. Brig Dolphin she was relieved from her perilous condition without having sustained any material injury.

Our Annual Election took place on Tuesday last,—there was not as much excitement as we had anticipated—considerable anxiety was however, manifested, as to the qualifications of some of those who were in nomination; as it is supposed by many that the duty of preparing the constitution will devolve on the legislature. We are not of this opinion;—we feel quite confident, that the people will, by their votes on the 27th inst: determine for a convention.

Two young gentlemen of our town, of respectable attainments, for the first time, entered the field as candidates for the legislature:—their friends used every exertion to elect them—but the older heads thought it advisable that they should not be. They must not be discouraged—if their aim is, to be of service to their country, they will continue to prepare themselves for the service.

We learn, that on Tuesday last at New Georgia, quite a fray took place between some dozen or more of the Congoes by the "Pons" and a number of the inhabitants, (Ebos) of that place. We are not in possession of the facts, but we believe from what we have heard, that the Congoes were the aggressors; be that as it may, they were the conquerors. They fought with sticks and clubs, and some of both parties it is said, are well bruised—none of them seriously injured.

ANNEXATION. We present our readers in the colony with the following very pleasing intelligence:

"Married in Alexandria on evening last, July 25th, by the Rev. Jno. Guest, Dr. J. W. Lugenbeel, physician to the Colony of Liberia, to Miss Martha Alice Abercrombie of the former place."

We must be permitted to offer the Doctor our editorial congratulations on this happy result of his visit to America.—Africa's Luminary.

We extract with pleasure the above notice, nevertheless, we consider ourself ill used by the Doctor, in not allowing us the pleasure of partaking with him, on the occasion, a slice of cake. We will not complain, however, but earnestly wish for him and his Lady all possible happiness, feeling confident that he will follow the Divine command; "Be fruitful and multiply."

NAVAL.

October 3. Arrived the French Brig of War "Comete"——from the windward—left the next day.

Oct. 4. The United States Brig "Dolphin" Commander John Pope, from a cruise to the leeward coast—all well.

Oct. 5. The French Schooner of War——from leeward—left on the 8th for the windward.

Oct. 7. The French Schooner of War "Hirondelle" from the windward—left the next day.

LIST OF OFFICERS OF THE U. STAES BRIG DOLPHIN.

The United States Brig Dolphin arrived at this place from a cruse to the leeward on the 1st inst., Officers and crew all well. The following is a list of her officers:—

John Pope commander.
Daniel F. Dulany First Lieutenant,
Luther B. Avery Second Lieut.
Abner Read, Master.
John T. Mason, Doctor.
John O'Means, Acting Purser.
William F. Spicer, Passed Midshipman.
C. Parker Jones, Midshipman.
A. Vanden Huvel Captains Clerk.
All well bound to the windward.

NOTICE.

NEW GOODS, Flour, Pork, Beef, Tobacco and Blue Baffs, for sale. American and foreign dry goods, both staple and fancy, varied by and with every modern improvement, in price quality and fashion. The same may be said of lots of bonnets and shoes, &c. &c. &c. too tedious to mention. The above named assortment was purchased for cash, and therefore will be only sold for cash or produce down on the nail on the fairest terms.

EDWARD J. ROYE.

Monrovia June 10th 1846.

RECRIMINATION.

IT proceeds rather from revenge than malice, when we hear a man affirm that all the world are knaves. For, before a man draws this conclusion of the world, the world has usually anticipated him, and concluded all this of him who makes the observation. Such men may be compared to the enthusiastic prophet, who, on being asked by a friend how he came to be clapped up into Bedlam, replied "I and the world happened to have a slight difference in opinion; the world said I was mad, and I said the world was mad; I was outvoted, and here I am."—Cabinet of Extracts.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

ALLIGATOR OIL.—A letter from St. Augustine dated April 12th, says:—

"I suppose you may not have heard that we have discovered the utility of alligators. An alligator is found to be as valuable in this way as a spermaceti whale. An expedition has left this place for the river of St. John's, and the dark tributary stream of black Creek, swarming with these hideous creatures, with the view of killing them to obtain their oil.

"The oil of the alligator is said to be better for lamps than even whale oil, and it is extracted from the animal in considerable quantity and without any great difficulty. For this discovery we are indebted to the indians, who have been in the habit, for how long a time I know not, of extracting the oil of the alligator and using it for various purposes. It makes a fine transparant fluid and burns admirably.

"You know how many of these enormous animals are shot out of wantonness from the decks of the steamboats that plough our waters. I expect hereafter to hear of laws passed for their protection. Every time an alligator of eighteen feet long is shot in the long grass of the river banks, or while he is swimming, a barrel or half a barrel of oil is wasted. This should not be. We must allow them to be killed only at the proper season, when they are fattest, and not permit their destruction at the season when they lay their eggs.

"The alligator is a formidable looking creature, it is true, but he is generally harmless. His office is to prowl in the sluggish waters of this southern region, pick up what he can, and digest it into excellent oil for the illumination of our houses. Alligators will hereafter esteemed as useful animals as pigs—perhaps more so, for their keeping costs nothing. The danger is that, now that the world has discovered what they are good for, their race will be exterminated."—Evening Post.

Electioneering Anecdote.—A good story is told of a Mississippi candidate for Congress, showing; we suppose, that as in war, "all is fair in politics, as Maj. Noah in fact contends. The story is of two opposing rivals for Congressional honours, at present canvassing the same district. One of them—the one of whom the joke is particularly told—is said to be a perfect "wheel-horse" in the way of stump-speaking, throwing in the "big licks," telling "long yarns," &c.

The other is represented as a gentleman of great refinement, and completely fascinating every one with the suavity of his manners and the friendliness and familiarty of his address; in fact, in individual electioneering, he is "hard to beat." At this game he was rather getting ahead of his stump-speaking rival travelling all over the district, and stopping everybody he met and having a long friendly chat. His opponent became aware of all that was going on, and being convinced that he could not stand the silent and secret electioneering of his friend resolved on the following way of checking his influence.

While riding along one day ahead of his rival about a quarter of a mile, he met a tall, verdant-looking son of the soil, leading an ox, and accosted him thus:—'Good morning, friend; about a quarter of a mile back you will meet with a middle-sized, middle-aged man, riding a bald-faced, sorrel horse. I wish you to avoid speaking to him, and to give him the road, He is very crazy, and imagines that he is really a candidate for Congress, and if you talk to or question him at all on the subject, he becomes perfectly furious, and even dangerous. I have him in charge, and do hope; my friend that you will yield him the road, and have no conversation with him, whatever." In due time the countryman met with the "middle-sized man," and, as the latter was about addressing him with the greatest politeness imaginable, he scampered off into the bushes, leaving ox and all like a quarter horse.—N. Y. Herald.

Grog by the yard.—A grog dealer in Staggersville, in order to avoid the license laws, retails liquor by the yard, in long tin tubes, instead of the glass! It is calculated that a yard and a half will lay a man in the gutter.—Brother Jonathan.

A DOMESTIC HINT.—Some body—that voluminous, author, writes thus—'The best way with women is to keep them well loved all the time. Woman can never be satisfied unless she is loved half to death. Keep her mouth stopped with kisses, and she cannot scold.'—Now we do not pretend to any personal experience in these matters, but it certainly occurs to us, for the disease of scolding, this prescription is perfect sugar coated pill, and children of all ages will 'cry for them.—The Norwick News.

A GUANO MUMMY.—In the recent excavation at Ichaboe, a second mummy was found, which was brought to England. The body is that of a full grown man enclosed in a coffin which is yet perfectly entire, as also the trowsers and shirt of the deceased the former of duck and the latter of cotton, both of which on being tried, retained all the strength of the new fabric. The body itself, says an account in a London paper seems as if it were tanned leather; the flesh also become in a great measure absorbed with all the softer animal tissues; but the muscular developement remains firm, and the veins and tendons of the extremities are curiously shown stretched over the bones. The teeth are still white and sound; and the hair still curls on the head. The color of the body is a dark brown and the whole exhibition is an interesting one. It is supposed to have been the mate of a ship, buried more than a century ago as some records prove.

NOVEL READING.—"So long as the slightest shade of uncertainty rests upon a question we are not fond of dogmatizing; but there is at least, one deliverance from works of fiction, in the safety and soundness of which we feel altogether confident. Did we hear of any one acquaintance who had now bidden his conclusive adieu to them all, we should not have the slightest apprehension, lest either the moral or intellectual of his nature should at all suffer by it. Did we hear of him on the other hand had much and greedily addicted to the perusal of them we should tremble for the deterioration of both." Dr. Chalmer.

From the Living Age.

TWO SUNDAYS IN JERUSALEM

Jerusalem, June 3d, 1844.

DEAR SIR,—I can truly say that I never passed the great festivals of Whitsuntide and Trinity with higher pleasure than in the Holy City. None. I am sure, could behold unmoved the congregation wending their way to the little church; and when there, it is delightful to remark the extreme order and devotion with which the service is conducted. The singing is solemn, and the responses fervent. Collected from the East and West, the North and South, both Jew and Gentiles, descendants of Abraham after the flesh, and his children by faith, are here seen, side by side, worshipping the God of their fathers, and adoring Him of whom Moses and the prophets wrote. Whitsunday was rendered doubly interesting from the confirmation of three converted Israelites—one female and two males. One of the latter is a remarkably fine-looking Jew, with a most thoughtful countenance, whose stability has stood a severe test during a trying persecution. He retains his oriental costume, and was of course obliged to remove his turban during the imposition of hands. This is scarcely ever done, since in these countries, after the command of Moses, "they take their shoes from off their feet, when the ground on which they stand is holy." He has lately opened a small depot for Hebrew and German Bibles and prayer-books, and has met with most unexpected success. Yesterday (Trinity Sunday) I witnessed the ordination of two deacons, who have been for a while at Safet as missionaries to the Jews. They are devoted and zealous men, and moreover, as I learn, passed a most satisfactory examination for orders, which lasted three days. I need hardly say that the greatest solemnity pervaded the whole service; and the feeling was deepened at the recollection that from this spot, more than 1800 years ago, our blessed Lord sent forth his missionaries to preach to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Mr. Veitch, the chaplain, preached a most appropriate sermon from the last two verses in St. Matthew—which supplied matter alike belonging to Trinity Sunday and to the impressive service in which we were engaged. I thought these particulars might not be without interest to the readers of the Christian Observer. It has really been a most refreshing season here. Every morning, at seven, there is service in Hebrew, and every afternoon in English; and on Sunday afternoon in German. In haste, believe me, dear sir, truly yours,

VIATOR.

A NOVEL QUESTION—A novel question has grown out of the election for Clerk of the County Court of Mobile county, which may lead to much litigation hereafter.—The case as we understand it, is in substance, as follows:—Mr. E. Rust was elected at the late election, by a very small majority over the late incumbent, and obtained from the Sheriff of the county a certificate of his election, duly authenticated. Mr. Thompson, the late incumbent, notified the Judge of the County Court that he contested the election; and the Judge refuses to approve Mr. Rust's bond, because he has not prima facie evidence of Mr. Rust's election. The Judge of the Circuit Court is absent from the State, and he, according to the construction given to the act of 1840, by our Supreme Court, in the case of Womack v Holloway, exercises sole supervision of the election in its present stage. The late incumbent is barred from transacting any official business, and the country, therefore has no legal officer. We are not very learned in the law, but it is clear to our mind, that the best evidence of an election is a Sheriff's certificate. Up to the granting of a certificate of election, a Sheriff is certainly the principal supervisor of the election: when the authority passes out of him it vests in the Judge of the Circuit Court, in case of a contested election, as this election is; and the only duty of a County Court Judge, as it seems to us, is, upon presentation of a Sheriff's certificate, where bonds are necessary, either to accept or reject them. Judge Cuthbert, however, does not appear to entertain this opinion, and the result is, the legal functions of the County Court of Mobile are at an end for the present.—Tuscaloosa Flag.

MORE ON BANKS.—The locofoco legislature of 1836, chartered a monster state bank, with a capital of two millions of dollars. Mr. Felch, a bank commissioner, recommended the creation of this bank. Mr. Greenly, as a member of the legislature, voted throughout for the bill chartering it. The bill passed, but the panthing luckily proved still born. And now, two of the fathers of this two million monster, are the anti-bank candidates for Governor! What a humbug is locofocoism!—Detroit Advertiser.

BATH FOR THE POOR.

A MEETING has been held at the Mansion house and an association has been formed to establish baths and wash-houses for the poor of London; with the Bishop of London for president, a lord mayor and a Rothschild among the trustees. It is therefore tolerably certain that the project will be realized in a tangible shape, and personal cleanliness will be placed within the reach of the poor. Such establishments have already been provided in Liverpool, and steps have been taken in other large towns. Should they succeed,—that is, should they prove to be self-supporting in point of cost, and should they really be used by the poor as well as other classes,—they will probably extend with great rapidity, and may eventually become parochial institutions. For the lowest possible charge, the bather will have the use of a private bath and of hot and cold water at pleasure; and the washer of clothes will have the use of a private bath and of hot and cold water at pleasure, and the washer of clothes will have hot water and a place for drying, for six hours, for a penny! We presume that there is no intention of ultimately retaining these places for the exclusive use of "the poor;" cleanliness is a virtue that might be usefully extended to other classes not strictly within the category; and there would be an advantage even to the poor in their sharing a public convenience of the kind with other classes—it would redeem it from all aspect of a charity. If it could be self-supporting at a low charge, the public bath and wash-house might be open to every class—the middle-class bather, the trading laundress, the housewife—all. Meanwhile, the importation; of cleanliness into the region of "the Great Unwashed" is likely to work a great social and political change; dirt and cleanliness are two of the most tangible shapes of Evil and Good, a discrimination of which is the real source of self-control. The cleanly man must have tastes, hopes, and dislikes, that preserve him from debasements to which the dirty man is prone; and there is no police so efficient as the making every man his own policeman.—Spectator

THE subscription, we see, for supplying the poorer classes with baths and wash-houses goes on bravely. It has taken too firm a ground to be injured by the doubts which have been suggested. The main objections are two. It is said that the poor will not use the wash-houses, because they will be ashamed to expose their scanty and bad clothing. That sentiment may deter many from a real benefit; but the intolerable evils of home-washing, and the oppressive sense of them felt by the sufferers, will urge most to seek relief at any cost of feeling. The other objection is that the project is no cure for that hunger which is the master grievance of the poor; a pseudo Comeso writer in the Times this morning sneers at those who give the poor "hot water" when they ask for bread. It is very desirable that the poor should have bread; but the supply of bread-stuffs, so far as it can be regulated by active interference is involved in questions of great national policy, which cannot be determined merely at the will of a committee of private gentlemen; whereas "hot water" and room for washing need wait on no delays of statecraft. Shall we then arrest the remedy of this positive evil until all are cured? Before we hesitate to make one affliction the less, it must be shown that energy or money is actually diverted from higher enterprises.—Spectator.

DIED,

In this Town, on the 24th ult., Mr. Charles Washington, after a severe illness of about four days. Mr. W. was a member of the Baptist Church in this place. We have all reason to believe that after all his sufferings here, he is gone to reap his reward at God's right hand. He died singing in the triumph of faith.—Comm.

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Oct 1. Bremen brig——,——master from the windward.

" 6. Col. sloop Star, Atkins master, from the leeward: Passenger, from Cape Palmas, Mr. John Banks.

" " American barque Montgomery,——master, from New York.

" 11. Col. Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, from the leeward.

" " Col. schooner Pedler, G. E. Carroll master, from the leeward.

" 15. H. M. C. M. Schooner Hirondelle, ——Commander, from the windward.

" " American schooner Boston, Ludington master, from Grand Bassa.

" " American Brig Smithfield, William Duff master, from Providence Island

" " Col. sloop Nathan Bangs, G. Ammons master, from the leeward.

" " Col. sloop Perseverance, Jones master, from Grand Bassa.

DEPARTURES.

Oct. 6. Col. sloop Perseverance, Jones master, for the leeward.

" 8. Bremen brig——,——master, for the leeward: Passengers, to Cape Palmas, Rev. J. B. Benham and lady, and Mrs. Ann Wilkins.

" " American schooner Boston, Ludington master, for the leeward.

" 9. French brig——,——master for the leeward.

" 14. U. S. Brig Dolphin, John Pope Esq. commander, to Porto Praya.

" 13. American barque Montgomery,——master, for the leeward.

POETRY.

Original.

THE ORIGIN OF THE ALBUM.

BY JONAS B. PHILPS.

'Tis said that a Spirit of beauty and light
Once vow'd over earth she would merrily roam;
Then spreading her pinions all glittering bright
Clear'd the air in her Ancilful search of home.

Away over mountain and valley she sped
Until a fair garden first bloom'd on her sight.
Where flowers their odors ambrosial spread,
Her senses to charm and her vision delight.

"Who dwells in this scene of enchantment," she cried;
When a form of dignity rose to her view,
And presenting a garland fresh-gather'd, replied
"'Tis Poesy, sends this sweet tribute to you.'

The Spirit then roam'd thro' the bowers and groves,
Where Music and Minstrelsy lighten'd the hours:
Till again on light wing, thro' the ether she roves,
From Poetry's garden of sunshine and flowers.

Next to groves where Antiquity's sages repos'd,
Away the gay spirit, then rapidly flew,
Where the legends and learning of old were disclos'd
And mentally mirror'd, the Past did she view.

Then soaring again, thro' the ambient air,
To the Bowers of Fancy, she hastened her flight,
And listen'd enchanted while reveling there,
To legends of love, and the war-tales of knight.

Again were her pinions outspread to the air,
When a spirit angelic, enchanted her sight;
Her wings were of azure and golden her hair,
And her brow was encircled with halos of light.

Addressing the wandering Spirit, she said,
"I am Friendship,—o heaven divine, is my birth,
So quickly thy wings on the ether outspread,
And hasten for me, on a mission to earth.

"Take this volume, whose pages unsullied and white
Are emblems of Innocence, Virtue and Youth;
And here bid my votaries faithfully write
Their tributes, to friendship, Affection and Truth."

"I'll obey," then the Spirit of beauty replied,
And already I've garlands to hang on the shrine,
For the gifts I have gather'd I'll gladly divide
And each shall appear on these pages divine."

"'Tis well," answered Friendship as swiftly to earth,
Her messenger flew with the volume of youth;
Affection's own tribute, to virtue and worth,
And the Spirit that lights it, the Spirit of Truth.

MISCELLANEOUS

From the Virginia Republican.

THE MARRIAGEABLE MAN.

BY HOMER.

"I'll set my cap for him."

What an enviable personage is the marriageable man! He lives in an atmosphere of smiles. He walks in the sunshine of love; and flowers grateful to the eye, and fragrant to the smell, spring up along his path. A thousand radiant eyes, with much of wishfulness in their gaze, are turned upon him. Whenever he may go among the other sex, he is certain of a warm welcome. His society is equally courted by the matron and the maid. The mother courts him for her daughter, whom she is desirous of seeing "well settled in the world." The daughter fixes upon her countenance a most amiable expression; imparts to her blushing cheek a stolen hue; gives prominence to features, never intended by Dame Nature to stand out "in bold relief!" borrows from some inhabitants of another sphere, a voice that cannot fail by its angelic sweetness, to captivate the marriageable man: and thus furnished and equipped for the onset, she makes a demonstration upon him. Thus enjoying the attention of the old lady and the daughter, how can he fail to be the happiest of men? And if the good graces of the mother and daughter are lavished upon him, he is sure also of that of the father and the sons. Indeed, all are his friends. From the old grandmama, who smokes her pipe in one corner, to her cotemporary, the tabby cat, who washes her face in the other. Why really, he must be a very modest man, not to feel himself more at home in the house of the marriageable girl, than the master of the concern himself. Every look he gives, is met with a smile! Every word he utters is a pearl! Every joke he cracks is a sparkle of wit! Every opinion he utters, is on all hands conceded to be worthy of a Solomon!

Is he a poet! every young lady in the circle of his acquaintance, sends her Album to have him write "a piece" in her own praise. "Oh! he writes so sweetly!" say they.

"Play a tune for Mr. Meredith, Oliva," says the mother.

Olivia assumes an abashed look, glances at Mr. M. and says. "ma, I can't play before so good a judge of music."

"Yes do play, Miss Olivia, and your sisters, Miss Emma and Felicina, will sing an accompaniment."

"Oh! please excuse me, Mr. Meredith, I never sing," said Emma.

"And I too, too, I have a cold, a-hem! a-hem!" coughed Felicina.

"Come girls, none of your excuses," says the mother, rising from her seat, and standing very affectionately near Mr. Meredith, "you can all sing and play, and as Mr. M. has asked you, he must not be denied."

"Well, Olivia, commence playing," say the other two, "we'll try our best."

Mr. M. smiled to himself at the flattering thought, that the young ladies were delighted at the opportunity of playing for him, and folding his arms, straightened himself up in his chair, throwing back his head and closing his eyes, as if in the mere anticipation of the sweet strains was exercising a magnetic influence over him he listens.

The young ladies select with nice discrimination, and with touching sweetness:

Thou, Thou, reign'st in this bosom,
There, There, hast thou thy throne," &c.

And though the music lies before them on the piano, 'tis strange to see their glances wandering from it, to the face of Mr. Meredith; they are reading there, lines and notes, and bars of far deeper import; and if in the expression of his countenance they read approbation, if they see a smile playing around his manly lips, they all regard it as a sign of personal conquest! and then the trembling keys of the sweet-toned instrument vibrate more powerfully, and more meltingly; and the voice tones swell out more richly, and fade away with falsetic sweetness right into the heart of the enchanted marriageable man; and with a potency irresistable, the question, comes home to his affections, and he feels like claiming all the dear creatures as his "own" but then, it recurs to him that he can have but one, and his mind is immediately filled with sorrow in contemplating the disappointment that must necessarily ensue to those he cannot take; for he knows they all have equal hopes of him. The music ended, he expresses in enthusiastic terms his admiration; the young ladies apologise for the many defects in the execution of the piece, the mother smiles, and they all look with so much amiability upon the marriagable man, that he almost imagines himself the very essence of perfection.

"Am I not fondly thine own?"

In walks Mr. Henpeck, a worthy neighbor, blessed with a partner full his equal, and a host of "little responsibilities"—Mark the difference of the reception he meets with. No smiles encounter his gaze, the young ladies never take their eyes off the marriageable man to greet him. A cold formal "How do you do, Mr. Henpeck," is all that is said to the "man of family," whilst the man in the "market" continues to bask in a shower of smiles.—The marriageable man takes leave of the ladies. They retire to their chamber, and if the bed curtains could be endowed with the power of those who wield the "gray goose quill," they might "a tale unfold," of warm disputation, as to the strongest claim of each respective lady, for empire over the heart of the marriageable man. We know not that the loss of much hair would be reported, but the spilling of many words; the absence of certain tender intonations of the voice intended for the edification of the marriageable man; the laying aside of particular expressive emotions, only exhibited for his benefit, and the disrobing of some extra appandages, worn for the eye of Mr. Meredith, would certainly be disclosed

Oh! the marriageable man, how enviable his lot! What a sceptre he wields! What an influence he exerts. How exquisite in the estimation of the other sex, how genteel in deportment! What lady could help loving him? Is he a preacher? What crowds of the other sex, perceive his powers of oratory, and flock to hear his ministrations? Is he a lawyer? He advises his client with so much grace, and sympathy and elegance! Is he a merchant? He selects his goods with such exquisite taste, and is so very polite. He bears with patience any amount of "jewing" without a murmer. He pulls down half the goods in his store, and after assuring me of every article that it is the finest, and handsomest and cheapest in the city; if I only buy a fip-penny-bit spool of cotton, or a row of pins, he smiles complacently and seems to be fully rewarded for the revolution of silks and calicoes which has taken place, and if I speak of the tumbling I have caused his goods, with such a winning smile, "Oh, it is no trouble at all Miss, it's in my line of business"

Oh, the marriageable men are nice things and so are the marriageable women.

But let us look at him, after he is "snapt up." Is he the same paragon of excellence? The same patron of every noble principle, and manly virtue? Is his name the theme of female conversation, around every tea-table? Are the ladies all asking each other, "when did you see Mr Meredith? how does he look? whose pew did he sit in on last Sunday night?" &c. No, no! He scarcely gets out of wedding-hood, before he is doomed to forgetfulness. And if the ladies meet him they look at him with an every-day look, and speak to him with a voice of their own, and not the borrowed look, and voice, which meet him when a marriageable man!

"Oh, ye marriageable men, if you wish to lose your influence and be robbed of your popularity among the young ladies—get married. Get married—and the sunny rays which now from many bright eyes light upon your path, will be eclipsed! Get married, and the blooming flowers, which here and there smile upon you, will wither and shrink away from you! Get marrie; but the joys that matrimony will substitute for the bliss you may lose; we will not declare to you so long as you are a "Marriageable man!"

THE WIND—BY PHAZMA.

A child once said to its father as it felt the play of the morning breeze through its waving ringlets, 'Father, where does the wind come from?'

'From Heaven,' said the father.

'And where does it go to?'

'It goes back to Heaven again, my child, and again to Earth returns. It is the breath of the Great Spirit of benificence, from whom we receive all happiness and all joy. Changing seasons are ordained to make the Earth happy and beautiful for us, and then we are breathed upon as is most conducive to our good. Have you not sometimes wished it would be always summer?'

'Yes, father.'

'And at another time sighed that winter ware not always?'

'Yes, father.'

'Then you must see that the ruler of the seasons knows better than yourself what is best for you, as your own wishes were inconsistent.'

'Yes, father; I see now.'

'The wind, my dear son—the far-forming spirit of the wide universe—is ever near us and hovering o'er us. It kisses the sick man's temple, and the suffering invalid lifts up his eyes in hope. It plays with the breathing of the sinless infant, and weaves smiles on its dimpled cheek. It is the essence of life and breath, and you, my boy, are now inhaling it. You know you did not make it, yet you feel that it is necessary for your very life, that without you would fall down and expire; then, where does the wind come from, son?'

'From Heaven, father.'

'Yes from Heaven; and it comes to bless the Earth. Were there no wind, my son, this beautiful world would be a void and stagnant waste and your arched sky, now so magnificently adorned by the rising sun, would change to some wild and strange confusion.'

'Does not the wind whisper, father?"

'Yes, child; you may learn to converse with it, and it shall tell of its errand on Earth. Pause when the lonely airs are calling stilly music from leaf and bough in a summer even-time, watch as the stars peep forth, and the wind shall whisper to your heart of Heaven.'

'Does not the wind howl, father?'

'Yes, boy; and then it tells the grandeur and the might of Omnipotence. If you have learned to joy in its balmy breathing, you must also know the great strength and glory of the wind. Is it not wonderful, my son? Even as this infant rivulet beneath us (upon which that dancing sunbeam has just alighted piercing the leafy forest shade above,) rolls on and on, miles, leagues, and far away, still swelling, rising, deepening, until it plunges into the vast desert of water that rolls around the globe, so can this gentle west wind now so soft, rouse into louder voice start into rage and terror and fright the land and lash the ocean with the tornado's wild and shrieking angel.'

'It is wonderful, father!'

'And it is wise, my son; and we must believe, though we may not understand why it is so. Yes; the wind, now sporting with the leaves around, may tear these rooted trees from the firm earth, drive them like feathers along the land, dash off the mountain cone, and whirl it into the vale, prostrate cities, and turn the course of seas! It is wonderful!'

'Wonderful, father!'

'Then, where does the wind come from, my son!'

'From Heaven, father!'—V. Republican.

DESPOSITION AND EXCOMMUNICATION.

At a meeting of the Presbytery of Newark N. J., held on the 10th inst., charges were preferred against Nathaniel E. Johnson of unministerial and unchristian conduct.

1st. In the use of intoxicating drinks to the extent of actual drunkenness

2d. In attending the Theatre in the city of New-York at several different times, under circumstances of peculiar aggravation.

3d. Of gross licentiousness.

Mr. Johnson having expressed his desire to forego the formalities of a regular process of trial, and having pleaded guilty to each of the charges above specified, the Presbytery resolved, unanimously, that he be deposed from the office of the gospel ministry and excommunicated from the communion of the Christian church.

E. SEYMOUR, S. Clerk.

The above will be received with astonishment and pain by the Christian public. The individual whose melancholly fall is thus officially announced, was formerly known as Editor of the New York Evangelist, and his views on the great moral questions of the day have therefore been fully given to the world. For some time past he has had a pastorial charge in the State of New-Jersey. We feel that it is proper for us in recording the deposition of this individual, to refer briefly to some facts in the history of the case that will be of value to those who are accustomed to look seriously into the causes and relations of such deplorable events.

1. He has been distinguished for many years as a leader in those measures which we mentioned last week as tending almost universally to corrupt the moral sensibilties of those engaged in them. In the pulpit, on the platform, and in the press, he has been one of the loudest in their advocacy, while those who have sought more judicious and scriptural means to promote moral reforms, have been denounced as behind the age.

2. During a long series of years, he has been living in the most abandoned licentiousness, frequenting the brothels of the city, and indulging freely in the most loathsome vice. The history of this case can never be written, and we refer to these painful facts, only that we may place before our readers one of the most awful warnings that the annals of apostacy have ever furnished.

3. He is unable to refer to the period when he first fell into profligate vice, so gradual has been his course through the various stages of his apostacy. Indulging in the perusal of licentious books, neglecting the private duties of a Christian, giving scope to an erratic fancy, dallying with temptation, making occasional and afterwards free use of intoxicating drinks, visiting places of amusement where Christians should never be found, and afterwards haunts where the foulest vice and the deepest shame seek a hiding place and home, he has gone down step by step to the very lowest depths of degredation crushing the hearts of his family, blasting the happiness of those who looked up to him as an example and guide, filling the church with amazement and grief, and the world with new occasion for reproach and scorn. In this allusion to some of the points only, in this painful case, the reader may find a solemn lesson of admonition for himself. The neglect of the closet, the indulgence of wandering desires, the perusal of improper books, may be facts in the present history of some who are now reading these lines: and if there is any force in the divine words of caution, "let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall," the record we have now made must give to it a pungency and solemnity that no preaching can increase.—N. Y. Observer.

THE WAY TO ESCAPE MANY OF THE HARD THUMPS OF LIFE.

YOU mention your being in your seventy-eighth year; I am in my seventy-ninth. We are grown old together. It is now more than six years since I left Boston; but I remember well; both your father and grandfather, having heard them both in the pulpit, and seen them in their houses. The last time I saw your father, was in the beginning of 1724 when I visited him, after my first trip to Pennsylvania. He received me in his library; and on my taking leave, showed me a shorter way out of the house, through a narrow passage, which was crossed by a beam over head. We were still talking as I withdrew, he accompanying me behind, and turning partly towards him, when he said hastily, "Stoop, stoop!" I did not understand him, till I felt my head hit against the beam. He was a man who never missed an occasion of giving instruction; and upon this he said to me:—"You are young, and have the world before you:—stoop as you go through it, and you will miss many hard thumps." This advice, thus beat into my head, has frequently been of use to me; and I often think of it, when I see pride mortified, and misfortunes brought upon people by their carrying their heads too high.—Franklin.

A Shocking Bad Character.—A young woman, brought before the Boston police, alleged, in defence of her respectability, that she was acquainted with "all the lawyers in New York." She was instantly committed for six months—Bro. Johnathan.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE, EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, AND A. W. ANDERSON, ASSISTANT EDITORS.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) NOVEMBER 6 1846. NO. 2

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	REV. A. F. DAVIS,
Edina,	REV. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	MR. M. MURRAY,
Cape Palmas,	DR. S. F. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE ESQ.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	REV. JOHN B. FINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	REV. WM. MYLNE,
Norfolk	W. DE LACY ESQ.
Baltimore Md.	WM. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	REV. S. M. ALLEN,
New York,	REV. S. H. COX,
Boston,	REV. T. TALLEY,
Philadelphia,	MR. WM. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

ORIGINAL.

THE MOTHER AND DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. EMMA C. EMBURY.

"He that sits above,
In his calm glory, will forgive the love
His creatures bear each other, when 'tis blent
With a true worship."—MRS. HEMANS

"ABOUT ten years ago," said my friend, Mrs. B——, "my physicians having recommended a long sea-voyage as the most probable cure for an attack of bronchitis, my husband, who was then engaged in mercantile pursuits, fitted up a ship which he was about freighting for Calcutta, and resolved to accompany me to India. If I were to relate all my impressions during my absence, I might fill a volume, but I will content myself with narrating a single incident which occurred on our return, and which has impressed itself on my memory too deeply to be effaced by the lapse of time. When we arrived at Calcutta, my health was quite restored, and we therefore made but little delay there, as I was anxious to return to my mother, whose advanced age had forbidden her to become my companion. My husband soon disposed of the valuable cargo he had brought out, and a homeward freight having been procured, we prepared to leave Calcutta. The day before the ship was to sail, a gentleman, who announced himself as an American missionary, waited upon Mr. B., with a request that a passage might be afforded to his wife and child. As the cabin was not large, and had been appropriated solely to my use, my husband hesitated to reply till I should have been consulted, and therefore requested the gentleman to call at our abode in the afternoon. As soon as I heard of the application, however, I begged that they might be informed of my willingness to accommodate them, and I felt no small degree of pleasure in the thought of having a female companion during our long and tedious voyage.

"Early in the evening of the same day, he called on me with his wife, to express their thanks. I was exceedingly struck with the great contrast that existed between the two. The missionary was a tall, gaunt man, of some fifty years of age, with a countenance as inflexible as if moulded in iron; his hair was quite white, but thick and wiry, bristling up from his deeply-furrowed forehead as if to contrast still more strongly with his bronzed complexion. His manners were cold and stern, when I looked on him I was involuntarily reminded of one of the blasted pine trees—'wrecks of a single winter,' which sometimes rear their blighted heads amid the bright scenery of our beautiful country. His wife was one of the most delicate women, in appearance, that I have ever seen. Her age seemed not to exceed twenty years; indeed, her diminutive figure and innocent countenance, made her seem even younger. Her manner was characterized by timid gentleness, and I soon saw that she looked up to her husband with a feeling of awe, almost approaching to fear. His mode of addressing her was cold, almost rude, and her submissive meekness seemed quite unnoticed, certainly unappreciated. Our interview was not a long one, and when we parted, I could not help wondering how the surface could ever appear so indurate where the genial warmth of gospel truth had penetrated the soil of the heart.

"The next morning I was early on board the ship, and we only waited the arrival of our new passengers to set sail. They came at length, hurrying with them a pale but bright-eyed child, about four years of age. The missionary silently superintended the little arrangements necessary to their comfort, and, to my watchful eye, seemed anxiously striving to preserve the stoicism which he, perhaps, deemed a duty. He scarcely approached his weeping wife, and seemed as if about to return to the shore without exchanging a syllable with her, when she suddenly sprang forward as if to throw herself on his bosom. Whether her habitual awe overcame her, I know not, but before she reached his arms, she fell at his feet on the deck. The frame of the strong man shook with suppressed emotion as he bent and raised her to his breast. 'God bless you, Ellen,' said he, 'God bless you, and may He forgive me this bitter regret!' She raised her head and looked at him with a bewildered expression, as if she doubted whether she understood him, but the moment of softness passed away: he loosed his clasp of her slender form, and scarcely touching his lips to her forehead, turned towards his child. A second time I saw an indefinable expression of mingled anguish and remorse pass over his face, as if he reproached himself for the strength of his own affections but the love of the father overcame him, and bending on one knee beside the child, he buried his face in her bright curls, and wept like an infant. It was a fearful thing to see that iron frame shaken with sobs, and that stern countenance bowed before the weakness of a babe. A few brief moments passed, and ere the spectators of the scene could dash the tear-drops from their eyes, the missionary's boat was cutting the waves towards the shore. He never turned his head towards the ship, and though we could observe the oars-men directing his attention to our waving handkerchiefs, he remained immoveable.

"For several days Mrs. Warrender remained in her berth, too ill and too much depressed in spirits to be our companion. But her little girl, delighted with the novelty of her situation, was not to be restrained by her mother's illness. She soon crept to my side, and I welcomed her with sufficient warmth to induce her to repeat her visit, so that by the time Mrs. Warrender made her appearance in the cabin, I had already secured a fast friend in the little Lydia. She was a child of very lovely character. Ardent and impetuous in all her feelings, she had the affectionate disposition which always belongs to such a temperament. To harsh reproof, she was unmoveably haughty and inflexible, but to kind remonstrance, she was as yielding and submissive as a lamb. Possessed of great intelligence and extreme personal beauty, she soon became a general favorite. Every one in the ship loved her, and it was pleasant to notice the softened voice and merry smile with which the rudest sailor would take her on his knee and tell her a droll story, or sing her a nautical ballad. She had a remarkably happy temper, nothing seemed to fret her; life was perpetual summer to her, because her sunshine was the reflection of a pure and happy spirit.

"Mrs. Warrender was as I soon found seriously ill. Her cough was very severe, and my own opinion was, that consumption had already marked her for the grave. I was too much interested in her to remain long a stranger, and her gentle nature soon acknowledged the claims of kindness. She was one of those timid creatures who constantly require a support. She seemed to want some firmer character on which to depend; some one who might draw forth her confidence, and repay it with sympathy. Had she been called to mingle much in society, this very peculiarity might have made her indiscreet, but in her present circumstances, it only added to the graceful tenderness of her manner. It was not long before she confided to me her simple story. Many of the details, however, which enabled me fully to comprehend her history I learned in after times, from a member of her own family. These I shall combine in one connected sketch, so as to enable you to understand at once that which it cost me many weeks to decipher.

"Ellen Talbot was the daughter of one who was enthusiastically devoted to the missionary cause. He had frequently expressed his regret that his conviction of the importance of the cause had come so late in life that his duties as a husband and father forbade him to take up the Cross and travel into the wastes of Heathen darkness. From her earliest childhood, Ellen had been accustomed to hear her father avow his determination to educate his sons for missionaries, and his daughters for wives to such heralds of the gospel. She had learned to think that such was her vocation, long before girls usually form plans for futurity, and the romance which belongs in a greater or less degree to the character of every woman, in her, assumed the flattering guise of self-devotedness. Her piety was sincere, her faith undoubting, but she gave herself up to a life of hardship with the same kind of feeling which in other lands, induces the followers of another creed to sacrifice themselves to the cloister. Hers was not a clear conviction of duty, such as should alone influence the missionary to set himself to his great task. It was a fervid dream of romantic self-devotion; a girlish zeal to make a great sacrifice of personal advantages.

"Far be it from me to rebuke the fervor of the missionary. The woman who, strong in the conviction of duty, and relying on the promise that, 'as her day is, so shall her strength be,' abandons the refinements of civilized society and the endearments of home, to traverse the desert in the cause of Christ, is indeed a light set on a hill which cannot be hid'. If ever the nations of the earth are to be gathered into one fold—if ever the islands of the far seas are to sing the praises of Redeeming love, it will be through the influence of the weaker no less than the harder sex. The arm of man may wield the lightnings of gospel truth—the tongue of man utter the thunders of gospel eloquence, but it is the hand of woman which must drop the manna of Christian charity over the trackless wilderness of Heathenism. Yet she must not be led forward by the ignis fatuus of a romantic temper—a will o'the wisp, engendered by the vapors of a heated imagination. She must be urged to her high task by a clear sense of duty—Religion must be the cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, to guide her steps—she must have fortitude to suffer, as well as energy to act, and above all, her dependence must be not upon an arm of flesh, but upon the God of her fathers, whose work she has undertaken to do.

"Such was not the case with Ellen Talbot. Sincere, but misjudging, her home seemed to her quite too limited a sphere, and measuring her duties rather by her zeal than her capacities, she forgot that God never placed mortals in a field so narrow that it may not be sown with good seed and give back a rich harvest.

"She was about sixteen when she first met with Mr. Warrender. Her father's well-known piety rendered his house a favorite resort for Christians of all denominations especially those engaged in missions, and among others, Mr. Warrender came to spend a few weeks with him previous to departing for India. He was a widower, of perhaps forty-five years of age, cold, stately, even stern in his manner, and ascetic in all his habits. He was well aware of the need of woman's gentle ministry to aid him in his toilsome task, and Ellen's zeal in the cause her gentleness of deportment, and her extreme youth, which he deemed would enable her to acquire the language of the country with great facility were his inducements to select her. Of mere earthly affection he did not dream. His heart, like the lava of Vesuvius, had hardened over the ashes of his early love, and no second city of the affections could ever now arise upon the indurated soil.

"In youth, he had possessed very strong passions, & his whole life had been a struggle between right and wrong. At an early age he had formed an attachment to a lady several years his senior, and this passion soon swallowed up all the rest. Yet, even the sweetest founts of tenderness became, in his bosom, like the bitter waters of Marah. The object of his affection, a high-minded, noble-hearted woman, had sacrificed all her worldly prospects to wed the humble missionary, and in the endeavor to repay her for such love, he gave his heart up to the most idolatrous worship of her. 'Thou shalt have no other gods before me,' was the awful command upon Mount Sinai, and fearfully was the denunciation against idolatry brought home to the unhappy man. After eight years of wedded happiness, and partially successful labors among the western Indians, he one day returned from a visit of duty into the interior of the country, only to find his log cabin a heap of ruins, and to rake from its smouldering ashes the bones of his wife and little ones. A brother missionary had accompanied him on his return, and through his care, Mr. Warrender was brought back to civilized life, but many months elapsed after this dreadful calamity, ere his mind recovered its healthy tone. When he reappeared to resume his missionary labors, every one noticed the change that had taken place in him. From an ardent, impetuous, affectionate pleader with souls, he had now become cold in manner, rigid in principle, severe in admonition, and apparently, unmoved by the ordinary affections of humanity.

"Such was the husband of the timid, sensitive girl, who had lived but in the atmosphere of kindness and who was now to wither like a delicate exotic transplanted to a wintry clime. It is strange to observe how different are the results which a vivifying sense of religion produces in different hearts. If I might compare the internal with the external world, I should say it is like a tropical sun, in some places softening the soil and bringing forth fruit and flowers in rich profusion, while in others, it hardens the rock even while it is maturing the rich gems which lie within earth's bosom. Ellen's religion was one of love, her husband's seemed more allied to fear. To her, the enjoyment of God's gifts seemed an acceptable homage to His bounty—to her husband, it seemed a species of sacrilege. In her innocent gladness of temper, she looked upon this world as a scene of probation, where earth's pleasures were to be proved no less than its sufferings—while he regarded it a place cursed for the disobedience of man, whose delights were as so many poisonous plants, deadly to the soul. The tenderness which he felt growing up in his heart towards his wife and daughter, startled him from his fancied security against earthly enjoyments, and he pent many an hour restling with the new temptation which he felt to be assailing him lest the curse of idolatry should again wither his gourd.

"Mr. Warrender had met with all the success which could reasonably have been expected. The field of his labors required careful and diligent culture, while he too often found the tares springing up to choke the good seed. His wife ministered to the bodily necessities of the suffering and destitute, but her courage failed, and the spirit of self-distrust and doubt took possession of her when she sought to enlighten the benighted minds. She was a kind, tender and loving woman' but she lacked the strong intellect, the moral courage, and the firm faith of the missionary. The consciousness that she had overrated her powers—the thought that she was occupying a place which others might fill far more worthily, and the total want of sympathy or support in her husband, all contributed to depress her spirits and undermine her health. But the tenderness of her nature became centred in her child and when that darling little one began to droop beneath the sultry clime, the mother's terrors overpowered all other feelings. She knew that she had not the faith which supported the high-hearted Mrs. Judson, when, after laying her only child in its solitary grave, she uttered those sublime and thrilling words, 'God grant that the sacrifice may not have been made in vain.' How many a heart has responded to those words when in sorrow and bereavement it ponderd over the remembrance of the lovely and the lost.

"While we were yet in the warm latitudes, we were becalmed for nearly a week. The sky was like burnished copper, and the sea like molten brass. Not a breeze stirred, not a ripple move on the face of the waters, all was one breathless calm. We dared not venture on deck during the day, for the rays of the sun were absolutely scorching, and when night came on, the langor and oppression which we suffered, scarcely allowed us to benefit by its freshness. One day, little Lydia who felt the restraint of confinement to the cabin more than any of us, contrived to slip away from us unperceived. Her mother, who was lying in her berth exhausted with the intense heat, supposed the child was with me and I thought she was asleep beside her mother. She was absent perhaps an hour, when the mate entered the cabin bearing her in his arms. She had stole upon deck, and after vainly endeavoring to rouse Cato, the dog, to a game of romp, had lain down beside him and dropped asleep. She had not been long there when she was discovered; but she had slept beneath that burning sun, and her flushed cheek showed its fearful power.

"From that hour the sweet child never held up her head. She had received what the sailors call a sunstroke. For a long time her mother seemed unable to realize the extent of her danger, though she sat beside her moistening her parched lips and listening to her incoherent murmuring. But I shall never forget the moment when she was first made aware of the threatened blow. I shall never forget the look of wild despair—her cry of agony and the sudden bending of her knee while she uttered a brief but solemn prayer. From that moment she relinquished all hope, and with a countenance calm but ever stained with tears she bent over the fair creature's couch. 'I will not murmur, but I may surely weep,' she replied, to my attempts at consolation.

"For three days the little girl lay almost insensible; on the evening of the fourth she awoke to perfect consciousness; a prelude' as I knew too well, of coming death. 'Mother why do you cry?' said she, as she looked up into her face.

'Because I fear you are going to leave me darling, said the mother, supressing her emotion.

'I would cry, too, if you were to leave me, mother,' said the child.

'But, dearest,' said Mrs. Warrender, 'if you leave me you will go to Heaven,' and she said this to discover whether she was aware of her situation.

'I know it mother, but I want you to go with me.'

(To be Continued.)

From the New-York Tribune.

MISTRESS OF HERSELF, THOUGH CHINA FALL.

Woman, in general, are indignant that the satirist should have made this the climax to praise of a woman. And yet, we fear, he saw only too truly.—What unexpected failures have we seen, literally, in this respect! How often did the Martha blur the Mary out of the face of a lovely woman at the sound of a crash amid glass and porcelian! What sad littleness in all the department thus represented! Obtrusion of the mop and duster on the tranquil meditations of a husband and brother. Impatience if the carpet be defaced by the feet even of cherished friends!

There is a beautiful side and a good reason here; but why must the beauty degenerate and give place to meanness!

To Woman the care of home is confined. It is the sanctuary of which she should be the guardian angel. To all elements that are introduced there she should be the "ordering mind." She represents the spirit of beauty, and her influence should be spring-like, clothing all objects within her sphere with lively, fresh and tender hues. She represents purity, and all that appertains to her should be kept delicately pure. She is modesty, and draperies should soften all rude lineaments, and exclude glare and dust. She is harmony, and all objects should be in their places, ready for and matched to their uses.

We all feel that there is a substantial reason for the offence we feel at defect in any of these ways. A woman who wants purity, modesty, and harmony in her dress and manners is insufferable—one who wants them in the arrangements of her house disagreeable, to every one. She neglects the most obvious ways of expressing what we desire to see in her, and the inference is ready that the inward sense is wanting.

It is with no merely gross and selfish feeling that all men commend the good housekeeper, the good nurse. Neither is it slight praise to say of a woman that she does well the honors of her house in the way of hospitality. The wisdom that can maintain serenity, cheerfulness and order in a little world of ten or twelve persons, and keep ready the resources that are needed for their sustenance and recovery in sickness and sorrow, is the same that holds the stars in their places and potently prepares the precious metals in the most secret chambers of the earth. The art of exercising a refined hospitality is the fine art, and the music thus produced only differs from that of the orchestra in this, that in the former case, the overture or sonata can be played twice in the same manner. It requires that the hostess shall combine true self-respect and repose, with refined perception of individual traits and moods in character, with variety and vivacity, an ease grace and gentleness that diffuse their sweetness insensibly through every nook of an assembly, and call out reciprocal sweetness wherever there is any to be found.

"The simple art of not too much,"

The only danger in all this is the same that besets us in every walk of life, to-wit: that of preferring the outward sign to the inward spirit, whenever there is cause to hesitate between the two.

"I admire," says Goethe, "the Chinese novels; they express so happily ease, peace, and a finish unknown to other nations in the interior arrangements of their homes. In one of them I came upon this line: 'I heard the lonely maidens laughing, and found my way to the garden-house, where they were seated in their light cane chairs.' To me this brings an immediate animation, by the images it suggests of lightness, brightness and elegance."

This is most true, but it is also true that the garden-house would not seem thus charming unless its "light cane chairs" had "lovely laughing maidens" seated in them. And the lady who values her porcelain, that most exquisite product of the peace and thorough breeding of China, so highly, should take the hint, and remember, that, unless the fragrant herb of wit, sweetened by kindness, and softened by the cream of affability also crown her board the prettiest teacups in the world might as well be in fragments in the gutter, as adorn her social show. The show loses its beauty when it ceases to represent a substance.

Here, as elsewhere, it is only vanity, narrowness and self-seeking that spoil a good thing. Women would never be too good housekeepers for their own peace or that of others, if they considered housekeeping only as a means to an end. If their object was really the peace and joy of all concerned they could bear to have their cups and saucers broken easier than their tempers, and to have curtains and carpets soiled rather than their hearts by mean and small feelings. But they are brought up to think "it is a disgrace to be a bad housekeeper," not because they must by such neglect, be a cause of suffering and loss of time to all within their sphere, but because other women will laugh at them if they are so. Here is the voice—for want of a high motive, there can be no truly good action.

We have seen a woman otherwise noble and magnanimous in a high degree, so insane on this point as to weep bitterly because she found a little dust on her picture frames, and torment her guests all dinner time, with excusses for the way in which the dinner was cooked. We have known others join with their servants to backbite the best and noblest friends for trifling derelictions against the accustomed order of the house. The broom swept out the memory of much sweet counsel and loving kindness and spots on the table cloth were more regarded than those they made on their own loyalty and honor in the most intimate relations.

"The worst of furies is a woman scorned," and the sex so lively, mobile, and impassioned when passion is aroused at all, are in danger of frightful error under great temptation. The angel can give place to a mere subtle and treacherous demon, though one, generally, of less tantalizing influence than in the breast of man. In great crises woman needs the highest reason to restrain her, but her besetting danger is that of littleness. Just because nature and society unite to call on her for such fineness and finish, she can be so petty, so fretful, so vain, so envious and base! O women! see your danger. See how much you need a great object in all your little actions. You cannot be fair, nor can your homes be fair, unless you are holy and noble. Will you sweep and garnish the house only that it may be ready for a legion of evil spirits to enter in! For imps and demons of gossip, frivolity, detraction and a restless fever about small ills! What is the house good for, if good spirits cannot peacefully abide there! Lo! they are asking for the bill in more than one well garnished mansion. They sought a home, and found a work-house. Martha! it was thy fault!

COMMUNICATION.

FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

LIBERIA.

No. 1,

Mr. Editor:—We have heard it remarked, that "beside the editorials there were but little original matter in the Herald." Yours has been, is now and will continue to be, a useful sheet to Liberia, and may be rendered more so. So small a paper edited on this great continent, in a colony as interesting as Liberia is said to be, should wear more of home appearance, by being filled with matters relative to Liberia, and Africa. The Editors do their part it is true, but they are not the only men who should be interested. News papers were not designed to be filled with editorial matters only. The Liberia Herald, is to proclaim the truth about the colony, and calls upon every man to speak of her, who loves her. By this means persons abroad would become not only more acquainted, but more interested in our welfare. And did different politicians, respectfully and in friendly words, show their different opinions, with the reasons of them; two sides would be seen, and judged of. If it be true, the Herald has become the property of the Liberia Lyceum. Certainly the intelligent members composing that body, Farmers, Mechanicks, Merchants, Ministers, Doctors, and Lawyers, can find enough matter in their various practical persuits, and observations to both enlighten and engage. As we have had recently the extreme honor of being made a member of that body, and desire to be one that will at least do it no harm, and as we are deprived of the high privilege of meeting with them, and must loose those feasts of intellect, enjoyed so often by its members that can, we would employ a few moments from time to time in dropping you a letter, as our opportunities of sending are few, should any of them be thought long, we may be excused on that ground, especially as we venture only with the hope of prompting others more skilled in writing, and acquainted with subjects of general interest to the colony to contribute things useful to us in this way, believing as it has done, it will still prove beneficial.

We will make our last trip into the interior, a kind of Journal like text, to what ever general remarks, and observations we may make, promising as we proceed to give a kind of discription of things or try to. We cannot promise you that our reflections will be interesting, we may make some that will call for explainations that may be so. We will promise to speak what we think the truth, leaving others to think of it what they chose.

Liberia in our opinion, is the best home for the colored man of the United States, and the Herald as it has done, may teach them more of this happy land. Its soil, timber, minerals, its productions generally, offer subjects of interest. The best modes of cultivation, after the manner we commonly till. The most useful productions to us at present. Those that will bring the most present, and future wealth to Liberia. The kind of soil in different plants thrive best, would be surely useful fields, in which to employ the pen. How often have we thought of the practicability, of circulating the Herald, as such numbers of it, as may have, useful articles upon the cultivation of the soil, especially such as relate to the Torrid Zone. The prices which may be realized for different articles especially all offers from a broad for such articles as our farmers might cultivate. Are there not men in America, who would make offers to farmers in this country, on conditions, honorable to both, to encourage enterprise and show what can be done? What quantities of Arrow-root, (especially the root unprepared, we are deficient in the means of grinding, and the raw root prepared in America would be a sure way to avoid the cheats so often made by cassada starch) Kian Pepper, Lemnon an Lime juice, Pouders, and Indigo might we not make profit by them? Men who never think of raising any thing beside cassadas, potatoes, plantains and bannanas, may by such encouragement that they can rely on, be lead to the cultivation of plants and trees, that in a few years may bring considerable wealth. Reward sweetens labor, and now certain amounts for certain things may become at, may excite hundreds, whose eyes are glued like a "muskrake" to the present, "the bird in my own hand now only" to raise something beside cassada, to look forward a little, and work some by anticipation. Just such subjects and designs are what we want. Such should employ the pens, and hands, as well as mouths of "Independant men" more than they do, as an empty name, if it ever sold for much may not bring much to realy help a needy people. Those then who urge so strongly at the present a Declaration of Independance &c., should more than all other patriots in our view, urge and encourage, the means of bringing about our real and positive Independance. We doubt very much the true glory of all empty artificial imaginary, incautious, mere point carrying things. We hope that we have no men to crush us for empty opinion sake. There are men in the world though whose they carry a point cares not where that point leads to. We profess to be in favor of such Declaration when we can declare the truth if it be to-day. And if the time is come necessarily; or otherwise, we say success to Liberia. The good citizen may say sink or swim "donot give up the ship? Papers put in circulation among persons who do not "take papers" or cannot read after the manner that some good folks do "religious tracts," pointing out what might be of practical good, beg them to "read or have read and give to thy neighbour requesting the same of him."—Especially articles on agriculture, the great use and propriety, of raising different fruits, vegitables &c. &c. We propose being one of ten men, to pay for six numbers of the Herald for the above purpose, for the public good of New Georgia, Caldwell, Virginia, Kentuckey, New Orleans, and Millsburg. Monrovia, Edina, and Bassa Cove, seem to be awake to self improvement in some way at least, especially of interesting themselves in the improvement of the mind, and other useful persuits, while in some of the above things, especially the improvement of the mind, of adults and young men, and reading and discussing subjects of general good, to us as a colony Caldwell, New Georgia, Millsburg &c., seem to be asleep. Are there no independance men in those towns! Loving their fellow men enough to do so small a thing as set on foot, energetic enough to keep in operation a Lyceum! what sources of information and general good! On the floor of those Lyceums such articles could be read, carried home though over, and out men in action who otherwise might never have though of them. Where are our Patriots! We are no Mineralogist, Botanist or very great agriculturist, though we do as much at the latter, as our transitory mode of life will admit, and often reap our reward.

On the third of August, leaving what is considered the sterrile rocky, gravly ground of Monrovia, and the sandy soil of the beach, (which in most instances amply reward the labore.) We proceeded up the Stocton River, towards New Georgia. The banks of the Stocton are low and marshy for several miles up, and so thickly set with swamp mangrove (the roots of which seem determined to keep the body of the trees out of the mud and water,) (no bad hint to Liberians) as to be almost impenatrable, a strong national fort these may prove in days to come to Liberians, a good army secreted in them, would give an enemy no little trouble in passing from Monrovia to New Georgia &c. The effluvia arising from these marshes (which are chiefly confined to the sea board) is disagreeable and we should think unhealthy. We have often thought that the beautiful town of New Georgia, lost on the side of health, by being placed so near the head of these low lands. Higher up the Stocton, or on the St. Pauls, higher, healthier, and we think more fertile lands offer sites. The New Georgians generally are an industrious people.

Passing the public Farm, on the North of the Stocton, this spot is an exception to the low lands on the river, it is elevated good soil, one of the houses, seem to say "a stitch in time would have saved nine."

As we only passed by the Farm, we were soon in the St. Pauls River, one of the most navigable, if not the longest river in Liberia. The little new settlement Virginia, opposite Caldwell, on the North of the St. Pauls, exhibits marks of industry, showing what labor can do, that the men, are men of the stamp, and not a sleepy headed set, having as much to boast of to-day as farmers, as many who have been pretending to farm for years.

We like to visit "New Comers," it is a privilege we hardly ever let slip if near them, and which we often repeat, especially as there are hordes who are ever ready to discourage. We very often find many of them possessed of wrong notions, both of Liberia, and liberty. Having been misled or wrongly impressed some times we fear among others, by the addresses of Colonization Agents. Hearing that Gold and golddust, were found "in the sand of Africa" and that it was washed out in great quantities and sold for much, that "money (camwood we suppose) growed upon trees as well as (mangrove) "oysters" (very unwholesome food.) Of the value and abundance of ivory. The spontaneous growth of coffee, sugar cane, &c., in great abundance. The abundance of fish fowl, and deer. They have hastened to Liberia, expecting to see a country like that they left, and these things as it were growing in natural farms abundantly, the whole earth a fold, a park, a coop, or pen, like farming pens and folds &c. in America, (expecting to gaze upon "the Queen of Africa" and the good man only knows what all.) Expecting that they had only to gather, kill, and eat, wash gold from the sand immass wealth without end with little or no exertion.

We can truly sympathise with such people, as we too when a little boy, a candidate for Liberia, was simple enough to possess the same mistaken views Associating all the above sources of African wealth together, and throwing them in our mind in the streets of colonial settlements, as lead to do by teachers. Why we were to wash out a few tons of gold in double quick time, gather from the dollar trees money enough to soon make us "von berry pig fellow," that need never work again. Tame and ride my elephants and "Arabian horses which we were told ran in droves wild in the woods," and for aught we knowed build an "ivory house." Catch as much venison from the streets as we wished. Dip fish from the river with our bucket. As for fowls they were in our thoughts in danger of being crushed under foot, while the eggs become as trash. We were to drink fresh coffee from the bush every day, for the Agent said "all you have to do is to send your children to the groves and gather as much as you wish and when you pleased."

Such addresses and teaching may be true of Africa, and Liberia in one sense, and as foolish as the above thoughts may appear, they do not dwell in the minds of children alone. Many elderly persons are ignorant enough to think just so too, from the same causes, they are taught to do so. Those who make use of addresses, should so express themselves as to avoid making wrong impressions, for acclimating fever and disappointment often prove an over match for a low spirited man's constitution. Persons lecturing with an eye to make proselites or induce men to come to Liberia, would do us no harm, to avoid every thing that would possibly lead from reality, as the evil growing out of wrong views and perhaps the number of deaths, may be greater than one at first view would suppose.

Truth would say, there is golddust on the gold coast or wherever it is, but it might do an emigrant to this colony no good, as there is no probability of his ever leaving Liberia, and going away there to seek it, if he could. There is a tree in Africa, the wood of which is good for cash at $3, per cwt, brought from the interior by the natives, and sold in large quantities to Liberians, but it would be both unprofitable, and foolish for an emigrant to go off to cut it, as it would cost him even if he succeeded a hundred per cent more, to get it to market, than it would to purchase it with the "where with all" after it was brought, by the natives. It would do him no good in the interior where every man could cut as much as he wanted, as well as the ivory too may be brought for the money, but is not so plentiful as stones in the streets of Monrovia. Elephants are killed in Liberia some times very near our settlements, but Elephant hunting is a dangerous, unprofitable business, only persued by a few lion hearted Africans, and in India we are told they tame and ride them. If we only drink the coffee our children gather from the woods our cups would be few, though it grows spontaneously and in some places may be gathered wild. Fish are as plenty as they are any where else, yet they don't jump in our hands. Deers live in our woods and are sometimes shot and killed; and there are horses some where in Africa, and in the space of 15 years two or three has been brought to the colony and sold.

How much better if they be farmers, point them to the soil, the fertility of which cannot well be exagerated, producing every thing a tropical clime can produce, in ample abundance, yet "by the sweat of the brow." The arm answering, though not necessarily in all cases, the place of the ox [oxen can be bought at any time thank God, for the money and broke and worked too by those who chose it, and it has been done] the hoe answering for the plough, if we rather, and in our light soil, does almost as well perhaps. Labor and patience, two thirds of the labor less, that it would take to support a man in the U. States will reward the workman lordly, sixty, a hundred fold. The profits will sweeten the toil.

A coffee tree once planted and reared (which takes four years) will yield its increase two crops a year, year after year bringing its reward with it, a hundred, a thousand, and tens of thousands, will do the very same, and certainly the cions, or the seed are to be bought in sufficient quantities in Liberia. Arrow-root, Ginger, Pinders, and Pepper grow with almost half a trouble, yielding in full abundance, if pruned. Indigo &c. grow luxuriantly beyond a possible expectation. And as for fruits, the Orange, Lime, Lemmon, Sourson, Guaver, Mango, &c. &c., We place Liberia against any country in the world, and with what a fraction of labor, compared with the benefits they yield, Vegitables, the Yam, Potatoes, Cassado, Plantains, Indian corn, Beans, Peas, &c. &c., useless to mention, time would fail us to tell." Put them in the earth, and they are as sure to produce, as the God of nature is to bring about the sea-ons. Still the idle will not have them. The lazy man has no part in this lot of good things. Such truths would do us good. The word labor frightens the lazy man, and he will not curse us with his presence and example. The industrious love that word, or the thing it means will come determined to do, and coming will conquer, and be rewarded.

A. F. RUSSELL.

Golah August 20th. 1846.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. NOVEMBER 6 1846

We are gratified, in having it in our power, to inform our readers, that since the issuing of our last number, our minds, have in a measure, been releived of the fears, we then entertained of forcible possession being taken of Grand Cape Mount by the British Government. We are informed by authority which may be relied upon, that if such is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, the fact has not yet been made known to the Commanders of Her Ships of War on this station; and it is but reasonable to suppose, if such an order had been issued, none would have known it sooner, than those who are sent to the coast to protect British interest.

We have not, however failed to watch all movements having the least reference to that district of country. We learn that there is a gentleman at Sierra Leone, lately returned from England, who contemplates founding a settlement at the Cape as soon as he can obtain a sufficient number of persons, to engage with him in the undertaking. The gentleman's name is familiar to us; but we have never heard it mentioned until now in connexion with that territory, nor do we believe that his name has any right, to be associated with that of Cape Mount on the footing, which it is said, he wishes to place it. It is said, that he derives his authority to occupy, from a Mr. Redmond of London, whose name, our readers may remember, appeared in a document said to have been executed by the chiefs of Cape Mount some four years ago, with that of Mr. Canot's giving them the sole right of trade in that region:—but it seems, that Mr. R. has disclaimed any right to the privileges which that document purports to have given him, by refusing to reimburse Mr. C. for a portion of the expenses which he had been at in obtaining a footing at that place: and in consequence, Mr. C. long since ceased to consider Mr. Redmond as being in any wise concerned with him in that territory:—indeed it is pretty well understood here, that Mr. Redmond in a letter to Mr. Canot, fully relinquished all his right to that country, and objected to Mr. C's. importuning him again on the subject.

The formation of any private enterprise at this place may not be a matter to which we need give ourselves much concern—the object of the adventurers will most assuredly be that of trade, and from our knowledge of the resources of that region, we feel quite confident that the annual profits of its trade will not be a sufficient inducement to the foreigner to remain there any length of time,—deprived of civilized society, and more than half of his time from the effects of the climate, be compelled to forbear fellowship with his couch—Admit that he would be capable of surmounting these difficulties; how would he manage, to keep the trade all to himself? No plan could be adopted to prevent us from obtaining a portion of it, and any attempt on the part of the foreigners to prevent it, would by the Africans be taken as a declaration of war—and when once a necessity occured for a resort to arms, all confidence between the parties, if there had been any, would be at an end. It is not the monopolising of the trade that causes us any uneasiness, but we apprehend that difficulties would arise, should foreign settlements be made in our immediate neighborhood.

On the 17th ultimo Her B. Majes y's Ships' "Nimrod" Captain Dacres, and "Favorite" Captain Murray anchored in our harbor and spent a day on shore at the Government House. Captain Dacres has been in command of the British Naval Forces on the Sierra Leone division, and is succeeded by Captain Murray. Captain D. leaves here for the Cape Good-Hope.

The Union Sisters of Charity Society,—This society celebrated its 13th anniversary on Wednesday last in the Baptist Church in this town—a large number of citizens attended the celebration. We are pleased to say that the ceremonies were quite interesting—Dr. James S. Smith delivered a very pretty address and the Ladies sung very beautifully. The committee in their annual report showed an expenditure of some thirty dollars, and an unappropriated ballance in the hands of the Treasurer of seventy dollars.

We wish for this and and all other benevolent societies, success in their praise worthy undertaking; and we bespeak for them the kind consideration of the benevolent of our community.

LIBERIA LYCEUM.—The citizens are invited to attend the Hall of this institution on Wednesday evening next at 7 of the clock to hear an address to be delivered by Daniel B. Warner Esq.

The Ship "Madonna" Captain Richard E. Lawlin 53 days from New York, arrived yesterday with the following passengers—all well. Mr. & V. R. James, Teacher of a High School under the patronage of a Society of Ladies of New York, for the promotion of education in Liberia—Wife and two children. Master George Cirus Monrovia, Mrs. Thompson and two children for the Episcopal mission at Cape Palmas, Rev. Mr. Walker and Lady, the A. B. C. F. M. Mission Gaboon River.

The returns of the annual election from the counties of Montserrada, and Grand Bassa, are received. We have not yet heard from "Sinoe". The following persons are elected:—

For Lieutenant Governor John Day, of Bexly—county of Grand Bassa.

COUNCILLORS FOR THE COUNTY OF MONTSERRADA.

John B. Gripon,	of	Millsburg.
Nathaniel Brander,	"	Monrovia.
Samuel Benedict	"	"
Adam W. Anderson,	"	"
William Draper,	"	"
Sion Harris,	"	Caldwell.

FOR THE COUNTY OF GRAND BASSA.

Stephen A. Benson,	of	Basse Cove.
Washington W. Davis,	"	Edina.
Wm. L. Weaver	"	"
John Hanson	"	"

ON THE STOCKS.—Our fellow citizen Mr. William Draper, has commenced the building of a fine craft to measure thirty tons. We wish him every imaginable success in the undertaking, and hope in less than three months time, to see her with a flowing breeze sail majestically out of the quiet Messurada for the Palm Oil marts.

Our readers will find on our 21 page an interesting communication from Mr. A. F. Russel, Missionary to the "Golah Country," and we bespeak for it a candid perusal. We have often invited our readers to favor us with communications, and they have as often promised to do so; but like the rest of their promises, they remain unfulfilled.

Mr. Russel is wrongly informed as to the ownership of the "Herald." The Liberia Lyceum owns no portion of it

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

NOTICE.

NEW GOODS, Flour, Pork, Beef, Tobacco and Blue Baffs, for sale. American and foreign dry goods, both staple and fancy, varied by and with every modern improvement, in price quality and fashion. The same may be said of lots of bonnets and shoes, &c. &c. &c., too tedious to mention. The above named assortment was purchased for cash, and therefore will be only sold for cash or produce down on the nail on the fairest terms.

EDWARD J. ROYE.

Monrovia June 10th 1846.

WANTED, by the subcriber 1000 bushels of peanuts very dry and in good order for shiping for which goods will be given at the lowest price.

E. J. ROYE.

ALSO Products of the soil that will bear shiping hitherto not exported together with every species of rare animals, birds, shells, or phenomena, of this portion of the Globe.

E. J. ROYE.

NEW SUPPLIES, Flour, sugar, pork, beef, fish, & dry goods &c. recently bought & for sale at my usual low prices.

E. J. ROYE.

Monrovia Nov. 5 th 1846

DIED,

Departed this life on the 27th ultimo, Elder Abraham Cheeseman, in the 54th year of his age. Mr. Cheeseman has long been a member, and preacher of the Providence Baptist Church in this place. His end was peaceful.

In our next, an obituary notice of his death will be given.—Com.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

From the New-York Sun.

A TALE OF THE HEART.

The following affecting story is related by the Rev. H. Edwards of England, in a work recently published. It shows that the most determined pride of purpose cannot always conquer love; and that the latter emotion, secretly encouraged, sometimes preys upon life and produces death. There are those who laugh and sneer in supposing such a state of things, and attribute such effects to weakmindedness. All hearts, however, are not constituted alike, and the annexed simple tale may be regarded with sympathy by some readers.

The daughter of a country curate in Hampshire, being reduced by the death of her father to the hard necessity of seeking some mode of subsistence, could find no other than going into the service of an old female friend of her mother, as her maid, Emelia (that was her name) received from her parents the best education. She was handsome, had a very pleasing figure, was sensible, discreet, reserved, and of modest deportment. Unfortunately for her, a young gentleman of good fortune, who was a friend of the family with whom she lived, frequently visited at the house. The master and mistress keeping only one footman, poor Emelia, who generally assisted in serving the tea, had thus an opportunity of seeing the young man, and fell in love with him before she was aware of the progress of that sentiment in her heart. When she did perceive it, her reason induced her to oppose it and she made strong efforts for that purpose; indeed, so violent were her struggles, that her health was seriously affected by them. Her mistress, who loved her tenderly, after having consulted several physicians in vain, sent her to the house of a friend at twenty miles distance, to try whether change of air would be of any service to her.

The absence of the object of her affection, no doubt, contributed to her recovery. She returned to her mistress, and having the same opportunities as before, her passion revived. Firmly resolved to conquer it, or to die, rather than to give way to an attachment in spite of her, she relapsed into a deplorable state of health. The physicians, not being able to discover the cause of her disorder, thought that she must be affected by some deep sorrow, and pronounced her in danger. Her affectionate mistress entreated her to entrust her with the secret; and to induce her to do so, told her the danger she was in, and promised not only not to betray her confidence, but to do her utmost to obtain the means necessary to her cure. Overcome by the affection of her mistress, she acknowledged her passion, begged her to conceal it from him who was the object of it, and received with resignation the news of her approaching dissolution, which would at last deliver her from an unfortunate passion which all her efforts had been unable to vanquish. Her mistress could not help informing her husband of the discovery. They began to sound the young man upon the subject, and finding, by degress, that he had observed the merits of Emelia, they prevailed upon him to pity her situation. He consented, asked to see her (she being previously prepared for it by her mistress;) entered into conversation with her, testified the greatest desire to see her health re-estowed, and even went so far as to say that if she could recover he would be hapy to marry her. "Marry me!" cried she, raising her armes, and fixing her eyes upon him. 'Marry me!' and throwing her head back, she instantly expired.

THE HARMONY BETWEEN THE MORAL AND PHYSICAL WORLD.

IT is wisely ordained that there should be a great affinity petween the world and its inhabitants to shew that they were made for each other. There is a pereet harmony and beautiful connection in all the works of God. There is a near relation and striking analogy between human nature and the surface of the earth. Like plants and animals men grow, arrive at maturity, and die. As the diversity of soils and climates is great, some fruitful and others barren, so is there as great a variety in the mind talents, and faculties of men. And there is in this variety more wisdom and goodness than perhaps we are at first aware of; had we a thorough knowledge of things, we should find that a glorious perfection reigns in the whole. Should any object, that God has not given the same faculties and the same degree of understanding to all mankind, we might reply, Who art thou, impotent and blind mortal, that presumest to question; the Almighty as to what he has done! Beyond all doubt this difference is right & worthy of our admiration: though it may not be conformable to our way of thinking. The most savage and uncultivated nations, like barren and desert countries, have their beauty and use in the eyes of the Creator. Divine providence has evidently intended the earth for cultivation, that it might yield support for his creatures. So it is his intention also, that human nature should be cultivated; that our souls should be made fruitful in every good work. With this design, God has revealed his mind and will to mankind in the holy scriptures; but unless the soil be disposed to receive this good seed, it will be as if sown among thorns or by the way side.

Vast countries still lie barren and uncultivated, though nothing is withheld from them that is needful for rendering them fruitful. And thus it is, notwithstanding the publication of the gospel, there are still many millions who remain in ignorance. Even in the most enlightened nations of christianity the glorious gospel is not universally known. Many do not comprehend it, and are quite insensible of the salutary truths of our holy religion. Some appear to receive these truths with eagerness and joy; but soon lose their impressions, with others, the pleasures, riches, and cares of this world stifle the divine word. A small number receive it with a good and honest heart. To them alone the gospel is the power of God unto salvation.

But what is my real character? What impression have the truths of christianity made upon my heart? Let conscience reply with honesty and sincerity: and may my conduct through life prove that I am a real christian!—Sturm.

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Oct. 17. Dutch brig——,——master, from the leeward.

" 27 H. B. M, Sloop Nimrod, J. R. Dacres Esq. commander from the windward.

" " H. B. M. Sloop——commander from the windward.

" 23 Col. sloop Perseverance, Boston master from the windward.

" 31 Col. sloop Economy, Chase master from Junk.

Nov. 2. Col sloop Perseverance, Boston master, from the leeward.

DEPARTURES.

Oct. 18. H. M. C. M. Schooner Hiondelle,—— Commander for the leeward.

" 22. Col Sloop Preseverance, Boston master for the windward.

" " Am. Schoner Boston Ludington master for New York.

" " Am Birg Smithfield, William Duff master, for the leeward.

" 22. Col sloop Star Atkins master for the leeward.

" 23. Col. sloop Nathan Bangs, G. Ammons master, for the leeward.

" 24. Col. sloop Economy Chase master for Junk.

" " Belgium Brig——master for the leeward.

" 25. Dutch Brig ——————master, for the leeward.

" 27. Col Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master for the leeward.

" 26 H. B M. sloop——— Commander, for the windward.

" 24. Col sloop Perseverance, Boston master, for leeward.

POETRY.

From the Sun.

STANZAS.

BY THEODORE A. GOULD.

Who lives through life's season,
And knoweth not love.
Hath refused the high mission
Sent down from above;
His breast is a winter
Of desolate hours;—
Where the spring-time ne'er comes
With its verdure and flowers.

Oh! how wild is the transport—
How perfect the bliss!—
When lip presseth lip
In a love-glowing kiss!
And the arms are encircled
Around the loved form;—
And the low-murmured words
Are impassioned and warm.

Love planteth the seeds
Of delight in the heart;—
Whose quick-springing blossoms,
Rich fragrance impart:
Then give him kind welcome,
Ye bosoms of snow
He will cheer your cold hearts,
In his torch's warm glow.

The whole world will then wear
A new beauty and bloom;
And the flowers of life,
Yield a sweeter perfume,
Oh, reject not the blessing
God's goodness hath given—
To mortals as well
As to angels of heaven!

Brooklyn, 1846.

MISCELLANEOUS

From the Rover.

THE TEMPTER.

A TALE OF JERUSALEM.

IT was fast approaching the eleventh hour; the busy hum of the Holy City had sunk into comparative stillness, and, save some straggling wayfarers, and mechanics returning from their daily toil, few passengers were to be seen in the streets of Jerusalem. One middleaged man alone kept his seat in the Water Gate, looking with placid smile along the rugged road which led down to the Valley of Jehoshaphat: a silver gerah was held between his fingers, as in the act of giving an alms; but for some minutes no object appeared on whom it might properly be bestowed. He rose from his seat, and gathering his flowing robe around him, was preparing to depart, when the figure of an aged man tottering slowly up the steep, arrested his attention. The old man was wearily clad; and, as he leant feebly on his staff, to take breath after his toilsome ascent, his glance rested upon the person of the sage Rabbi Abimelech, for it was he who sat in the gate distributing his daily alms to the poor, the hungry and the wayfarer.

"The Lord direct thy goings out and thy comings in," said the Rabbi, with a self-satisfied smile, dropping the coin into the extended palm of the stranger. "Lo! I have tarried from the ninth hour, until the towers and pinnacles of the temple have thrown their dark shadows across the brook of Cedron, even unto the base of the Mount of Olives, to bestow this last gerah of forty in an alms, according to a vow which I made last Pentecost, and behold thou art here to receive it."

"Precious is the gift which comes from the heart, more precious than the Arabian frankincense, and sweeter than the rich honey of Hebron. If I might know my lord's name, my heart would not forget it when I lift up my voice in prayer to the Ruler of Israel," said the stranger repectfully.

"I am called the Rabbi Abimelech."

"He whom men term 'the sinless?' whose voice is as the neighing of a war-horse, in the temple—whose works are the works of righteousness—who clothes the naked, feeds the hungry, and gives alms to the tenth part of his substance?" asked the stranger.

"The same," answered the self-glorified Rabbi; "and now, let me pray of thee, thy name, and in what city thou art a dweller?"

"Alas!" answered the stranger, "I am as a reproach to my kindred, and my name is a defilement to the lips of an Israelite."

"Unfortunate man! in what hast thou offended against the law?"

"In this thing have I offended. Behold, I went forth at the last vintage season into the vineyards and the vintagers were pressing the grapes in the wine-presses; and the red wine ran into the vats, even the red wine of Lebanon; and being weary with the heat and toil of the day, I was tempted, and in foolishness I did drink of the wine, which should have been an abomination unto me, seeing that I am a Nazarite from my youth."

The scrupulous Rabbi shrank from the degraded Israelite as from a tainted leper, and elevating his brow, said with a sanctimonious air, "The way of the wise man is pleasant, but the feet of the fool treadeth in the mire."

"Stop," said the stranger, as the Rabbi was departing. "Is it not also said that 'the vain glorious man shall fall in the snares of his own proud heart?' Rabbi Abimelech, thy life has been righteous, but fire hath not yet tried, nor water purified thee. See that thou stand just when the time cometh."

At these words, the stranger, with more alertness than his seeming feebleness indicated, turned into an obscure street, while Abimelech, pondering on the warning of the strange man, took his way toward his own dwelling. On reaching his house, Abimelech retired to his own chamber. It was a small closet or oratory on the housetop, furnished in a style of simplicity approaching to rudeness, and its cold, cheerless appearance was increased by the dim twilight. There was still, however, sufficient light for Abimelech to distinguish a female figure standing in a thoughtful attitude in the centre of the apartment. A rich, mellow ray fell upon her shape, which exceeded in height the usual standard of her sex, but was so exquisitely proportioned as to convey only an idea of grateful dignity to the beholder. Her eye, as she turned it upon Abimelech, seemed dark and lustrous, and her smile was as a sunbeam upon the bosom of the still waters. The Rabbi stood motionless, for he never before had beheld so much beauty; a new pulse stired in his bosom, and an unusual fire burned in his veins. At length he found words to express his admiration and astonishment. "Fair damsel," cried he, "thy visit is unforeseen; but thou art more welcome to my chamber than the pleasant odor of the young vines in the spring season."

"I am," said the abashed intruder, while a rosate blush overspread the marble whiteness of her soft cheek and lofty brow, "I am, as you may perceive, a stranger and a gentile, unworthy to come beneath the roof of the far-famed Rabbi Abimelech, the words of whose lips are wisdom, and whose precepts are as pearls of great price. Nevertheless, let thy handmaiden find favor in thy sight; and turn aside, I pray thee, unto my lodgings, which are nigh at hand, and let thy handmaiden rejoice in the light of thy countenance, and in the sweet sound of thy voice." The Rabbi, though surprised at this novel address, felt a strange sensation thrill through his frame. Gazing upon the lovely speaker, his resolution began to waver, and, almost unconsciously, he permitted himself to be led out by his unknown visitor. Proceeding at a rapid pace toward the western quarter of the city, they at length stopped before a house of handsome exterior, but which Abimelech could not remember ever having seen before. A single tap at the door caused it to open, and the Rabbi, still following his mysterious conductor, entered a hall, feebly lighted by a single lamp. Here she motioned him to remain for a short time, and disappearing through a passage, the Rabbi was left alone to meditate upon the strange adventure in which he was engaged. But he had little time allowed him for reflection, ere the heavy folds of a curtain, which overhung a small door, were partially withdrawn, and a fair hand and sweet, soft voice invited him to enter. He approached, lifted up the curtain, and beheld a superably furnished apartment, lit with silver lamps fed with the perfumed oil of Samaria. Mirrors of polished metal hung around the room, while, on a low couch, sat, or rather reclined, the beautiful stranger, whose charms now shone with a splendor far suppassing anything the Rabbi could imagine of mortal mould. He essayed to speak, but the words dwelt upon his lips. She beckoned him to take a seat beside her. He obeyed tremblingly; but the gentle assuring smile which she cast upon him, at once banished his timidity, and he suffered his eyes to wander in unrestrained freedom over those voluptuous beauties, till the sight became painful from extreme delight. A female attendant spread before them a light but luxurious repast of fresh and dried fruits, grapes, figs, apricots, olives, pomegranates and dates, interspersed with pots of pure honey, rose cakes of Damascus and bananas of Rosetta; with Egyptian syrup, and crystal vases in which the rich wine of Holbon sparkled with tempting brilliancy.

"Fairest of the daughters of men, may I crave thy name, and that of thy father's house?" said the Rabbi, addressing his unknown companion.

"My name is Zorah," replied the damsel. "My father is of the children of Ishmael, an abider in the desert; the fame of the sage Abimelech has reached unto the farther borders of the wilderness, and behold the heart of thy handmaiden was moved to see the man of whose wisdom all nations spake."

"Lovely Zorah!" exclaimed the enamored sage, "my wisdom is become as withered grass before thy beauty, and the strength of my heart as dew in the consuming light of thine eyes. Suffer me, therefore, to be unto thee even as Boaz was unto Ruth, and to love thee with the love wherewith Jacob loved Rachel."

Zorah smiled at the earnestness with which these words were uttered, and filling the cup, presented it to the delighted Rabbi, who instinctively shrank from the dangerous libation; but Zorah would not be denied.

"Urge me not, fair damsel," said he. "I have a vow against the juice of the vine until next new moon."

Zorah's countenance fell, and the big tear hung trembling on her dark eyes' silken lash. Abimelech, torn with conflicting passions passed his arm around her waist, and drew her unresistingly to his bosom: he felt the quick pulses of her heart throb against his; her warm sighs were upon his cheek, and the perfumed wine-cup at his lips: human strength could resist no longer—he seized the cup with desperate hands, and at a single draught quaffed it to the bosom. His vow was broken, and having nothing farther to hope or fear, draught followed draught in quick succession, till his flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes bore evidence that he was no longer under the dominion of reason.

"Zorah, my beautiful Zorah!" cried he, "my love for thee is as the love which floods cannot quench, nor many waters drown. Thou art the light of mine eyes—I cannot part from thee; let us therefore flee unto thy father's tents, even unto the wilderness as unto a city of refuge."

"Ah! my lord, thy servant hath neither gold nor silver to bear the charge. Could we live like the raven or the stork of the cezert?"

This objection had not struck Abimelech before; he was rich himself, but he could not immediately convert his possessions into money, and his passion was too violent to admit delay. He seemed perplexed and spake not, till Zorah inquired, in a careless manner, if his next-door neighbor was not the rich publican, Aaron Ben Rabbi.

"It is even so," replied the Rabbi, still musing.

"And he hath, I am told, coffers filled with shekels of pure silver?"

"It is said so."

"And shekels of gold, and pots of double Maccabees, and precious stones, pearls, and sardonyx, and carbuncles, more costly than the jewels of the high-priest's breast-plate?"

"Hah!" exclaimed Abimelech as if a sudden ray of light had darted across his mind; "speak on."

"Aaron Ben Rabbiat is stricken in years and liveth alone; riches are to him as the dust of the earth; there is a private way from thy house into his."

"Stop, stop!" cried the agitated man, grasping the arm of the tempter convulsively. "What wouldst thou? Shall I peril my soul in this thing? Zorah! Zorah! thy words, are pleasant to my ears as the murmurs of falling waters in the desert, but the bitterness of Marah, even the bitterness of death is in their taste: nevertheless, in this also I will obey thee."

"Go about it, then, instantly," said Zorah rising; "thou knowest the private passage into the old miser's chamber. Take this weapon—thou mayest need it—and when thou hast secured the treasure, return quickly hither, and all things shall be ready for our flight."

Abimelech, whose scruples had by this time completely vanished, was no less eager than his impetuous mistress to accomplish the deed; he ran with incredible speed through the now silent streets, and quickly reach his own dwelling. Lighting a small lamp, he entered a private passage, which in times of danger had been contrived between the two houses, and in a few moments found himself in the strong chamber of Aaron Ben Rabiat.

Around him lay coffers filled with gold and silver coins, and caskets charged with precious stones, that trembled with varied but incessant lustre in the sickly beams of the lamp he bore. He had raised one jewel box to his eye, to examine it more closely, when, slipping from his fingers, it fell to the floor with a loud crash, and the next moment the alarmed miser rushed into the apartment. Seeing a stranger at such an hour, in the sanctuary of the gold of his idolatry, he uttered a piercing scream, and throwing himself upon the robber, grappled him with almost supernatual strength. Vainly did Abimelech endeavor to escape from the old man's grasp or to still his screams:—every moment increased his danger: he heard the steps of persons ascending the stairs: not an instant was to be lost; the dagger which Zorah had given him was in his girdle; he drew it, and plunged it into the heart of the old man. A piercing shriek rung through the chamber, and the unfortunate Aaron Ben Rabiat fell lifeless on the floor. Instead of providing for his safety, the guilty Rabbi stood petrified with horror over the quivering body of his victim, watching the life-stream welling from his side, in a bubbling tide. When the persons attracted by the publican's screams entered the room, he made no attempt to escape, but surrendered himself quietly into their hands. He was instantly hurried to prison, and, amidst the revilings of the crowd was plunged into a dark noisome dungeon, to await the public ignominy of a trial on the following day, in the sight of that people before whom he had set himself up as an example of righteousness. Dashing himself on the earth, he lay writhing in bitter agony cursing the hour of his birth and the fatal madness which had led his steps from the paths of virtue; when suddenly a ray of light illuminated his prison—he looked up—it was Zorah. Her eyes' dark orb still shone with undiminished lustre; but there was in the proud smile which curled her elevated lip an expression of demoniac triumph, which chilled the Rabbi's blood. Hiding his face in his robe, he exclaimed:

"False temper, begone. I have done thy bidding—and lo! innocent blood is upon my hands. I am broken and trodden under foot like a defiled thing. The cup of my pride has been filled with gall. Depart, therefore, I pray thee, lest in the bitterness of my wrath I curse thee also."

"Rabbi Abimelech, it is said, 'the vain-glorious man shall fall in the snare of his own heart.' The time hath come, and thou couldst not stand fast.'

"Racca! art thou here?" shouted Abimelech, as he recognised in the speaker the voice of the mendicant to whom he had given alms at the Water-gate on the previous evening. Burning with rage, he seized the prophet of evil by the throat; but the strength of the old man far exceeded his own, and he flung him to the earth with a violence that shook his frame. Starting up he beheld not the old beggar of the Water-gate, nor the tempter, Zorah. He was alone, not in the dungeon of a prison, but in his little chamber, with a yellow harvest-moon streaming through the lattice. Several minutes elapsed before he could convince himself that the horrors he had undergone were but the airy painting of a dream, and then, prostrating himself on the ground, he exclaimed, in the fulness of his heart, "It is a lesson from the Lord—I was proud of my own strength, and when the trial came I was delivered to the Evil One!"

From that day forth the Rabbi Abimelech walked in the path of humility. He had experienced the dangers of self-confidence, and he learned to pity rather than condemn those who, like himself, had fallen in the struggle with The Tempter.

FABLE.

"Father of men and beasts," said the Horse, approaching the throne of Jupiter, "it is said of me, that I am one of the most beautiful animals with which thou hast adorned the world; and self-love incites me to believe the character just; yet in some particulars, my appearance might admit of improvement."

"Of what kind? Inform me. I am willing to receive instruction," said the father of all, and smiled.

"I would probably run better," replied the steed "if my legs were longer and more slender; a neck like a swan would be more becoming; a wider chest would improve my strength; and, since thou hast ordained me to carry thy darling, man, might I not have a natural saddle growing upon my back; instead of that with which the well meaning tailor confines me?"

"Have patience," resumed the God; and with an awful voice pronounced his creative word. Life started into the dust; inert matter became alive; organised members were formed: they were joined in one consistent body; and before the throne arose—the hideous Camel. The horse shuddered, and shook with horror.

"See," said Jupiter, "longer and more slender legs; a neck like that of a swan: and a large chest, and a natural saddle. Would you choose to have such a shape?" The horse quaked with extreme aversion.

"Go," continued the God, "take counsel from this event; be henceforth satisfied with your condition; and, in order to remind you of the warning you have now received,"—so saying he cast on the Camel a preserving look,—Live." said he, "new inhabitant of the world! and may the horse never see thee but with trembling aversion!"—Concordia Intelligencer.

KISSING.—The following are said to be very useful receipts. If your wife scolds, kiss her and keep her quiet.

If your child cries, kiss it and keep it quiet.

If your creditors appear in scores, with each a bill as long as your arm, why just kiss them and keep them quiet.

The remedy will prove alike efficatious in all these cases.—Concordia Intelligencer.

No man was ever a loser by good works, for though he may not be immediately rewarded, yet in process of time, some happy emergency of other occurs to convince him that virtuous men are the darlings of Providence.—Concordia Intelligencer.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV. MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) NOVEMBER 20 1845. NO. 3

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr. R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr. S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN R. PITNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	WM. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston.	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. WM. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

From the Living Age.

DUTCH ANNA.

IT was shortly after the outbreak of the French Revolution that the humble heroine of this story made her appearance in my native village. Dutch Anna (for so she was called by the country people) was, as the name implies, a native of Holland; and at that time she might be about twenty-five years of age. She was of the middle size, stoutly and firmly built, with a round, good-humored face, dark hair, clear, honest-looking hazel eyes. and a mouth which, though wide, was expressive of decision and firmness. Her dress, which never varied in style, consisted of a colored petticoat of a thick woollen material, a short bed-gown of striped cotton, confined round the waist by the strings of a snow-white apron, a close-fitting, modest cap, underneath the plaited border of which appeared her glossy hair, neatly braided over her low, broad forehead; add to this a pair of well knit stockings, which the shortness of her petticoats afforded ample opportunity of admiring, with heavy wooden shoes, and you have a complete picture of *D*utch Anna's costume. At the time I speak of, the prejudice entertained by the mass of the people against foreigners was much greater than in the present day, when the means of communication beween different countries are so much improved, and the general diffusion of knowledge has shown the unreasonableness of regarding with distrust and contempt those of our fellow-creatures who have been born in a different climate, and trained in different customs to our own. It may therefore be readily imagined that Anna was for a time regarded with suspicion and jealousy, for the very reason which ought to have commanded the sympathy and goodwill of her neighbors—"that she was a stranger in the land." Her mode of life perhaps increased the prejudice against her. Respecting the reason of her voluntary exile, she preserved a studied silence; though I afterwards learned that the persecution she endured from her own family on the subject of religion was the principal cause. Our village adjoined a populous manufacturing district, and Anna, having been accustomed to such occupation, soon obtained employment. Being a person of a peculiarly reserved and serious turn of mind she could not endure the thought of living in lodgings: and as she was not able to furnish or pay the rent of a cottage, she hired for a trifling sum an old lonely barn belonging to my father, who was a small farmer, and, with the labor of her own hands, managed to put it into a habitable condition. The furniture of this rude dwelling was simple to put it into a habitable condition. The with the labor of her own hands, managed enough, consisting of a bed of clean straw a round deal table, and two three-legged stools. The whitewashed walls were ornamented with colored prints on Scripture subjects, framed & glazed; and a small looking-glass, placed in a position to secure the best light afforded by the little window, completed the decorations. Various were the conjectures formed by the villagers respecting this inoffensive though singular woman; and many were the stories circulated, all tending to keep alive the prejudice her eccentricities were calculated to excite.

A casual circumstance, which led to my becoming obliged to Anna, at length enabled me to overcome the suspicion and dislike with which our neighbor was regarded. Our acquaintance speedily ripened into friendship; for with the reaction natural to the generous, I felt as though I could never sufficiently compensate for my former injustice towards her. Often in an evening I would put on my bonnet, and, taking my work with me, go to spend a leisure hour with Dutch Anna; and on these occasions she generally entertained me with descriptions of her own country, and of the customs and manners of its inhabitants: or with striking anecdotes and incidents which had come under her own personal observation; never failing to draw some useful moral or illustrate some important truth from what she related. She could read well, and write a little—rare accomplishments in those days for one in her situation in life. Her powers of observation were extremely acute, and her memory retentive but what struck me as her most remarkable characteristics, were her sincere and unaffected piety, her undeviating truthfulness, and her extraordinary decision and fearfulness. When I have said on bidding her good night, "Anna, are you not afraid to be left alone here during the night, with no one within call?" she has replied, 'Afraid, Miss Mary! no how can I feel afraid knowing myself under the protection of One as great and powerful as He is wise and good! I am never alone, for God is ever present with me." After Anna had resided some years in this county; during which time she had, by her constant good conduct. gained the esteem of all who knew her, and, by her good nature and willingness to oblige, won the kindly feeling of even the most prejudiced, she became anxious to pay a visit to her native land; and as the accommodations for travelling at that period, besides being few, were costly, she obtained letters of recommendation from her employers and other gentlemen in the place to friends residing in different towns on her route, and set out, intending to perform the greater part of her land journey on foot. At the end of sevral months she returned, and quietly resumed her former mode of life. Not till fully a year after this period did she relate to me an adventure which had occurred to her on her journey homewards, and which I shall now transcribe:—

It was at the close of an autumn day that Anna, who had been walking since early morning with scarcely an interval of rest, found herself, in spite of her great capability of enduring fatigue, some-what foot-sore and weary on arriving at the town of——. As she passed along the streets, she observed an unusual degree of bustle and excitement: and, on inquiring the cause, found that a large detachment of soldiers, on their way to the continent, had arrived in the town that afternoon, and that some difficulty was experienced in finding them accommodation. This was not very agreeable news for Anna, tired as she was; however, she pursued her way to the house of the clergyman, where she had; in passing that way before, been hospitably entertained, hoping that there she might be able to procure a lodging, however humble. But in this she was disappointed; for though the good clergyman and his wife received her kindly, they could not offer her shelter for the night, as they had already more guests than they could conveniently accommodate. Anna would have been contented and thankful for a bed of straw by the kitchen fire; but even this they could not give, as the lower apartments were wanted by those who had been obliged to give up their beds.

At length, after some hesitation, the clergyman said, "I know but of one place where you could at this time find a lodging. You appear to be a woman of good courage, and if you dare venture, you may occupy a room in that house you see from this window. It is uninhabited, and has been so for some years, as it has the reputation of being haunted." Anna looked in the direction indicated, and saw through the deepening twilight a large two-storied house, built of a dull red brick, with stone copings standing at some distance from the high road. The house itself occupied a considerable extent of ground. being beautifully situated, with fronts to the south and west. The principal entrance was by folding-doors, half of which were glass; and the house was sheltered on the north and east by a grove of trees, whose branches now but thinly covered with leaves, waved mournfully to and fro in the night wind. "The last proprietor of that place," continued the clergyman "was a victim and depraved man whose very existence was a curse to the neighborhood in which he dwelt. At an early age he came into possession of a large property which he spent in the gratification of every base and lawless passio. His life, as far as I can learn, was one unmixed course of cruelty lust, and impiety, unredeemed by one noble aspiration, generous, unselfish action. He died suddenly, in the prime of life, in the midst of one of his riotous midnight orgies, and the house has ever since been deserted. It is said, and believed by our good townsfolks, that there he still holds revels, with fiends for his companions; and many affirm that they have heard the sound of their unearthly merriment, mingled with shrieks and wailing, borne upon the night breeze; whilst the few who have ventured within its walls, tell of shapes seen, and sounds heard, which would cause the stoutest heart to quail. For myself, I am no great believer in the supernatural, and have no doubt that imagination, united to the loneliness of the spot, and the strange freaks the wind plays through a large uninhabited house, have originated reports which we are sure would lose nothing in the recital; so if you are inclined to make the trial I will see that what is necessary is provieded, and I think I may venture to promise you an undisturbed night's rest.

Anna, as I have before said, was remarkable for her fearlessness; so she thanked the gentleman for his proposal, saing "that she had not the least fear of spirits, good or bad; that the former, if indeed they were ever visible to mortal eyes, could be but messengers of mercy; and for the latter, she could not conceive that a Being infinite in goodness whould ever permit them to revisit this earth for the sole purpose of terrifying and tormenting innocent individuals like herself; that she for more dreaded evil men than evil spirits; and that as; from the estimation in which the place was held, she should feel herself secure from them, she would thankfully accept his offer." As soon, therefore, as the necessary preparations were made, and Anna had partaken of the good substantial fare set before her, she begged to be allowed to retire to rest, as she was fatigued with her day's journey, and wished to set out again early the next morning. Her request was immediately complied with; the good clergyman himself insisting upon seeing her safely to her destination; when, having ascertained that proper provision had been made for her comfort and told her that refreshmant should be provided for her early next morning at his house, he bade her good night, and left her to repose. As soon as he was gone, Anna proceeded to take a more particular survey of her apartment. It was a large, but not very lofty room, panelled with oak, and having two windows looking across a wide lawn to the main road. The bright fire in the ample fireplace illuminated the richly-carved cornice with its grotesque heads and fanciful scroll-work. It had evidently been a dining-room, for some of the heavy furniture, in the fashion of the period in which it had been last inhabited, still remained. There were the massive table and the old-fashioned, high-backed chairs, with covers of what had once been bright embroidery, doubtless the work of many a fair hand; but what attracted her attention most was a picture over the chimneypiece. It was painted on the wooden panel; perhaps the reason it had never been removed, though evidently the work of no mean artist. It represented a scene of wild revelry. At the head of a table, covered with a profusion of fruits, with glasses and decanters of various elegant forms, stood a young man; high above his head he held a goblet filled to the brim with wine; excitement flashed from his bright blue eyes, and flushed the rounded cheek; light brown hair, untouched by powder, curled round the low narrow forehead; whilst the small sensual mouth expressed all the worst passions of our nature. Around the table sat his admiring parasites; young beauty and hoary age the strength of manhood and the earliest youth, were there, alike debased by the evidences of lawless passion. With what a masterhand had the painter seized upon the individual expression of each! There the glutton; and here the sot; now the eye fell on the mean pander or the roistering boon companion: now on the wit, looking with a roguish leer upon his fair neighbor, or the miserable wretch maudlin in his cups; and again on the knave profiting by the recklessness of those around him. The bright blaze of the fire lit up the different contenances with a vivid and life-like expression; and as Anna gazed, fascinated and spell-bound, her thoughts naturally reverted to what she had heard of the like and character of the last owner of the place. Was that youthful figure, so evidently the master of the revel, a portrait of the unhappy man himself who had thus unconsciously left behind him not only a memorial, but a warning. How often had the now silent halls echoed to to the brawl of the drunkard, the song of the wanton, the jest of the profane, the laugh of the scorner! It was here, perhaps in this very room that the dread hand of death had struck him; here he had been suddenly called to account for property misused, a life misspent. Saddened by these reflections; she turned from the picture, and taking her Bible from her bundle, she drew aside the tarnished curtains, and seated herself at one of the windows. The moon had by this time risen, and was shedding her soft light on the peaceful landscape without. The beauty of the scene soothed her excited feelings; and as she read, her mind resumed its accustomed serenity. Closing her book she prepared to retire to rest, first examining the doors, of which there were two the one by which she had entered, opening into the front hall, she found to be without a lock, or indeed any fastening at all the other, leading in an opposite direction she was unable to open. As, however, she was quite free from apprehension, she felt no uneasines from this circumstance; and commending herself to the care of her heavenly Father, she composed herself to rest, and soon fell soundly asleep.

(To be Continued.)

[Concluded from our Last]

'Surely you are not afraid to go to that beautiful place my sweet Lydia.

'No, dear mother, not afraid, but I shall want you in Heaven with me,' was the reply of the dying child.

"Mrs. Warrender looked towards me with an expression I shall never forget, then imprinting a kiss upon the fair child's brow, and motioning me to take her place by the bed-side, she rose and left us for a few minutes. When she returned she was calm, but a deadly palor had settled upon her face which never again left it. Two hours after the child had uttered those few words so thrilling to a mother's heart her pure spirit had departed.

"Mrs. Warrender's physical strength was unequal to the fearful struggle of feeling. She was conveyed to bed insensible and a succession of fainting-fits seemed to threaten the most alarming results. But towards eveing she recovered sufficiently to rise, and taking her seat beside the body never again left it till the last sad offices were performed. The intense heat of the weather rendered it necessary to bury the dead as early as possible on the following morning. Attired in one of her little night dresses, with a simple cap only half concealing her bright curls, Lydia looked as if she had only lain down to sleep. Never never did death wear a lovelier aspect. But when we assembled on deck just before sunrise, the beautiful child lay in her coarse shroud, and her sweet face no longer visible to our mournful gaze.

"I will not describe to you the solemnity of a funeral at sea. You have heard its details often before now, and this differed from others only in the peculiar interest which had been excited by the little creature who now lay stiff and cold before us. The mother leaned upon me while my husband read the beautiful service for the dead; her gaze was fixed upon the body as if her eyes could pierce the rude envelope which concealed her treasure from her view. But when the sailors, brushing a tear from their rough cheeks, raised the grating, every heart sunk as the subden plash of the water struck upon the ear; and the wretched mother, uttering a piercing cry, sunk upon her knees. We bore her to her berth, and she never again quitted it till we arrived at New-York. A breeze sprang up about an hour after the child's body had been consigned to the pitiless waters, and we were spared the pain of feeling ourselves moored above the grave.

"My whole time was now devoted to the suffering mother. She was evidently sinking fast, and I could not help attributing her resignation to her consciousnes of the approach of death. I once spoke to her of it, and her reply was very impressive:—'When I first learned my child's danger, I prayed that if it were consistent with the will of Providence, she might be spared to me. When I found that God had decreed my darling should be taken from me, I made a solemn contract in my own heart, that if she were saved from the physical bitterness ofdeath, I would never murmur, however I might weep. She died as gently as a rose falls from its stem, and I dare not fail in my promise to my Maker. He has mercifully given me strength, by affording me the hope of soon rejoining her in Heaven. Her last words are never absent from my thoughts, and I cannot help mingling earthly feeling with my aspiration after a better world. I picture to myself her little hands extended to clasp the mother, who so long delays to meet her, and the hour of death will be to me more welcome than the hour that gave her birth.,

"It was a strange, but beautiful fancy, which thus led the mother to feel that she held communion in thought with her lost darling. It may be, that some will censure this blending of earthly affections with heavenly hopes; but she who has ever wept above the bier of a beloved one, will have charity for this weakness. If there be any thing which can make the hope of Heaven dear to the worldly-minded, it is the belief that it is peopled by the heart's lost treasures. The vanity of self-knowledge—the pride of life—the pomps of the world—may all work together to make us indifferent, in the heyday of life, to the vague ideas of a Heaven of bliss, but let the affections be once fastened there, as to the abode of a God of Love, and the home of our dearest objects of tenderness, and it becomes the haven of our every hope.

"When the ship arrived at New York, Mrs. Warrender was too ill to reach her father,s house which was about two miles distant from the city. She was removed to our house, which had been for several weeks prepared for our reception; and there, surrounded by her family who had been summoned to her sick bed, she spent the few remaining days of her life. She expressed a wish to be buried in her native village. 'My mother lies there,' said she, 'and methinks I should like to rest beneath the same sod.' Tears came in her eyes as she spoke, and I knew she was thinking of the moaning waves where her daughter's little form reposed.

"In the little churchyard of N——,is a modest tomb of white marble bearing the name of Ellen Warrender, aged 21 years;' and the moss-pinks, which her own hands planted on her mother' grave are fast spreading themselves over her own.'

Brooklyn, L. I.

From the Presbyterian.

CHAPTER OF YOUNG MEN.

ALEXANDER, of Macedon, extended his powers over Greece, conquered Egypt, rebuilt Alexandria, overturn all Asia, and died at thirty-three years of age.

Hannibal was but twenty-six, when, after the fall of his father Hamilcar, and Asdrubal, his successor, he was chosen commander in chief of the Carthaginian army. At twenty-seven, he captured Saguntum from the Romans. Before he was thirty-four, he carried his arms from Africa into Italy, conquered Publius Scipio on the banks of the Licinus, routed Sempronius near the Trebia, defeated Flaminius on his approach to the Apenninese, laid waste the whole country, defeated Fabius Maximus and Varro, marched into Capua, and at the age of thirty-six was thundering at the gates of Rome.

Scipio Africanus was scarcely sixteen when he took an active part in the battle of Cannæ, and saved the life of his father. The wreck of the Roman cavalry chose him then for their leader, and he conducted them back to the capital. Soon after he was twenty, he was appointed proconsul of Spain, where he took New Carthage by storm. He soon after defeated, successively, Asdrubal (Hannibal's brother,) Mago, and Hanno; crossed into Africa, negotiating with Syphax, the Massaysylian king, returned to Spain, quelled the insurrection there, drove the Carthaginians wholly from the peninsula, returned to Rome, devised the diversion against the Carthaginians by carrying the war into Africa, crossed thither, destroyed the army of Syphax, compelled the return of Hannibal, and defeated Asdrubal a second time.

Charlemagne was crowned king of the Franks before he was twenty-six. At the age of twenty-eight he had conquered Aquitania and at the age of twenty-nine he made himself master of the whole German and French empires.

Charles XII., of Sweden, was declared of age by the States, and succeeded his farther at the age of fifteen. At eighteen he headed the expedition against the Danes, whom he checked; and with a fourth of their numbers he cut to pieces the Russian army, commanded by the Czar Peter, at Narva—crossed the Dwina, gained a victory over Saxony, and carried his army into Poland. At twenty-one, he had conquered Poland, and dictated to her a new sovereign. At twenty-four, he had subdued Saxony, and at twenty-seven he was conducting his victorious troops into the heart of Russia, when a severe wound prevented his taking command in person, and resulted in his overthrow and subsequent treacherous captivity in Turkey.

Lafayette was a major general in the American army at the age of eighteen; was but twenty when he was wounded at Brandywine; but twenty-two when he raised supplies for his army, on his own credit, at Baltimore; and but thirty-three when raised to the office of commander in chief of the National Guards of France.

Napoleon Bonaparte commenced his military career as an officer of artillery, at the age of seventeen. At twenty-four, he successfully commanded the artillery at Toulon. His splendid and victorious campaign in Italy was performed at the age of twenty-seven. During the next year, when he was about twenty-eight, he gained battle after battle over the Austrians in Italy, conquered Mantua, carried the war into Austria, ravaged the Tyrol, concluded an advantageous peace, took possession of Milan and the Venetian republic, revolutionized Genoa, and formed the Cisalpine Republic. At the age of twenty-nine, he received the command of the army against Egypt; scattered the clouds of Mameluke cavalry, mastered Alexandria, Aboukir and Cairo, and wrested the land of the Pharaohs and Ptolemies from the proud descendants of the prophet. At the age of thirty he fell among the Parisians like a thunderbolt, overthrew the dictatorial government; dispersed the council of five hundred, and was proclaimed first consul. At the age of thirty-one he crossed the Alps with an army, and destroyed the Austrians by a blow at Marango. At the age of thirty-two, he established the Code of Napoleon; in the same year he was elected consul for life by the people; and at the age of thirty three he was crowned emperor of the French people.

William Pitt, the first earl of Chatham, was but twenty-seven years of age when, as a member of Parliament, he waged the war of a giant against the corruptions of Sir Robert Walpole.

The younger Pitt was scarcely twenty years of age when with masterly power he grappled with the veterans of Parliament, in favour of America. At twenty-two he was called to the high and responsible trust of chancellor of the exchequer. It was at that age when he came forth in his might on the affairs of the East Indies. At twenty-nine during the first insanity of George III. he rallied around the Prince of Wales.

Edmund Burke, at the age of nineteen, planned a refutation of the metaphysical theories of Berkley and Hume. At twenty he was in the Temple, the admiration of its inmates for brilliancy of his genius and the variety of his acquisitions. At twenty-six he published his celebrated satire, entitled, "A Vindication of Natural Society." The same year he published his Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful—so much admired for its spirit of philosophical investigation and the elegance of its language. At twenty-five he was first lord of the treasury.

George Washington was only twenty-seven years of age when he covered the retreat of the British troops at Braddock's defeat; and the same year he was appointed commander in chief of all the Virginian forces.

General Joseph Warren was only twenty-nine years of age, when, in defiance of the British soldiers stationed at the door of the church, he pronounced the celebrated oration which aroused the spirit of liberty and patriotism that terminated in the achievement of independence. At thirty-four he gloriously fell, gallantly fighting in the cause of freedom, on Bunker Hill.

Alexander Hamilton was a lieutenant colonel in the army of the American revolution, and aid-de camp to Washington at the age of twenty. At twenty-five he was a member of Congress from New York; at thirty he was one of the ablest members of the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States. At thirty-one he was a member of the New York Convention, and joint author of the great work entitled the "Federalist." At thirty-two he was Secretary of the treasury of the United States, and arranged the financial branch of the government upon so perfect a plan, that no great improvement has ever been made upon it by his successors.

Thomas Haywood, of South Carolina, was but thirty years of age, when he signed the glorious record of the nation's birth, the Declaration of Independence; Elbridge Herry of Massachusetts, Benjamin Rush and James Wilson of Pennsylvania, were but thirty-one years of age; Matthew Thornton of New Hamshire, Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, Auther Middleton of North Carolina, and Thomas Stone of Maryland, thirty-three; and William Hooper of North Carolina, but thirty-four.

John Jay, at twenty-nine years old, was a member of the Revolutionary Congress, and being associated with Lee and Livingston, on the committee for drafting an address to the people of Great Britain, drew up that paper himself, which was considered one of the most eloquent productions of the time. At thirty-two he penned the old constitution New York, and in the same year was appointed chief justice of that State. At thirty-four he was appointed minister to Spain.

At the age of twenty-six Thomas Jefferson was a leading member of the Colonial Legislature in Virginia. At thirty he was a member of the Virginia Convention; at thirty-two, a member of Congress and at thirty-three, he drafted the Declaration of Independence.

Milton, at the age of 20, had written his finest miscellaneous poems, including his L'Allegro, Penseroso, Comus, and the most beautiful of Monodies.

Lord Byron, at the age of twenty, published his celebrated satire upon the English bards and Scotch reviewers; at twenty-four, the two first cantons of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage. Indeed, all the vast poetic treasures of his genious were poured forth in their richest profusion, before he was thirty-four years old; and he died at thirty-seven.

Mazart the great German musician, completed all his noble compositions before he was thirty-four years old, and died at thirty-five.

Pope wrote many of his published poems by the time he was sixteen years old; at twenty his Essay on Criticism; at twenty-one the Rape of the lock; and at twenty-five his great work, the translation of the Iliad.

Sir Isaac Newton had mastered the highest elements of the mathematics, and the anaytical method of Des Caries before he was twenty; had discovered the new method of infinite series, of fluxions, and his new theory of light and colours. At twenty-five he had discovered the new principles of the reflecting telescope, the laws of gravitation, and the planetary system. At thirty he occupied the mathematical chair at Cambridge.

Dr. Dwight's Conquest of Canaan was commenced at the age of sixteen, and finished at twenty-two. At the latter age, he composed his celebrated dissertation on the history, eloquence, and poetry of the Bible, which was immediately published and republished in Europe.

THE WOMAN OF THREECOWS.

'O WOMAN of Three Cows, agragh! don't let your tongue thus rattle!
'O don't be saucy, don't be stiff because you may have cattle.
I have seen—and, here's my hand to you, I only say what's true—
A many a one with twice your stock not half so proud as you.
Good luck to you, don't scorn the poor, and don't be their despiser,
For worldly wealth soon melts away, and cheats the very miser,
And Death soon strips the proudest wreath from haughty human brows;
Then don't be stiff, and don't be proud good Woman of Three Cows!
See where Momonia,s heroes lie, proud Owen More's descendants,
'T is they that won the glorious name, and had the grand attendants!
If they were forced to bow to Fate, as every mortal bows,
Can you be proud, can you be stiff, my Woman of Three Cows!
The brave sons of the Lord of Clare, they left the land to mourning;
Morrone! for they were banished, with no hope of their returning—
Who knows in what abodes of want those youths were driven to house!
Yet you can give yourself these' airs, O, Woman of Three Cows!
O, think of Donnell of the Ships, the Chief whom nothing daunted—
See how he fell in distant Spain, unchronicled, unchanted!
He sleeps, the great O'Sullivan, where thunder cannot rouse—
Then ask yourself, should you be proud good Woman of Three Cows!
O'Ruark, Maguire, those souls of fire, whose names are shrined in story—
Think how their high achievements once made Erin's greatest glory—
Yet now their bones lie mouldering under weeds and cypress boughs,
And so, for all your pride, will yours, O Woman of Three Cows!
Th' O'Carrolls also, famed when Fame was only for the boldest,
Rest in forgotten sepulchres with Erin's best and oldest:
Yet who so great as they of yore in battle or carouse!
Just think of that, and hide your head, goood Woman of Three Cows!
Your neighbor's poor and you, it seems, are big with vain ideas,
Because, inagh! you've got three cows, one more, I see, than she had;
That tongue of yours wags more at times than Charity allows,
But, if you're strong, be merciful, great Woman of Three Cows!

THE SUMMING UP

Now, there you go! You still, of course, keep up your scornful bearing,
And I'm too poor to hinder you; but, by the cloak I'm wearing,
If I had but four cows myself even though you were my spouse'
I'd thwack you well to cure your pride, my Woman of Three Cows!

Duffy's Irish Ballads.

COMMUNICATION.

FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

LIBERIA.

No. 2,

MESSRS EDITORS:—In a former letter, we tried to say something of our colony. How often too do we find emigrants, who think because they "are free," they should work no more, and when convinced by pinching want, that God does not rain bread upon the idle, in Africa, more than in America, long for the chain of the slave, or had as live have it as though they could only thrive at that point, where the temperature of industry, has its degrees told by the "Cowskin." Too ignorant and degraded though raised in a land of bibles, to know the difference between working for one's self, and laboring for a white master. Seeming to drown every sense of honor, "in them are big pones or corn bred and fat meal old mars or mis use to go us. Thank God, those who are too idle to work, and too stupid, to change these opinions soon become nuisance, and go the way of all trash. The well bred man of good sense, though he may not know the first letter in the alphabet, soon sees (no matter what his opinions might have been) that his labour is his own, and resolves to maintain himself, and enjoy liberty too. Others though illiterate [as most of us are] take wide views, looks upon his neighbour as well as himself, and thence upon the country at large, as though nature had stamped his heart with public spirit, as well as self love. They not only see that all their labour is their own, every improvement belongs to themselves and children, good sound sense and industry tells them to go forward, and they obey looking upon Liberia as theirs, and the home of their children. Its strength their safety. Its wealth their property, and its prosperity their glory, and the salvation from degradation of their children. Such men as these though they cannot read a word and perhaps never thought of writing, and perhaps spent much of their time in slavery, are an honor to any country, that would allow them equality. There are some of this stamp in Liberia, men "worth their weights in gold." They are industrious men who look forward, who love their children. Such men are not only good citizens, but, patriotic colonists. One thousand of them would make the soil, and the ship declare Liberia independent without a human declaration. As the hope of Liberia's glory, present as well as future glory rising before such men it beckons them onward. They enjoy "freedom" in every true sense of that word. They love our laws, because they are wholesome, they are ours made by legislators of our choice. They love liberty for what it is in and of itself.

Free from that oppression worse if possible than that of Israel in Egypt under which he once groaned, the industrious public spirited man seizes and holds fast the hope of elevating not only his own, but the name and character of his country. With life, Liberty and the persuit of happiness with and before him, with a right view of these things, what can hinder this colony from prospering! Or such men from being freemen. It is a startling truth unless it has become "a new thing under the sun," that there is not a free blackman from Georgia to Maine. No nor in the whole United States! Nor will there be very soon, if we must judge from "the signs of the times." "The Gospel was to free the slave of the United States," but we are told that "slavery is becoming a baptised child of holy scripture" "strengthening, and tightning her chains," listening not for one moment to the Abolitionists jargon, of amalgamation and of Negro equality, the only two hopes of the blackman ever becoming a free man in the United States. The Abolitionists after all their talk, are sitting as strong guards to keep those two hopes from being realized as the veriest slave holder of the southern states. So we believe.

What number of the so called free states [for that we dont know] has made them equal in every point short of which they are not on; equality, n t equally free, What abolitionist has carried out his principle or showed his declaration [that he has no respect of color] to be true, giving his daughter to a negro husband, his son to a negro wife? emminating his grand children, showing example as well as precept to the slave states.

A real unprejudiced white man we have yet to look upon, unless it may be the Hon. Mr. Gray, who followed a colored woman and his children to Liberia, married her and lived and died happy. There, are those who plaster the poor ignorant colored mans eyes with the empty name of liberty. Stretch out artificial rain bows, and set the negro to running after the philosophers stone." Liberty which they say is at the end of it which "bow" they move as fast as he runs, still feeding the poor black with such sickly talk as freedom in America, "a sounding brass" in the hands of an enemy.

We are glad that we are able to say, that there are a few hundred freemen in Liberia. If in the eyes of any man our constitutional connexion, with a great if not the greatest philanthopic society that ever lived, makes us not a free people, a word can alter that. Liberia has the power to ask, the power to receive, or take, the Col. Society, the will to sever any union that whould degrade us, at any moment. A constitution continually lays before us that if we are not now and we feel we are, and see we are, we can adopt and be a people. Jehovah, gave Africa to the colored race, God planted and will water and cause to thrive this "sweet home" of the colored man, and he will do it, despite the sheep skin covering, of its enemies. First the emigrantion of free, secondly the gradual emancipation of the slave black man, thirdly the union of African Tribes, with Liberia now becoming so general a desire among our natives some of whom have made application and become in part united already, and by our own children, goodly numbers of whom to our everlasting delight, gambol in our streets, fill our schools and assist us at our work, all of whom are as free as the air they breathe, never saw the chain, and as much as they are learning, cannot learn, or understand, the words slave or slavery,

'Slaves cannot breathe" in Liberia.
"If they touch our coast their shackels
Fall," and fall for ever, Liberia will live for ever.

Opposite the new settlement Virginia on the East side of the St. Pauls is Caldwell, extending seven miles up the St. Pauls what is called Lower Caldwell is the township. Upper Caldwell is that part extending along the banks of the river upward in ten acre farm lots, laying side by side parallel with the banks of the river. We left the canoe at lower Caldwell and walked along the clean street to Upper Caldwell. It is not so populous, by one third as it was twelve years ago, from various reasons, death and removal the chief. Several persons have made Caldwell an unhealthy place, and if it is Millsburg, New Georgia, Monrovia, are all unhealthy because people die, mortality at Caldwell has however been handed out to the world, as originating from the "swamp" with which it is infested by effluvia &c. &c. This we have always thought a mistake, made from want of experience or knowledge of the place. As we have had the honor of living at both Lower and Upper Caldwell for several years, and sincerely love to look around us. We will also give our opinion in this matter, with some little experience to help us.

From Lower to Upper Caldwell the land is not low, the river presents on both sides a beautiful elevated bank, which gradually rises for some hundreds of yards back, and then presents a plain surface. There are but few not very extensive swamps and they are not very near the river, being two three and four miles off, excepting it may be a small pond of water, and one or two spots hardly large enough for potato patches in the dry season. In the rear of Caldwell are extensive prairies or "Old Fields" of high grass, the soil of which is a rich black sandy mould, never looked upon as unhealthy and if rotten grass be inclined to make them so, these fields are burned off every year, by natives, lightning, or some such course and effluvia from rotten grass is thus put out of the question. Unfortunately for the inhabitants of Caldwell, Millsburg, and New Georgia, their first settlers or the great mass of them from some droll cause "working by sight" on the bird in hand principle" turned their attention to sawing plank, and getting timber, instead of tilling the soil which seemed to be looked upon as a kind of contemptable employment in these days, fit only for "a native" from whom they purchased all their bread, and vegetables, meat too, except American provisions, and thus became in one sense the servants of those they thought so low, for the natives carried off the funds of their labor, in exchange for rice, cassado, plantains, bannanas, poultry, venison, &c. &c. We think that Mr. N. Dosia informed me, that upon seeing all his labor carried off by a few contemptable American cassava planters and the natives he was one of the first few sawyers who resolved degrading or not, not to be so beholding to others for bread, and broke a while from the saw each season and planted their little cassado patches which helped "a masingly" and brought as much money as timber, one after another by degrees adopted the same plan, but to a very limited extent.

This timber business is what has to some great extent crippled Caldwell, Millsburg, New Georgia. Men hardly acclimated, and born in another country, reared up healthy farmers, were in those days, in both seasons in the woods, exposed to the sun in the dry, and to the continual pouring of the rain in the wet season, two three four and often six and seven miles from home, where ever they could find a swamp or creek, sawing all day, month after months in water very often waist deep, and floating logs, sleeping night after night in their same wet apparel, as though God designed men to become fish, or even amphibious animals, lifting logs and carrying for miles horse loads of plank and timber on their heads and backs, thus breaking their constitutions bringing on a pleurcsy, consumption, perhaps sleepy disease, plunging themselves into untimely graves, not living out half their days. It would be no wonder to me had all who followed it died. We have known but few deaths in these places but could be traced back to the causes alone mentioned. And this sawing in the rains is still carried on by a few, who little as they think it, are finding a speedy grave. If men will saw, let them do it in the dry season out of the mud—when it is two dry to plant, and let them saw in the shade, it may then be a healthy employment. Most of the few that never followed sawing are living and doing well this day, one proof of what we have been saying. Thank God the people of these colonies and of these towns above mentioned, have seen their evil, many of them when too far gone have lamented it, and have turned their attention to one of the two things needful, the cultivation of the soil. Though it is to be lamented that beside our merchant farmers of Monrovia, so few in the Messurado county, look at all beyond the present gain arising from cassado, potatoes, and a few other vegetables, leaving coffee, arrow-root, sugar-cane, cayenne pepper, ginger &c. &c., out of the question, making too little provision for their children by profitable example. We must say in honor to Upper Caldwell, that it has one or two farmers who are so far as they do go, go a head men, and for several years in one season of the year, has feed for the money almost one twentieth of Montserrada county. Lower Caldwell too has one or two pretty go a head planters, who prove that the "hand of the diligent maketh rich" and if two men can thus do, what might not fifty such accomplish. It would be good for Liberia, especially if they raised such things as were fit for exportation, and which ships, plow the deep to convey from other lands, and they can do it. It would be good, if every merchant, was a farmer also, every carpenter, blacksmith, rock-mason, doctor, lawyer, preacher, the (Governor himself is now,) all should add to their professions and some are trying, the word farmer or rather the business of farming. We know that a few fools look upon this as a contemptible business and so do they every thing else, but running in the country with a bar or two of tobacco, growing very famous in that kind of honor, that debts bring upon their high personage. For we do not believe there is a respectable factor in Liberia, who does not begin to feel that it would be no dishonor, to lay hand on the soil also, and how to treat respectable men that distinguish themselves at the business, as the pillars of Liberia.

A. F. RUSSELL.

Golah Sept. 8th, 1846.

MESSRS EDITOR,—In the last number of the Luminary I was grieved to see an article which is calculated to excite strife and contention. The Benevolent Societies of this town having similar societies in other countries for their example, make it a rule to make known to the public annually what they have done during the year, and to solicit donations in aid of their funds. This I believe is done every where by all sorts of societies—whether Missionary—charitable or literary.

The individuals composing these societies have thought proper to habit themselves on such occasions in clean and decent clothing, and also as an unequivocal expression of union in a common cause to affix on their left breast the motto of the society printed on satin. And they have further been accustomed to invite a few friends to take a cup of tea with them on the evening of their annual day.

Now if their going to church and publishing what they have done during the year be symptomatic of hypocrisy, I am sure they can find but little in this circumstance to disturb them—as the category in which it places them includes all the Missionary societies in the world and all the missionaries besides!! In respect of clean and decent apparel. The motto of one of these societies of this town is "Whatsoever things are lovely"—and from among the things which are lovely they will hardly be persuaded or ridiculed to exclude clean and decent apparel.

In respect to the motto printed on white satin—and worn on the left breast I cannot for my life see how it displays or indicates vanity—any more than a man would give symptoms of vanity who having paid a small sum into a religious or charitable institution should have the same emblazoned on paper, set in a frame and hung upon the wall, for all who choose to read it. Indeed the latter symptom would be more unequivocal of the two—it would in fact be a fixed and settled disease, while the former could be characterized only as an occasional symptom.

Lastly. The sumptuous entertainments. Here the Ladies have nothing to fear. The category in which this places them, is a long one and an honorable one. The centennary tea-parties among the Methodists and the Pastor-visits among the Baptists are sufficient examples—and such is my deference for rank and education that I would sooner trust to their sense of propriety and decorum than to that of any man in Africa.

To conclude. I hold that every minister of the gospel should on all proper occasions express himself decidedly in regard to maxims and fashions of a dubious or equivocal moral character. This he is bound to do if he would not be found unfaithful to his sacred trust. But it is clear he defeats his purpose when he comes forth with the weapons of the cynic or the satirist. Those are not the weapons allowhim—the moment he grasps them he palsies his right arm. His weapons on such occasions are affectionate remonstrance and earnest expostulation. These will melt and sub lue—the others will harden and irritate & throw the supposed delinquent on the defensive. I close with the expression of an opinion very generally entertained, that the sarcastic and contemptuous remarks in the Luminary, in reference to those societies would not have appeared, if the females who composed them had not been colored.

I am Messrs Editors,
Yours &c.
AFRICA.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. NOVEMBER 20 1846

Captured.—A few days ago a slaver was taken between Shebar and Gallinas with five hundred and sixty slaves—which was augmented to five hundred and one by a birth which took place a few moments after the captors gained the deck. A decretion however soon occurred, as five of the unhappy wretches died before morning. Some idea may be formed of the way in which the slavers do the business, from the admission of the captain of the slaving vessel to the prize officer—that in four hours from the time he let go his anchor, he had taken in wood, water, and slaves, and was standing to sea.

On the 12th inst. the Ladies Benevolent Society of Monrovia celebrated their eleventh anniversary at the Baptist Church in this town. We give below the Annual report of the Society in which we find one cheering fact—namely that cases of poverty and suffering in the colony are on the decrease. Among the causes of this favourable and gratifying change the more general attention of the people to agriculture is undoubtedly entitled to a conspicuos place. Indeed the ordinary productions of Liberia farmers go begging for purchasers and frequently beg in vain. This betokens good.

After the ceremonies at Church. the Ladies returned to the residence of the Vice Directress Mrs. J. J. Roberts for the election of officers. At 7 oclock P. M. the Ladies took tea with a few select friends at the house of Col. B. P. Yates

THE TWELFTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE LADIES BENEVOLENT SOCIETY OF MONROVIA.

It is good to persevere in a good cause. This fact has cheered the society on under all discouragements [illegible]. In presenting to our friends, and to the public at large this the twelth Annual Report of the Benevolent Society the committee feel it a duty first to record their gratitude to Almighty God from whom come both the will and the ability to perform any thing good and acceptable, for the favour He hath vouchsafed during the past year.

Since our last annual meeting the Society has been called to mourn the death of one of its members. Frances Teage was one of the original members of this Society, and from its formation up to the time of her death, she failed not to give to it and to the object it has in view her constant attendance and firmest support. But her work is finished and we trust she is now enjoying that reward which will be infallibly graciously granted to all who faithfully perform their duties here.

In the year which has past the society has been able to accomplish but little in comparison of the number whose condition made strong appeals to its charity. For although the committe feel themselves warranted in saying that this unfortunate class of our population has undergone considerable decrease within the last year, yet the number is still too large for all its wants to be met by any means within reach of the Society. The committee will not undertake to assign the causes of this decrease, they will only mention the fact upon the authority of their own observation. Still there is many a helpless widow over whom charity weeps and pitty drops a tear; many to be able to relieve whom, it would gladden the hearts of members.

In respect of the state of the upper settlements your committee have no definite information, as the operations of the Society during the past year have been confined to this settlement. It is believed however, that the remark already made in relation to the decrease in the number of the poor and helpless in this town, is applicable to that class of persons in the upper settlements. Still there are those there whose case appeals strongly to the hand of the charitable and benevolent.

Among the applications made to the Society for relief the distributing committe have sometimes found no little difficulty in discriminating between those cases which were the result of idleness, improvidence and vice and those, the offspring of real and unavoidable misfortune. The limited resources of the Society as well as other considerations have forced it upon the rule to which it intends rigidly to adhere, to discourage and turn from the former class of applicants and to give its attention wholly to the latter.

The field for the operations of charity in this and the surrounding settlements is ample to employ the energies of this and all the other kindred Societies of this Town.

In order to explain the apparent inconsistency between the amounts in hand and the amount expended it will only be necessary to state, the cherished object of the Society is, to erect a house, where a few women may be received and properly attended to. Who will aid in this good work?

Amount expended since last Meeting	$ 40 62 1.2
Amount of cash now in Treasury	115 25.
27 yards cloth and 21 handkerchiefs.

DIED,

On the 19th inst. Rev. A. W. Anderson, after an illness of twelve hours. Mr. Anderson was Pastor of the Baptist Church in Caldwell, but resided in this town; and afforded much service in the way of preaching to the Church here. Mr. A. is said to have been in perfect health at nine of the clock on the evening of the 9th. He retired to bed at his usual hour; and in a few minutes afterward was heard to say my head—my head! which he commenced chafing with a corner of the sheet. In less than a quarter of an hour he lost the power of speech and died at 9 o'clock next morning. The notice to depart was short, and death executed his office with fearful promptitude? A loud admonition to all to be ready for we know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh. We will receive with pleasure a more extended biographical notice of Mr. Anderson, should any of his friends be disposed to contribute one.

At Sinoe, Greenville, a few days ago, Mr. Leuster of the Bremen brig Gazelle. He was cut off by a stroke of apoplexy.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

NOTICE.

NEW GOODS, Flour. Pork, Beef, Tobacco and Blue Baffs, for sale. American and foreign dry goods, both staple and fancy, varied by and with every modern improvement, in price quality and fashion. The same may be said of lots of bonnets and shoes, &c. &e. &c., too tedious to mention. The above named assortment was purchased for cash, and therefore will be only sold for cash or produce down on the nail on the fairest terms.

EDWARD J. ROYE.
Monrovia June 10th 1846.

WANTED, by the subcriber 1000 bushels of peanuts very dry and in good order for shiping for which goods will be given at the lowest price.

E. J. ROYE.

ALSO Products of the soil that will bear shiping hitherto not exported together with every species of rare animals, birds, shells, or phenomens, of this portion of the Globe.

E. J. ROYE.

NEW SUPPLIES, Flour, sugar, pork, beef, fish. & dry goods &c. recently bought & for sale at my usual low prices.

E. J. ROYE.

Monrovia Nov. 5 th 1846

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to all persons who are indebted to H. Teage Esq. insolvent debtor, that they are required to make immediate payment to the subscriber, as indulgence cannot be given.

DIXON B. BROWN.
Trustee for the Creditors.
Nov. 19th 1846.

NOTICE.

THE First term of the School under the patronage of the Ladies Society of New York, will commence on the first thursday in December next, in the lower room of the building next to the Printing Office of the M. E. Mission.

We wish all who have entered their names for the first quarter to be punctual in their attendance at the opening of the School, if they are not we shall be obliged to cross off their names to give place to others who have made application; and cannot be received for the want of a room sufficiently large to accomamodate them.

The design of this institution is to educate the youths of this county for practical usefulness while every accomplishment is kept in view tending to polish the manners and refine the taste.

Books stationary &c. can be optained from the teacher at moderate prices.

B. V. R. JAMES.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

Strange Coincidences.—The Paris Courier Francais states that lately a statesman and academician, in the course of a conversation which took place in the library of the National Institute observed that in the middle of each century for the last five hundred years, some great social crisis had occurred in Europe. "In 1440," said he, "it was the art of printing which created a revolution. In 1550, it was Luther who shook the foundation of Catholicity. In 1650 it was Bacon and Descartes who demolished the infallibility of Aristotle. In 1750, it was philosophy which triumphed and prepared the revolution of 1789. We approach the year 1850, and it is evident society is preparing to undergo a fundamental renovation.

POETRY.

From the Living Age.

"THE HOST OF GOD."

"And Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him. And when Jacob saw them, he said, This is God's host; and he called the name of that place Mahanaim."—Gen. xxxii 1,2.

"The Host of God!" from whence came they,
And whither are they bound?
Are they of those that watch by day,
And keep their nightly round?
Come they from realms celestial, sent
On God's high message here?
Guide they the nightly firmament?
Guide they the rolling sphere?

"The Host of God!"—How seemed that show,
In heavenly pomp arrayed?
Marched they in bright angellic row,
With glittering wings displayed?
Or were they clad in flesh and bone,
Like children of the earth,
While but their stately step and tone
Betrayed their glorious birth?

"The Host of God!"—How did they greet
Our faint and wandering sire?
Passed they his train with flying feet,
And chariot wheels like fire?
Or did they cheer his spirit there
Amid that desert lone—
Tell him that granted was his prayer,
His secret sorrows known?

"The Host of God!"—How wild the thought,
That lowly man should meet,
'Mid the drear realms of wolf and goat
The step of holy feet;
Whence come they—whither go—is dark;
Their purpose, all unknown!
Yet shine they as a meteor spark
Through midnight darkness thrown.

Still may they wheel their bright career
By lonely rock or tree,
Had we the Patriarch's ear to hear,
His holy eye to see!
The desert wild, the crowded way,
By heavenly step is trod;
Through earth and air—by night by day—
Walks still—"The Host of God!"

MISCELLANEOUS

A PROCLAMATION.

By the General Commanding the Army of the United States of America.

To the People of Mexico—After many years of patient endurance, the United States are at length constrained to acknowledge that a war now exists between our government and the government of Mexico. For many years our citizens have been subjected to repeated insults and injuries, our vessels and cargoes have been seized and confiscated, our merchants have been plundered, maimed, imprisoned, without cause, and without reparation. At length your government acknowledged the justice of our claims, and agreed by treaty to make satisfaction by payment of several millions of dollars; but this treaty has been violated by your rulers, and the stipulated payments have been withheld. Our late effort to terminate all difficulties by peaceful negotiation has been rejected by the Dictator Paredes, and our Minister of Peace, whom your rulers had agreed to receive, has been refused a hearing. He has been treated with indignity and insult, and Paredes has announced that war exists between us. This war, thus first proclaimed by him, has been acknowledged as an existing act by our President and Congress, with perfect unanimity, and will be prosecuted with vigor and energy against your army and rulers; but those of the Mexican people who remain neutral will not be molested.

Your government is in the hands of tyrants and usurpers. They have abolished your State governments, they have overthrown your federal constitution, they have deprived you of the rights of suffrage, destroyed the liberty of the press, despoiled you of your arms, and reduced you to a state of absolute dependence upon the power of a military Dictator. Your army and rulers extort from the people by grievous taxation, by forced loans and military seizures, the very money which sustains the usurpers in power. Being disarmed, you were left defenceless, an easy prey to the Savage Comanges, who not only destroy your lives and property, but drive into captivity, more horrible than death itself, your wives and children. It is your military rulers who have reduced you to this deplorable condition. It is these tyrants, and their corrupt and cruel satelites, gorged with the people's treasure, by whom you are thus oppressed and impoverished; some of whom have boldly advocated a monarchial government, and would place a European Prince upon the throne of Mexico. We come to obtain a reparation for repeated wrongs and injuries; we come to obtain indemnity for the past, and security for the future; we come to overthrow tyrants who have destroyed your liberties, but we come to make no war upon the people of Mexico, nor upon any form of free government they may choose to select for themselves.

It is our wish to see you liberated from despots, to drive back the savage Comanches to prevent the renewal of their assaults, and to compel them to restore to you from captivity, your long lost wives and children.

Your religion, your altars and churches, the property of churches and citizens, emblems of your faith and its ministers shall be protected, and remain inviolate. Hundreds of our army and hundreds of thousands of our people are members of the Catholic Church. In every State and in nearly every city of our Union, Catholic Churches exist, and the Priests preform their holy functions, in peace and security, under the sacred guarantee of our constitution. We come among the people of Mexico as friends and republican brethren, and all who receive us as such, shall be protected, whilst all who are seduced into the army of your Dictator, shall be treated as enemies. We shall want from you nothing but food for our army, and for this you shall always be paid in cash the full value. It is the settled policy of your tyrants to deceive you in regard to the policy and character of our Government and people. These tyrants fear the example of our free institutions, and constantly endeavor to misrepresent our purposes, and inspire you with a hatred for your republican brethren of the American Union. Give us but the opportunity to undeceive you, and you will soon learn that all the representations of Paredes were false, and were only made to induce you to consent to the establishment of a despotic Government.

In your struggle for liberty with the Spanish monarcy, thousands of our countrymen risked their lives and shed their blood in your defence. Our own Commodore, the gallant Porter, maintained in triumph your flag upon the ocean, and our Government was the first to acknowledge your independance. With pride and pleasure we enrolled your name to the list of independent Republics, and sincerely desired that you might in peace and prosperity enjoy all the blessings of free government. Success on the part of your tyrants against the army of the Union is impossible, but if they could succeed, it would only be to enable them to fill your towns with their soldiers, eating out your subsistence, and harrassing you with still more grievous taxation. Already they have abolished the liberty of the press, as the first step towards the introduction of that Monarchy, which it is their real purpose to proclaim and establish.

Mexicans, we must treat as enemies and overthrow the tyrants, who whilst they have wronged and insulted us, have deprived you of your liberty, but the Mexican people, who remain neutral during the contest, shall be protected against their military despots, by the Republican Army of the Union,

Z. TAYLOR,
Brevet Major Gen'l U. S. A. Comd'g.

A PARABLE.

The untoward circumstances of the poor man's life were very wretched. When he rose early from his bed, it was to spend hours of weary, unelevating, ill-requited toil. His meals were unsavory, and barely sufficient to support the exertion he was forced to undergo. He returned at night to a bleak, miserable hut, where a scanty fire rather tantalized him with its glimmering than warmed him with its heart. The wind, with cheerless sound, shook his broken windows. Yet did the poor man no seek the ale-house parlor, with its crackling hearth and its loose companions; but remained in his dreary home, as though it had been a paradise, and the thought of returning to it cheered him through the hours of labor. What was the charm of this lonely—yes, it was lonely—and miserable dwelling?

A friend of the poor man had given him a talisman, made by a great magician and this talisman gives the answer to our question. Truly a wondrous talisman, that could be set in force every evening. By its virtue, the dilapidated room assumed all sorts of beautiful forms. Sometimes it would change to a princely hall, and the holes in the walls would enlarge, and arch themselves into Gothic windows, through which the light cast gorgeous colors upon the Mosaic floor. Then this would vanish, and the poor man would find himself in a fine country, through which streams flowed sparkling in the sun, while his view was bounded by tall hills, verdant with grass, and distinctly marked with wild flowers; or melting away, pale with distance, into the clear blue of the sky. Nor was the virtue of the talisman confined to exhibitions that might be found in actual life. Now the owner of it would seem to sink below the surface of the sea, where sea nymphs would exhibit their wondrous treasures; now he would penetrate into the bowels of the mountain, and perceive the gnomes at at their fantastic labors; now the hand of time would for him be turned back, and he would converse with the sages and warriors of antiquity; and a song would swell upon his ears, such as might have been sung in old Hellas. What marvel was it that the poor man loved the dwelling in which such wonder and delight were revealed?

Thinkest thou, reader, that what we have written is a phantasy—a short fairy tale? Not at all: we have been narrating a fact of frequent occurrence. The talisman was a book—what is commonly called a "book of fiction" nothing more, and the imagination of the poor man, when he read it, was so stimulated, that a number of gorgeous creations concealed the miseries of actual life.

Ye who inveigh against "fiction," think ye that the world is so beautiful to all its inhabitants that the imagination must be chained and tied down, lest it adorn and beautify it more? Think you that the thing ye call "fact" is so holy that it ought to engross all the faculties of man, and that he may not dream of aught beyond? Truly, if it is but to a few that the real beauty of the world is revealed; and even they speak of these revelations either in what you call "fiction," or they are philosophers, such as you style dreamers.

A large glass are those dreamers. To feel that one has a power within that can free itself from the power without—to stretch the pinions of the soul, and to shake off the earthly dust that cleaves to them—to assert one's right to be a denizen of a fair country, that the tyrant cannot encircle with walls, nor the bigot defile with hatred;—this it is to be a dreamer.

We may mourn, now and then, that some of us are awake.—Jerrold's Magazine.

TO THE HUMANE—HARD CASE.—The present appeal to the kind-hearted public is made by the friends of a decayed gentleman, who has seen better days. The applicant, Mr. Dan, was formerly in affluent circumstances, but was unfortunately induced to connect himself with a speculation called Repeal; the utter failure of which has brought him into his present difficulties. Mr. D. has lately been deriving a precarious subsistence from an income of only twenty thousand pounds a year! chiefly given by the poorest of the Irish peasantry; but the failure of the potato crop will lessen even this small pittance. The applicant is now reduced to travel with four horses, and can afford to entertain no more than thirty persons every day at his public table; and though his friends in Ireland now and then give him a meal, yet it must be evident to any gentleman that, to keep a pack of harriers, to maintain three establishments, and the expense of making his affecting case known through the newspapers, must make him even more dependant than formerly on the charits of the public.

As to his character, Mr. D. begs to refer to his old friends, Whig & Co.; also to the gaoler at the penitentiary, and the Times' commissioner; by whom the smallest donations will be thankfully received for him; as also by

J. Tuam, Esq. ——Sobrien.

And at the Conciliation Hall.—Punch.

The First Man of the Day.—The next edition of the "Vestiges of Creation" will be dedicated to the immortal Widdicomb, in grateful return for some new facts he has communicated to the author. They relate principally to the fact of the moon on the Colosseum being a slice of the one he recollects when he was master of the ceremonies at the amphitheatre at Rome.—Punch.

SAXON REVENGE.—"England's weakness," says Mr. O'Connell "Is Ireland's opportunity." We would reverse the maxim. Ireland's weakness is the opportunity of England; and we hope that England will take it—to help her. When her potatoes are gone let us give her bread. But let us take special care that it shall be, literally, bread. Let us relieve her in kind; but not trust her with a penny of cash; at least while her Agitator keeps a begging box.—Punch.

THE IRON MARKET.—The demand for iron for the railroads is being sensibly felt in the feverish state of sacucepans, which have risen to an alarming height within the last few weeks. A good teakettle, which was quoted in the New Cut as low as ninepence, a month ago, has rushed up to a shilling without the coupon, that is to say, with no lid to it. The buoyancy in gridirons has been quite frightful; for their resemblance to railway lines has made them the object of competition among various companies. Pokers were dreadfully firm, without the smallest propability of their yielding; and there being no chance of their giving way, there was a good deal of activity. With the exception, however, of pokers there was very little stirring; for irons were flat, and people seemed afraid of burning their fingers. A little was done in frying-pans at the beginning of the day, but there was no disposition to play for a very great stake, as there formerly used to be.—Punch.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

The following statement of an actual occurrence, (says the New York American,) translated for that paper from the Deutsche Schnellpost, well exemplifies how unjustly a combination of circumstances may sometimes accuse a man:

"At a table d'hote at Lubwigsburgh, one of the company was showing a very rare gold coin, which was passed round the table on a plate and gave rise to many suppositions as to its age, country, value &c. The conversation then gradually branched off to other subjects till the coin was forgotten, and on the owner asking for it back, to the surprise of all it was not to be found. A gentleman sitting at the foot of the table was observed to be in much agitation and as his embarrassment seemed to increase with the continuance of the search, the company were about to propose a very disagreeable measure when suddenly a waiter entered the room, saying, 'Here is the coin—the cook has just found it in one of the finger glasses, The relief to all was manifest! and now the suspected stranger spoke for the first time as follows:

'Gentlemen, none of you can rejoice more than myself at the recovery of the coin; for, picture to yourselves my painful situation: by a singular coincidence, I have a duplicate of the very same coin in my purse! (here showing it to the company.) The idea that, on the personal search which would probably be proposed, I would be taken for a purloiner of the coin, added to the fact that I am a stranger here, with no one to vouch for my integrity, had almost driven me distracted. The honesty of the cook, and lucky accident has saved my honour.'

"The friendly congratulations of the company soon effaced the remembrance of their unjust suspicions."

ON THE ARRANGEMENT OF THE SEASONS IN THE PLANETARY WORLDS.

THE annual and diurnal motions of the aterth are of great advantage to us; and we may presume that the rest of the planets have the same advantages. Though the motion of Mercury and saturn cannot be observed it is very probable that, like the other planets, they turn on their own axis. The planets all move round round the sun; and the secondary planets move round their primary ones. Now as the seasons of the year, and day and night are constantly produced by the motion of the earth we may safely conclude that the same changes are produced on the other planets. Venus turns on her own axis in thirty-three hours and a half: the revolution of Mars is completed in twenty-four hours and a quarter; Jupiter finishes his in ten hours and the moon in twenty-eight days. Now if their days be divided into twenty-four equal parts, like ours the hours of Venus will be something shorter, and those of Mars something longer than those on our globe. But those of Jupiter will not be half so long as ours. An hour in moon must be longer than one of our whole days. It is to be remarked too, that the position of the planets, like that of the earth, is inclined: whence it follows, that during their course round the sun their poles are sometimes more and sometimes less enlightened. Hence it extremely probable that their revolutions and changes resemble those of the earth; and may we not conclude therefore, that they are filled with rational and brute inhabitants! The planets all resemble the earth are warmed and enlightened by the same sun and have their day and night winter and summer. And what end would all this answer, if they be not inhabited? How immense then must be the dominions of the Lord! These are parts of his ways but how little a portion of them is known! When we reflect on the works of the adorable Jehovah, whose glory is displayed in all worlds, may it kindle in our minds sentiments of the most profound veneration and esteem!—Sturm.

A Fish Trap.—The New Haven Register gives an accout of the latest Yankee notion, in the shape of a patent spring hook. By a very delicate but ingenious machine, as soon as a fish attempts to nibble the bait on the hook, a second hook comes down and catches him on the back of the head, and he is a "gone sucker."—N. Y. Sun.

USE OF TIME.—It is stated in the recent biographical sketch of the late Mr. Legare, that he never lost an hour. This will be found true of nearly or quite all the most eminent men. A late European journalist states of Mr. Merle D'Aubigne, the author of the History of the Reformation that he had established a rule never to receive company until after three o'clock in the afternoon. Such men appreciate the fact that the improvement of time is the great source of mental wealth.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR. (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) DECEMBER 4 1846. NO. 4

THE LIBERIA HERALD

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the 1st and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, FIFTY CENTS.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD IN AFRICA.

Gov't Agt. Monrovia,	Jas. N. Lewis.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. F. Dayton.
Latrobe,	Rev. Jas. Moore
Sinoe,	Mr. P. Minor,
Cape Palmas	Dr. S. F. Mc.
Sierra Leone,	Jno. Tho[illegible]

UNITED STATES.

Gov't Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. Jno. P. Proud.
Portsmouth Virginia	Rev. W. Mann,
Boston,	W. De Lacy, Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. Crane,
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. Allen,
New York,	Rev. S. H. Cox,
Boston,	Rev. Joseph Dow,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. Corrinton

LIBERIA HERALD.

(Continued from our Last.)

How long she had slept she could not tell, when she was awoke by what seemed to her the confused sounds of song and merriment. So deep had been her sleep, that it was some time before she could rouse herself to a recollection of her situation. When however, she had done so: she raised herself in bed and listened; all was silent, save that the night, having become rather gusty, the wind at intervals swept moaningly round the deserted mansion. The fire was almost out but the candle in the lantern which stood by her bedside shed a feeble light upon the oaken floor; and the moon, though occasionally overcast was still high in the heavens. Readily concluding the disturbance to have been wholly imaginary, the result of the impression made by her waking thoughts upon her sleeping fancies, Anna composed herself again to sleep; but scarcely had she lain down, when the same sounds, low at first but gradually becoming louder and more distinct, broke in upon the silence. The noise appeared to her to proceed from a distant part of the house, and came with a kind of muffled sound, as though doors of some thickness intervened. Peals of laughter, bursts of applause, snatches of song, crashing of glass, mingled in wild confusion. Higher and higher grew the mirth, louder and louder swelled the tumult, until, when the uproar appeared to have reached its height, there was a pause—a silence as profound as it was sudden and appalling. Then there rang through the wide deserted halls and chambers a shrill, despairing shriek, whilst far and near, above, below, around, rose mocking and insulting laughter. Dauntless as Anna was, and firm as was her reliance on the protection of Heaven, it would perhaps be too much to say that she felt no quickening of the pulse, no flutterings and throbbings of the heart as she listened. But surprise, and a strong desire to penetrate the mystery, greatly preponderated over any feelings of alarm, and her first impulse was immediately to endeavor to find her way to the scene of the disturbance. But a moment's consideration showed her how foolish and imprudent this would be, totally unacquainted as she was with the house, and with no better light than the feeble glimmer of her lantern. If it was the work of designing persons, such a step would be but to expose herself to danger whilst, if the effect of supernatural agency, she could neither learn what they wished to conceal nor shun what they chose to reveal. She therefore decided upon passively awaiting the result of her adventure. As these thoughts passed rapidly though her mind the noise subsided, the laughter became fainter and fainter; until at length it died away seemingly lost in the distance, and silence once more reigned around. After the lapse of a short interval this was again broken by a noise resembling the rattling and clanking of a chain dragged heavily along, which seemed to approach by slow degrees towards her apartment, and as gradually receded; then again approached, and again receded; and so on several times, but each time coming nearer than before: until at length it paused beside that door of her room which Anna had been unable to open. Cautiously raising her head from the pillow Anna endeavored, with fixed and strained look, to pierce the darkness in which that part of the room was enveloped but though she could not distinguish anything, and though no sound was made, she became with a thrill more nearly approaching terror than she had before experienced instinctively conscious that she was no longer alone. Resolutely determined, however, not to yield to feelings of alarm, Anna said, in a firm, unfaltering voice, "Whoever or whatever you are that thus disturb my repose and intrude upon my privacy show yourself and name your errand, if you want anything from me; if not, begone, for your attempts to terrify me are vain. I fear you not." The only answer returned was a low laugh; and where the moonlight streamed in through the partly-drawn window-curtain, there stood a frightfully grotesque figure. Its body, as well as Anna could distinguish, resembled that of a beast, but the head face and shoulders, were those of a human being the former, being decorated with a horn over each shaggy eyebrow. It stood upon all fours, but the front legs were longer than those behind, and terminated in claws like a bird. Round its neck an iron chain was hung, which, as it now slowly advanced sometimes in the light, and sometimes in the shade, it rattled menacingly. The sight of this creature; far from increasing Anna's alarm, considerably diminished it and she lay perfectly quiet, steadily watching its movements, until it came within and arm's length of her, when, suddenly springing forward, she seized hold of it with a firm grasp, exclaiming, "This is no spirit for here is flesh and bone like myself." Apparently the ghost being composed of too solid materials to melt in air, had no other resource than to oppose strength to strength, for it struggled vigorously, and with some difficulty succeeded in freeing itself from Anna's hold. No sooner was it at liberty, than it made for the door with as much speed as its various encumbrance would allow: and Anna, now completely roused; and forgetting all prudential considerations in the excitement of the moment hastily put on a few articles of clothing, and, throwing her cloak around her, seized her lantern and followed. The ghost had however, gained so much in advance of her, that it was with some difficulty she could decide which way to turn, but, guided by the clanking of the chain, she went boldly along a wide stone passage and through several rooms, opening one out of another until, just as she was again within sight and almost within reach of the object of her pursuit, it suddenly disappeared: and Anna, in her eagerness, springing quickly forward, was herself the next moment precipitated through an opening in the floor, in her fall breaking her lantern. Fortunately she alighted on a heap of straw, or the consequence might have been fatal. As it was though bruised and stunned by her sudden descent she did not entirely lost consciousness, but was sensible of a confused murmur of voices near her, and as her perceptions became clearer, she was aware that the tones, though low were earnest and angry, and that she herself was the subject of conversation. "tell you it is the only thing to be done so what's the use of talking about it, you fool;" were the first words she distinguished. "But," interrupted another voice, evidently a woman's, "would it not be better to wait and see?" "Death and fury, wait and see what?" fiercely exclaimed the first speaker. "If she's dead, it'll do her no harm; and if she isn't the sooner a stopper's put in her mouth the better." Completely roused from her stupor by the danger with which she was threatened. Anna opened her eyes and perceived that she was in a large vaulted cellar, at one end of which was a small heated furnace scattered about the floor and on rudely-constructed work-benches, as though the persons using them had hastily abandoned their employment, were many curious-looking tools and machines, together with heaps of metal of different sizes, and in different stages of manufacture, from the merely moulded shape to the finished shilling or guinea. Some half-dozen or eight men and women were grouped together, amongst whom she recognized the ghost, not quite divested of his masquerade dress. In a single glance Anna perceived all this and it needed no conjuror to tell her that she had fallen into the hands of a gang of coiners.

Fully sensible of the peril of her situation, her extraordinary courage did not forsake her; for Anna, though somewhat peculiar in her religious opinions, was perfectly sincere, and even at this awful moment felt unshaken confidence in the protecting care of Providence. Though a foreigner, she possessed great command of the English language and her style, notwithstanding its singularity and quaintness was well calculated to overawe the rude and lawless band into whose hands she had fallen With a calm and steady gaze she met the eye of the ruffian, who brandished his weapon before her and said—"I pray you do not commit this great wickedness, nor, shed the blood of a helpless woman, who has never injured you." "Oh, come," interrupted the man in a surly tone, "let's have none of that gammon for it'll be of no use. If folks will meddle in other folks' concerns; they must take the consequences; we're not such fools as to put the rope round our own necks, I can tell you." "Nay but hear what I have to say," repeated Anna eluding the man's grasp as he endeavored to seize hold of her; "my coming here was no fault of my own, and I promise not to betray you." "Oh, aye, a likely tale," said the man with a brutal laugh. "We'er all for ourselves in this world, and no mistake; so we shall just put you where you can tell no tales, old girl." "Stop; hear what she has to say: you shall; you must," cried a young woman who started up from a table at the farther end of the cellar, at which she had been seated, with her face buried in her hands during the foregoing colloquy. "I tell you, Jack she continued, advancing into the midst of the group and laying her hand on the man's arm, "you shan't touch that woman; you won't; I know you won't. But enough you are—we all are, God knows—but there's no blood upon our hands yet: and," added she lowering her voice, "blood will speak you-know—remember." The man's countenance fell as the girl uttered the last words he relaxed his hold of the knife; and Anna taking advantage of his indecision, and the relenting expression she thought she read in the dark faces round her, related her simple story, dwelling particularly upon the danger the coiners would incur were she missing, and their security in case she was allowed to proceed on her journey, after seeing her friend the clergyman. Taking courage from the attention of her hearers, she even ventured to remonstrate with them upon their dangerous mode of life, and entreated them to abandon it, and seek their subsistence honestly.

There was a pause of some minutes after Anna ceased speaking, during which the coiners exchanged with each other looks of mingled admiration and astonishment. At length one of them who appeared to take the lead, addressing his companions, said, "The woman has spoken well and there is reason in what she says. It is true enough that murder will out; and though she is a stranger, she was known to come here. Her disappearance might excite suspicion, suspicion would lead to inquiries inquiries to search, and them all would be up with us; besides, a few week will see us clear of this place if we have luck, and I think we may trus ther so long." Then turning to Anna, he continued, "You have a spirit of your own and I like you the better, and would trust you the sooner for it; none but fools rely on the word of a coward but one who dare speak the honest truth without fear or favor, when in peril of life. is not likely to break faith, I think; so you shall go free, on condition that you take a solemn oath not to reveal to any one the events of this night until six months have passed; by that time we shall have quitted not only this neighborhood but the country, and," he added with a laugh, "the ghost that has kept all the men in ——quaking after dark like a pack of frightened children, will be laid forever. Have I said well my comrades?" There was a general murmur of assent and the man continued, "Recollect then, that if you break your oath, your life will be the forfeit; we have means to ascertain and punish treachery: and should you attempt foul play you can no more escape our vengeance than here in this lonely place you can resist our power. Will you swear, by all you hold most dear and sacred to keep our secret inviolable for the time agreed?" To this proposition Anna, as will be readily believed joyfully assented, and being conducted by her strange acquaintance back to her sleeping apartment, she most gladly when morning dawned, bade adieu to the scene of her singular and alarming adventure. On arriving at the clergyman's house, she was not sorry to find but few of the family stirring as she naturally wished to avoid much questioning. In answer to the inquiries which were made as to how she had passed the night, she said that she had been much annoyed and disturbed; and though she avoided entering into particulars, she strongly advised that no one should be permitted to try a similar experiment, assuring them that she believed few could pass through what she had done witout sustaining severe, if not permanent injury from it. Having thus, as far as lay in her power, acquitted her conscience, she pursued her journey. In a few days she arrived at home, but it was not until several months over the time specified had elapsed, that she related the adventure to me, in order to show how little dependence is to be placed on the stories told of ghosts and haunted houses. As Dutch Anna said, "Evil men have generally more to do with such stories than evil spirits, and, after all, it is possible to give a certain gentleman and his agents more than their due."

A QUERY.

Two gentlemen have each a daughter, each marries the daughter of the other; if children arise from this union on both sides, what relation do the children bear to each other. H.

BE KIND AND CONSIDERATE.

Children should never be unnecessarily thwarted when in pursuit of an object. A child, for example, before he can speak, is trotting after a ball, the nurse snatches him at the moment, to be washed, and the poor child throws himself into a violent passion;—whereas, had she kindly assisted him in gaining his object, and then taken him up, this trial would have been spared, and his temper been uninjured. Teasing and derision tend very much to embitter good disposition even in grown persons.—Courier.

[From the Lady's Book.

Original.

SPRING.

THOU hast come again, bright and beautiful Spring; thou hast come again. Thou hast come from the land of the far south, where thou reignest in perpetual glory. Thou hast come to deliver Nature from her stern bondage, and wake her slumbering powers to life and happiness; to touch the landscape with thy soft pencil, and make it a fair picture of Paradise; to breathe upon the silent harp of earth, and send forth strains of inspiring music. A wreath of flowers is upon thy brow—garments of loveliness clothe thee—a silver sceptre is in thy hand—sunshine brightens thy path, and thy step is firm and free. Clouds hang their rich drapery over thee; day and night participate in thy pleasures, and rejoice in thy return. We welcome thee. The groves resound with thy welcome, and the solitary places are glad because of thee. Poetry lays her tribute before thee; incense rises from every hill and mountain to thy name, and every hand is extended to crown thee as the Queen of the Seasons.

Eden was thy first home. There, amid the new beauties of creation, thou didst shine in splendor. Earth had then no other sovereign, but thou wert all in all. The crystal streams leaped to the music of thy voice; the flowers derived from thee their beauty, and the air its perfume; the bowers were adorned with thy gifts and every object reflected thy image. Sin disturbed thee. It robbed thee of thy honors, and darkened thy glory. Thou art now but a temporary visitant, abiding with us for a time, and then departing. Rivals dispute thy territory with thee. Songs cannot charm thee to remain—prayers cannot keep thee; thou art forced to leave us, and resign the throne to thy successors.

Short as are thy visits they are always pleasant. Melancholly never shades thy brow—sadness never gives its mournful tones to thy voice. Nature does not indulge in lamentation while thou art with her. Winter brings sorrow and sighing, but thou doth bring all smiles and joy. Inanimate creation testifies its love for thee, and blesses thee as its kindest friend. Man doth praise thee. The husbandman sees the bow of promise bent o'er thee, and cheers his heart with the hopes of an abundant harvest. The invalid rejoices in thy coming; his languid eye looks bright, and his feeble pulses quicken, when from his chamber-window he watches thy gentle progress. The poet hastens to greet thee; it is for thee that the unearthly fire is kindled upon the altar of his bosom; it is for thee that his imagination wanders in quest of the beautiful; it is for thee that he invokes inspiration, and touches the silver strings of his enchanting lyre. Do not the "morning-stars" still shout over thee as they did at thy birth? Do they not, in their distant stations, respond to the voices that reach them from earth—the voices that tell of thy glory? As the messengers of peace pass over the land, have they no eyes to read the glowing inscriptions thou doth write on Nature's page, and have they no ears to hear thy rapturous melodies?

Months have fled since thy last departure, fair Spring. How doth thou find us now? As thou left us? Ah, no. Changes, eventful changes have happened to us; new scars have been added to the oft-told truth, that life is uncertain. We have seen the lines that Hope drew along our horizon, fade away. We have seen our sun obscured; our day has been turned into night; the garlands that our hands made, have withered; plans have been defeated, unexpected trials have visited us; friends have forsaken us; relations have died; enemies have almost triumphed over us; spears have pierced us. Through all Providence has safely led us. The storm has beat, and wildly beat, but our rock has not been moved. We have had a fierce warfare, but our shield is not broken. There was a kind wing over us—there were guardian spirits around us—our foes were restrained—succor was ever at hand, and hence, our feet have not faltered, and our souls have not been overwhelmed. Amid afflictions, blessings have crowned us, and therefore, in the night of our sorrow, the voice of our thanksgiving, like the voice of the nightingale, has ascended to heaven.

And what may happen to us before thy next return! We cannot tell—we hardly dare imagine. The future is yet unformed; Providence must give it a character. How it shall be disposed into realities—whether it shall be blessed or wretched—whether hope shall illumine it, or despair spread its thick curtain over it, we know not. Thou hast to note changes every season, beautiful Spring, and so it will be at thy next coming. We what may we be—where may we be! We are now in full life and bliss, but ere thy return, sorrow may come as the midsummer tempest comes to the ripe harvest. Other friends may be gone hence and we left "to finish our journey alone." The treasures of the heart may "make to themselves wings and fly away," and the bitterness of woe may be no more, and thou mayest have to pause at our tombs and adorn them with thy simple beauties.

But should we be separated from earth, we know that if we are prepared we shall dwell in "the better land" through the merits of the redeemer. "The better land!" Call it such, for it is a land where all that is beautiful and perfect exists, and where Imagination will find its most glowing pictures infinitely surpassed. Call it such, for it is so far above every thing here, that each one will be compelled to exclaim as he first beholds its glories, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, to conceive of the things that God hath prepared for them that love Him."

"There, everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers;
Death, like a narrow stream, divides
This heavenly land from ours."

The parent who would train up a child in the way he should go, must go, in the way that he would train up the child.—C. Intelligencer.

A FARMER'S DUTY TO HIS CHILDREN.

Mr. Phelps observes—"It has long been a source of complaint with farmers, that they cannot keep their boys at home; that they must leave the farm for a profession, a trade, or even a pedlar's trunk or coat.—This I consider a great evil, which demands a remedy."

After speaking of the causes of the evil, among which he enumerates false ideas of honor and respectability, surly, morose and scolding habits of parents, and the rough, uncouth, and comfortless appearance of many farmers' houses and out-buildings, Mr. P. proceeds to point out the remedy as follows:

"Let no farmer's wife think her children too good to labor: but, on the contrary, let her strive early to fix habits of industry. Let every mother teach her sons that while labor on the farm is honorable, idleness, ignorance and vice alone bring reproach. And when this lesson is thoroughly impressed on her son, and corresponding habits are formed, that son will be likely to make an efficient man and a useful citizen, whether he be following a profession, or be engaged in the more safe and more pleasant pursuit of agriculture. But when the mother, without this lesson, and without these habits, undertakes to make her son a gentleman, she is far more likely to make him a loafer.

"Let parents labor to give all their children a good education. Let the absurd notion, that a farmer needs no education, be banished from every dwelling. There is no pursuit where intelligence, and a well cultivated and a well disciplined mind, is more necessary, than in the proper management of the farm. Let the mind be enlarged by a knowledge of history, political economy, and especially the sciences connected with agriculture. Let the young farmer enrich his mind by general reading. Let him thoroughly understand our political institutions; and be able to judge of his political rights and duties, without the aid of some demagogue who had rather devote his time to watching over the public interests, than to the pursuit of honest industry. In short, let the farmer be able to reason, to examine and to judge for himself, and he will soon take the elevated rank in society to which his calling entitles him, and he will no longer have the opportunity of complaining that professional men have too much influence. This will have a great tendency to attach farmer's sons to their homes and to their farms."—C. Intelligencer.

A TOUCHING SKETCH OF PARENTAL SORROW.

'A few months ago I buried my eldest son a fine manly body of eight years of age, who had never had a day's illness until that which took him hence to be here no more. His death occurred under circumstances peculiary painful to me. A younger brother, the next in age to him, a delicate, sickly child from a baby, had been down for nearly a fortnight with and epidemic fever. In consequence of the nature of the disease, I used every precaution that prudence suggested to guard the other members of my family against it. But of this one, my eldest, I had but little fear; he was so rugged and so generally healthy. Still, however, I kept a vigilant eye upon him, and especially forbade his going into the pools and docks near his school, which he was prone to visit.

'One evening I came home wearied with a long day's hard labor, and vexed at some little disappointments, and found that he also had just come into the house, and that he was wet, and covered with dock mud. I taxed him with disobedience, and scolded him severely—more so than I had ever done before; and then harshly ordered him to his bed. He opened his lips for an exculpatory reply as I supposed, but I sternly checked him; when with a mute, sorrowful countenance and a swelling breast, he turned away and went slowly to his chamber. My heart smote me even at the moment though I felt conscious of doing but a father's duty. But how much keener did I feel the pang when I was informed in the course of the evening by a neighbor, that my boy had gone to the dock at the earnest solicitation of a younger and favorite playmate, and by the especial permission of his schoolmaster, in order to recover a cap belonging to the former, which had blown over the wharf. Thus I learned that what I had treated with unwonted severity as a fault, was but the impulse of a generous nature which, forgetful of self, had hazarded perhaps life for another. It was but the quick prompting of that manly spirit which I had always endeavored to engraft upon his susceptible mind, and which, young as he was, had already manifested itself on more than one occasion.

'How bitterly now did I regret my harshness, and resolve to make amends to his grieved spirit in the morning! Alas! that morning never came to him in health. Before retiring for the night, however, I crept to his low cot, and bent over him. A tear had stolen down upon his cheek, and rested there. I kissed it off; but he slept so sweetly and so calmly, that I did not venture to disturb him. The next day he awoke with a raging fever on his brain, and in forty-eight hours was no more! He did not know me when I was first called to his bed-side, nor at any moment afterward, though in silent agony I bent over him until death and darkness closed the scene. I would have given worlds to have whispered one kind word in his ear, and have been answered; but it was not permitted. Once indeed a smile, I thought of recognition, lighted upon his eye, and I leaned eagerly forward. But it passed quickly away, and was succeeded by the cold unmeaning glare, and the wild tossing of the fevered limbs, that lasted till death came to his relief.

'Every thing I now see that belonged to him reminds me of the lost one. Yesterday I found some rude pencil sketches which it was his delight to make for the amusement of his younger brother; to-day, in rummaging an old closet I came across his boots, still covered with dock-mud as when he last wore them; and every morning and evening I pass the ground where his voice rang the merriest among his play-mates. All these things speak to me vividly of his active life; but I cannot, though I often try, recall any other expression of his face than that mute, mournful one with which he turned from me on the night I so harshly repulsed him. Then my heart bleeds afresh. Oh! how careful should we all be, that in our daily conduct toward those little beings sent us by a kind Providence, we are not laying up for ourselves the sources of many a future bitter tear! How cautious, that neither by inconsiderate word or look we unjustly grieve their generous feeling! And how guardedly ought we to weigh every action against its motive, lest in a moment of excitement we be led to mete out to the venial errors of the heart the punishment due only to wilful crime! Alas! perhaps few parents suspect how often the sudden blow, the fierce rebuke, is answered in their children by the tears, not of passion, not of physical or mental pain, but of a loving but grieved or outraged nature!"—[Knickerbocker Magazine.

A BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.—However dark and disconsolate the path of life may seem to any man, there is an hour of deep and undisturbed repose at hand, when the body may sink into a dreamless slumber. Let not the imagination be started, if this resting-place, instead of being a bed of down, shall be a bed of gravel, or the rocky bed of the tomb. No matter where the poor remains of a man may be, the repose is deep and undisturbed, the sorrowful bosom heaves no more, the tears are dried up in their fountains, the aching head is at rest, and the stormy waves of earthly tribulations roll unheeded over the place of graves. Let armies engage in fearful conflict over the bosom of the dead, not one of the sleepers heeds the spirit-stirring triumph, or responds to the thundering shouts of victory. How quiet those countless millions sleep in the arms of their mother earth! The voice of thunder shall not awaken them—the loud cry of the elements, the winds, the waves, not even the giant-tread of the earthquake, shall not be able to cause an inquietude in the chamber of death. They shall rest and pass away—the last great battle shall be fought; and then a small voice, at first not heard, shall rise to a tempest, and penetrate the voiceless grave. For a trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall hear His voice.—The World.

ANOTHER DOG STORY.—In olden times, when the small pox was considered an unavoidable evil, and the pest house was regarded as indispensable to the safety of the community, the following circumstances occurred:

The Rev. J——C——, of L——, Mass., had decided on going to the pest house with his entire family, for the purpose of having the small pox. The day before they were to leave home, a kind neighbor came in to inquire if he could be of any service to them. The minister told him that all their arrangements were complete except that they had made no disposition of their dog; they were unwilling to have him killed; for he was a great favorite in the family; but it would never do to suffer Bose to follow them to the pest house; for he would be sure to get out and carry the contagious disease through the neighborhood.

"I should hate to kill so good a dog," said the neighbor, "don't you think he would stay with me?" I fear not; said parson C——, for he is very much attached to our family, and would be quite sure to find us out; there is no way I fear but to kill the poor creature. Well, said the neighbor, I was going down to M——'s and on my way back I will call and kill the dog for you. So he left them. After a little, the neighbor returned to fulfil his promise; but nothing could be found of Bose,—They then remembered that while they were talking over the business the dog, which had been lying under the table in the room, got up and went out. A general call was made; but no dog came; so the neighbor was compelled to go home without fulfilling the purpose of killing Bose.

When neighbor Clark reached his house, what was his surprise to find parson C.'s dog ready to receive him. And there the dog remained during the whole time that the family were in the hospital. He occasionally visited their old house; but never offered to go near the hospital; he followed his new master wherever also he went, making his house his home. Thus he continued to do until the day that his old master and family left the pest house, when he returned to the old house, and welcomed the family with extacies of joy, and never more left them except for an occasional visit to the temporary master.

The above is a perfectly true story. It was often related by the late Dr. C——, who was an eye and ear witness of the circumstances, and was confirmed by the family of Mr. Clark. Others may adopt what theories they please to account for the singular facts, but we must believe that dogs understand something more of human signs and sounds than is generally supposed—Boston Journal.

CORPORAL TRIP AND AUNT PRUDY.

"There are people," continued the corporal, "who can't even breathe without slandering a neighbor."

"You judge too severely," replied my aunt Prudy.

"No one is slandered who dose not deserve it."

"That may be, "retorted the corporal," but I have heard very slight things said of you."

The face of my aunt kindled with anger. "Me!" she exclaimed—"Me! slight things said of me!—What can any body say of me!"

"They say," answered the corporal gravely, and drawing his words to keep my aunt in suspense, that you are no better than you ought to be."

Fury flashed from the eyes of my aunt

"Who are the wretches?"

"I hope they slander no one who does not deserve it," remarked the corporal, jeeringly, as he left the room.

The feelings of my aunt may well be conceived. She was sensibly affected. True, she had foibles. She was peevish and fretful. But she was rigidly moral and virtuous. The purest ice was not more chaste. The Pope himself could not boast more piety. Conscious of the correctness of her conduct, she was wounded at the remark of the corporal. Why should her neighbors slander her. She could not conjecture.

Let my aunt be consoled. A person who can live in this world without suffering slander must be too stupid or insignificant to claim attention.—[Tristam Shandy.

DELAYS

With a certain class of people it is to-day, delay—eternal delay. Ask them to settle your account, they will be ready to-morrow. Call a week hence and they have no time to attend to it, and the chances are against you of getting adjustment for six months to come. Long since a man ten dollars till the close of the week, and you are obliged to call again and again before you get your money. Leave a job with a procrastinating mechanic—a job that you are in a great hurry for—it shall be done forthwith, you are told. You may call two weeks hence and the work has not been touched. Why? His helps were absent—his family were sick—or some other silly excuse is offered for sheer negligence.

Such delaying characters you may know where to find, or how much to believe of what they say. They are very certain in their promises, but never fulfil them. If there is a despicable trait in one's character it is the habit of putting off til to-morrow what should be done to-day, and then framing a dozen lies as an excuse for negligence. If we are addressing such characters, permit us to give you a word of advice: never delay to a future time what you can possibly attend to at the present. Be punctual in all your engagements and never make a promise that you do not fulfil. No person ever prospered who was in the habit of putting off to a more convenient season the duties of to-day. Be on your guard at all times.

"Satan delays—"they bred Remorse,
Take thy time, while time is lent thee,
Creeping snails have weakest force
Fly their fault lest thou repent thee,
Good is best when soonest wrought,
Lingering labor comes to nought."

We might quote the familiar line of Young—"Procrastination is the thief of time," and also

"Be wise to day; 'tis madness to defer,"

if it would be of any avail. We are certain no young man will ever become distinguished or wealthy, who has contracted the habit of delaying important business. It is of the utmost importance in all your dealings—in every situation in life—that you should be prompt, punctual, and ever ready to take hold of any thing beneficial to yourselves and others.—Olive Branch.

A CHINESE ENTERTAINMENT.—The invitation was written on thin red paper, in Chinese and inclosed in a red envelope. When we arrived the host received us with much ceremony placing our right hand between his hands and pressing them closely. The host and other guests were dressed in a robe of rich purple silk ornamented, with cord a cap surmounted by a gold ball. Tea was brought us on the verandah, and soon after we were summoned to dinner, where we sat at small tables, at three sides leaving the other side clear for the convenience of the waiters. The first course consisted of a kind of soup in cups, to taste which, a flat silver table was used. This was followed by various other dishes such as quail minced, bird nests sharks fins, &c. &c, &c, interspersed with various kinds of wine. Most of the dishes were quite liquid, and they were eaten with the chopsticks, it placed us in much the same condition as the stork who was invited to dine with the fox. The wine was drank from small silver cups with two handles, and in drinking healths it was customary to show the bottom of the cup. Three hours passed and then beautiful flowers and fruit with other kind of tea were set before us. After this an excellent cup of pecco was handed us, after drinking which we immediately took our lavee, being attended home by a number of lantern bearers, and amid the noise of crackers and squibs.—The Sun.

WHO ARE THE WORKING MEN; Every man who depends on his own exertions, either of mind or body, for the means of living is a working man, and such as many consider the sons of leisure, often work the hardest of any. None are exempt wholly, from the condition imposed upon Adam and all his posterity by the creator, that of labour for the support of life. Even the great and rich, often suffer more from the labour of the mind than do those who toil daily with their hands. The professional man is, however, classed by the unthinking, among those who do not labour, but live upon the labour of others. Let us examine the subject with a view of disproving this position.

Take for instance the lawyer. 'In the first place, to acquire a sufficient knowledge of his profession to enable him to enter upon the threshhold of its duties, he must spend long years of hard study, and deny himself many pleasures open to those who only labour with their hands. When he is admitted the bar he must often patiently wait in his office for employment still looking out for the goddy of law is endless, year after year before he can obtain it. If at last so fortunate as to get into full practice, he must often pass whole days and perhaps half his nights, in intense mental examination of cases and precedents, from which to draw mental arguments, in favor of the causes of his clients. His brain is always perplexed with the cares and difficulties of others. The life of a physician is equally as laborious as that of the lawyer and is subject to all the inclemencies of weather at all times and seasons; to which may be added extreme mental anxiety, on account of the great responsibility his professional trust devolves upon him. Besides, he is ever breathing the air of disease, by which his constitution cannot fail to be impaired, and he commonly grows old before his time.

The mechanic, and such as are generally classed as labouring men, work harder sometimes, during the day, than the professional man does, but you will hardly ever find one of them, who would be willing to exchange his occupation for that of the lawyer or doctor.

The man who merely labours with his hands sleeps soundly at night; and rises next morning refreshed and vigorous, and prepared cheerfully to renew his daily toil.—He can seems to change his nature, and labour to become more pleasing to him than leisure.—The Courier.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. DECEMBER 1 1846

A few days ago, a Mr. Dawson presented himself at our Collection and requested an entry to be made of his vessel, the schooner "William," belonging to Bassa Cove. The Collector not having heard of the schooner William before, could not comprehend the meaning of the application. The applicant, to enlighten him produced a Liverpool clearance for the identical schooner William; and a bill of sale for her, to a Mr. Toliver, a merchant at Bassa Cove, and said, that I Dawson is the master of her, and I wish to enter her according to law. The unbelieving gatherer of customs still hesitated, and to make sure that all was right, he went on board the schooner, took her dimensions, and returned to the shore, converted to our opinion, that the "Bassa-boatmen," for enterprise, are equal to the "Yankees."

We hear with pleasure of the enterprising spirit of our friends in Bassa county. They have, now building, three vessels of respectable sizes, and will in all probability launch them in four months' time. We hope for them every imaginable success. Will not the people in this county try to compete with them?

Dixon B. Brown Esquire, has been named by the Executive to fill the vacancy in the Legislative Council, occasioned by the death of Adam W. Anderson Esq. Our readers may remember that Mr. Brown was similarly appointed last year, to fill the place of Lewis Ciples q.

Mr. B. is fully competent to discharge the duties of any office in the commonwealth.

CORRESPONDENTS must not think hard of us:—circumstances which we could not control operated against us. We will bring forward their communications as soon as we possibly can.

The report of the election from the Sinoe county is received. Richard E. Murray Esq., of that place is elected to the legislature. We know Mr. Murray to be an exemplary man; and feel quite confident that he will prove himself worthy of the confidence of his constituents.

NAVAL.

The United States Brig "Boxer," John E. Bulsphan Esq. commanding, anchored in our harbor on the morning of the 28th from a cruize to the leeward coast. She will sail in a day or two for Porto Praya.—All well.

THE AFRICANS BY THE "PONS."—These people or a large portion of them are becoming of value to their guardians—those remaining in the colony, show no disposition, now to wander off. They seem perfectly satisfied with their circumstances; and we find no great dificulty in accustoming them to our habits. Those of them living in Grand Basso, have proved to be very serviceable. The Fishmen, living at the cove, who have for a number of years, been disturbing the quietness of our people by their threats and roberies, have in those people, found a formidable enemy. A gentleman at that place writes. "Our Congoes have really turned out manly; they have thrown more dread upon the Fishmen, (our former antagonists) and the surrounding tribes, than I have ever known exerted upon them before:—had I time I would give you in detail the recent misunderstanding, the Fishmen and our Congoes had, which of course involved us; and which for a couple of weeks threatened a war. The Congoes went down to Fishtown and forcibly arrested the thief, a Fishman, and after giving him a good beating, took his cloth and a cutlass—and it was pretty dificult for us to prevent them from going down to set fire to the Fishtown;—but now amicably settled."

We have very little sympathy for these Fish men—they have on several occasions, shown themselves inimical to the colony, and they violate whenever it suits their convenience, their pacific relations with us. We have the means to chastise them,—but it is our standing policy, never to engage in a war, if we can possibly avoid it.

INUNDATION.

It is with pain that we have to record the distressing situation of the people at the settlement at Sinoe, called "Readaville." This settlement is composed entirely of persons who have given all their time to the cultivation of the soil;—and but for the inundation which occurred there in October last; the people of that settlement would now be in independent circumstances. We hope, that the benevolent of our community will extend to our suffering fellow citizens, some timely assistance—their condition is certainly an alarming one. Richard E. Murray Esq: Superintendent of public affairs at that place, under date 15th October writes. Public business had called the major part of the male inhabitants to Greenville—some of them started early for home, others remained till evening when it commenced raining, which compelled them to remain till next morning; when they started for their homes;—the river had swollen much and they were fearful of meeting with some accident: these fears were fully realized, for on approaching one of the points of the river, such was the force of the water, that it capsized one of the canoes, with three men, they were nearly drowned—the other canoe being near them, came to their assistance. This was the beginning of sorrows; when they arrived at the farms, they found the river overflowing its banks—it continued to rise all day. Sunday about half past 12 o'clock P. M., Mr. Delany told me that a native of Blue Barre had brought him intelligence that the swamps back of the farms had filled and met the river, producing a complete inundation. Alarmed for the safety of the people, we dispatched two canoes with six of the settlers, when they arrived at the farms the scene that presented itself to their view, was truly distressing—from one end of the settlement to the other, the land was covered, the houses though pretty high from the ground, were flooded—the inmates of some were obliged to leave the lower floor, and take to the lofts, in some houses, the water was nineteen inches above the lower floor—in some instances, they were obliged to make fire on their beds. Three houses only escaped; they were quite high from the ground, the others were under water till late Sunday night, when it began to subside. Every thing like bread stuff is ruined, the loss in potatoes and cassadas, is estimated at nine hundred bushels. The people were just recovering from the effects of last years freshet. Famine stares us in the face, it is impossible for us to support them, till they can raise another crop. A little assistance would be of great benefit to us, and we urgently desire that a few articles be sent us, to enable us to procure the necessary supplies for these unfortunate sufferers. That settlement will have to be broken up—the oldest natives declare that it will be washed away. Next week, if the weather will permit, I will look out for a site for a new settlement."

Oct. 16th. "The river still overflows the bank—the natives say it happens every thirty years: it is now thirty years since its last occurrence."

THE FIRST OF DECEMBER.

As usual this day was celebrated. The firing of cannon and other exhiliating exhibitions of rejoicing, were with becoming decorum, performed. At 11 of the clock, the volunteer companies, formed in front of the Government house to receive, and escort his Excellency the Governor, and other civil officers to the Baptist church, to hear an address. The church was crowded to overflowing—all classes vie with each other, in their observance of this day. Hilary Teage Esq., was the orator of the day—he delivered a very interesting and beautiful address;—it was listened to with profound attention, and the occasional bursts of applause, which resounded through the church, and whose echo went far away, clearly intimated that the theme of the address was one, that suited the feelings of the people. It is hoped that Mr. Teage will permit his address to appear in the "Herald," or such portions of it, as may seem to him desirable. At 3 of the clock a large number of gentlemen enjoyed themselves at a sumptuous dinner, at Judge Brander's:—and hundreds of both sexes passed off the afternoon in gleeful exercises on the sea beach.

ORDER OF THE DAY FOR THE CELEBRATION OF THE FIRST DECEMBER.

The committee appointed to make necessary arrangements for the celebration of the first of December ensuing, the day on which the decisive battle was fought, which gave such a signal triumph and victory over our savage foes.

Resolved,—That all foreign as well as colonial vessels that may be in harbour on that day, be requested to display their flags at 8 o'clock A. M.

Resolved,—That each warehouse and grocery be closed, and that we desist from any and all mercantile operations on that day.

1st. One gun from Central Fort will announce the dawn of day.

2nd. At 8 o'clock A. M one gun from Central Fort, at which time the flag of the colony will be displayed 3rd, At 9 o'clock A. M. the troops will assemble in Broad Street.

4th. At 10 o'clock A. M. the troops will form in front of the Government House, to escort His Excellency the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and civil officers to the Baptist Church, to hear an oration to be delivered by H. Teage Esq.

5th. One gun will announce the moving of the procession from the Government House; the procession will proceed to corner of J. Street, down J. Street to Broad Street, up B. Street to the Baptist Church.

6th. After the ceremonies are over in the Church, the troops will be formed to receive His Excellency the Governor Lieut. Governor, and civil officers.

7th. At 12 o'clock the national salute of 22 guns will be fired from Central Fort.

8th. At Sunset one gun from Central Fort, at which time the flag will be struck.

N. M. HICKS,
F. PAYNE,
J. B McGILL,
J. C. MINOR,
D. B. BROWN.
} Committee of arrangements.

Monrovia Nov. 23th, 1846.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

WANTED, by the subscriber 1000 bushels of peanuts very dry and in good order for shiping for which goods will be given at the lowest price.

E. J. ROYE.

ALSO Products of the soil that will bear shiping hitherto not exported together with every species of rare animals, birds, shells, or phenomena, of this portion of the Globe.

E. J. ROYE.

NEW SUPPLIES, Flour, sugar, pork, beef, fish, & dry goods &c. recently bought & for sale at my usual low prices.

E. J. ROYE.

Monrovia Nov. 5 th 1846

NOTICE,

Is hereby given to all persons who are indebted to H. Teage Esq. insolvent debtor, that they are required to make immediate payment to the subscriber, as indulgence cannot be given.

DIXON B BROWN.
Trustee for the Creditors.

Nov. 19th 1846.

He only is a great man who can neglect the applause of the multitude, and enjoy himself independent of its favor. [C. Intelligencer.

MATERIALS FOR THINKING.—Let all men believe scripture, and that only, and endeavour to believe it in the true sense, and require no more of others; and they shall find this not only a better, but the only means to suppress heresy and restore unity. For he that believes the scriptures sincerely, and endeavours to believe in the true sense cannot possibly be an heretic. And if no more than this were required of any man to make him capable of the church's communion, then all men so qualified, though they were different in opinion, yet, notwithstanding any such difference, must be of necessity one in communion.—Chillingworth. A bible and a newspaper in every house, a good school in every district, all studied and appreciated as they merit, are the principal supporters of virtue morality, and civil liberty.—Franklin.

"Sir, you have an education, I suppose," said an illiterate preacher in Maine to a learned clergyman.

"Yes sir," was the reply.

"I am thankful," rejoined the former "that the Lord, has opened my mouth to preach without any learning."

"A similar vent," replied the latter, "took place in Balaams time, but such things are of rare occurrence at the present day."—A. Beacon.

A good story is told of a letter advertised by the Postmaster addressed "to the prettiest girl in Pittsburg," and being called for by two hundred and twenty-seven, "all ugly as mud." We don't believe it—there isn't two hundred and twenty seven ugly faces among the girls of all Pittsburg.—U. S. Jour.

As the Duke of Clarence was once sitting to Northcote, he asked him if he knew the Prince Regent?,,

"No," was the brief reply.

"Why," said the Duke," my brother says he knows you."

"Oh! answered Northcote," that's only his brag."

Execrable.—"Why don't you take the pledge?" as the woman said to her "gude man" when she handed him the little 'un.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	none
Beads, pound,	"	none	12 00
Beef, cargo No.	Bb	10 00
Blue Bafts,	Ps.	3 75
Bricks,	100	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	30
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45
Cheese,	"	20
Corn meal,	Bbl	none
Checks domestic,	Ps	none
Cotton white,	Bale	16	12 1.2
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00
Guns,	Box	30 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	5 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	13
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00
Nails	100*lbs*	8 00
Oil paint	Gallon	1 50
Oil palm	"	— 31
Pork	Bbl	none
Pots iron	Cwt.	none
Powder	Bll.	15 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter	"	3 00
Pipes gumbo	Box	none	27
Prints assorted	various	10	1 50
Romauls	Ps.	1 00
Salt	Ton	11 00
Sugar loaf	Lb.	— 18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 75
Tobacco	100*lbs*	10 00
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wines		5 00	8 00

MARINELIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Nov. 6. Col. sloop Nathan Bangs, G. Ammons master, from the leeward.

" " American barque Palestine, Hunt master, from the leeward; passengers, Rev. I. Clarke and and lady, and master H. C. Hicks, Mrs. Proston, and Mrs. Hinson.

" 10. British sloop——,——master, from the leeward.

" 13. Col. schooner Pedler, Carroll master from the leeward.

" 21. H. M. C M. Brig——,——commanding from the windward. Left next day.

" 22. Dutch brig——master, from the leeward.

" 23. Dutch brig——master, from Sierra Leone.

" " Dutch schooner——master, from the leeward.

Dec. 2. Col. schooner William, Dawson master, from grand Bassa.

DEPARTURES.

Nov. 7. Col. Cutter Economy, Chase master, for Junk.

" 10. American ship Madonna, Lawlin master, for the leeward; Passengers, for Grand Bassa, Rev. I. Clarke, and lady, for Cape Palmas, Mrs. Johnson and two children, for Gaboon, Rev. Mr. Walker and lady.

" " Am. barque Palestine Hunt master, for Boston.

" " British sloop master, for Sierra Leone.

" 20. Col. sloop Economy Chase master, for the leeward.

" 22. Col. Sloop Perseverance, Boston master, for the leeward.

" " Col. Cutter Elizar Frances, Howard master for the leeward.

" 30. Dutch brig——master for the lee-

POETRY.

THE WANDERER.

FATHER of mine, [illegible]
Mother of mine, [illegible]
Sister of mine, [illegible]
[illegible]

[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

[illegible]
[illegible]
Once ye were [illegible]

My [illegible]
But my heart with [illegible]
No poor widow's [illegible]
And ne'er [illegible]

Distraction and poverty [illegible]
And enrolled [illegible]
But ostracism and [illegible]
The laurels I've gathered—they [illegible]

Home of my youth, oh grant me a tomb,
Where the green willow waves, and the sweet flowers bloom,
Mother of mine, let me die on thy breast,
Saviour of mine, take me home to thy rest.—A. S. H.

From the Rover—Philadelphia, N. Y., 1841.

MISCELLANEOUS

From the Living Age.

SIMON SAWLEY'S SHILLING.

ON a steep hill-side, sloping down to one of our lovely English rivers, stands a small village looking so still and sequestered, that none would imagine that the greater part of its inhabitants are weavers, employed in a silk-mill a little higher up the river. How it has preserved its primitive rural appearance, it is difficult to say; perhaps the owner of the above-mentioned mill, struck by the picturesque beauty of its detached cottages, followed the example of the original inhabitants, and built similar ones for his work-people, for the hill side is dotted over with cottages of every variety, from amongst which rises the taper spire of the village church, surrounded by its quiet burial ground. There is, however, one exception to the general aspect of the village. At the foot of the hill is one row of cottages, facing the river, with gay flower-plots in front, sloping to the water's edge and larger gardens behind, divided from each other by thick thorn hedges. In one of the cleanest of these cottages, with the trimmest flower plot and best stocked garden, there lived, at the time I knew Westleigh, a certain Simon Sawley, or rather, to speak more correctly, I should say a certain Mrs. Simon Sawley, for she being the more authoritative person, the residence was always so designated in the village. Simon was a well meaning, good-natured, inoffensive sort of man—a good hand at his work; but not celebrated for great power of intellect or strength of mind. His wife was a pretty little woman, with soft brown eyes, a fine clear complexion a neat compact figure, and mild expression of countenance. Her voice was sweet and subdued in its tone, and, to judge from appearances, you would have pronounced her the meekest and gentlest of her sex. But, alas! appearances, are proverbially deceitful—a truth to which, no doubt, we can all testify; but none with more reason than poor Simon. Martha Sawley, to use her own phrase, "was not a woman to be put upon by anybody;" which meant, that she was a woman who would have her own way in spite of everybody. In fact, like many mild-looking, smooth-spoken women, Martha, possessed that unconquerable obstinacy that neither entreaties nor threats can soften or subdue. She never scolded, she rarely lectured, but quietly and steadily pursued the settled purpose of her soul, regardless alike of the wishes or convenience of others. If ever it happened that she met with more than usual opposition, she would assume the air of a deeply injured person, maintain an obstinate silence, or when absolutely obliged to speak, answered only in monosyllables; and, in short, fell into a sullen fit, from which nothing short of the most entire submission to her will could rouse her. It was rarely, indeed, that honest Simon ventured upon anything like opposition; for, though not possessed of an extraordinary development of either the arithmetical or reasoning powers, he had learned, from experience, to count the cost before entering upon the war, and to avoid a contest which must end in total defeat. There was, however, one point upon which, though he no longer ventured any open resistance, he secretly indulged in feelings of a rebellious and insubordinate nature. Mrs. Sawley insisted that he should every Saturday [illegible] to her the whole of his week's wages, without any deduction whatever. This, of course, was quite right, and what every good husband does, or ought to do; but this was not all she would not allow him a penny in his pocket, no, not even on the condition of never spending it, for she was wont to remark, "men are but men at the best, and frail creatures," therefore it was better not to put temptation in their way; "besides, for her part, she could not see what a man, who had a good wife to provide everything comfortable for him, could want with money." He worked for it, and she spent it to the best advantage of course; and that, in her opinion, was the order of Providence.

One lovely evening towards the latter end of spring, Simon was busy in his garden. It happened that he was occupied near the hedge which divided his territories from those of his next neighbor. Like most remarkable individuals, Simon had his eccentricities, one of which was a habit, when any affair of moment weighed on his mind, of indulging in audible soliloquy; and as he worked, he talked, to the following effect:—"Well, it is too bad, that it is, thirty shillings a-week, let alone odd jobs, and never a farthing to bless myself with. Tom Jones said he would not stand it if he was me; he'd be master. But it's easy talking; he knows nothing about it; he is n't married, and don't know Martha. Well, never mind. I've got—yes, here it is, safe and sound—I've got a shilling; I have a shilling that nobody knows nothing about." And after gazing fondly at it for some minutes, he put it again into his pocket, which he buttoned carefully up, pulled his waistcoat well down, and patting it several times to make sure there was no outward and visible sign of the hidden treasure, he resumed his work with great self-complacency. It is commonly said that stone walls have ears; and it has been a notorious fact, ever since the days of King Midas' barber, that woods and groves are the most treacherous of confidants. Certain it is that Simon's secret was no longer his own; it passed into the possession of another, through the instrumentality of the before-mentioned hedge.

However, Simon continued his work, in blissful ignorance, until the sound of Martha's voice from the back-door warned him that supper was ready. That night he lay awake some time longer than usual, revolving in his mind how he should dispose of the bewildering sum in his possession. First the thought of purchasing himself a few fishing rod; then of buying a fine tulip for his flower-garden. Various temptations of a similar nature presented themselves to his imagination; but to all there was one grand objection—inquiries were sure to be made as to where the purchase money came from; Martha would get to know all about it, and that would never do; so every idea of the kind was dismissed entirely. Then he determined to keep it until a good opportunity occurred of proving to his fellow-workmen and acquaintances, especially to Tom Jones, that he had money, and could spend it on a glass or ale or mug of porter with the best of them. At last a bright idea struck him: he would—yes, that he would—put it into the savings-bank. With a mind set at ease by this laudable resolution, Simon fell asleep, and dreamed that his shilling had, in an incredibly short space of time, accumulated to such a degree, as to enable him to purchase a cow, two pigs, and a stock of tulips that made his garden the wonder and admiration of the whole village. The next morning proving, to his great satisfaction, wet, Simon (in order to put in execution, the plan he had formed) proposed taking his dinner with him to the mill, instead of returning home at noon. Having happily accomplished his purpose with little trouble—for, as it was washing-day, Martha was perfectly willing to have him out of her way—he set off, walking with the conscious dignity of a man worth something. As he passed along, he was much surprised to find himself the object of general attention and amusement. Inquiries as to his health, state of mind, and future plans, were showed upon him. One wished to know when he intended to set up his carriage, and another hoped he would not forget old friends now he was so great a man. Nor was his bewilderment lessened on arriving at the mill, for all his fellow-workmen were ready with a joke and a laugh at his expense. But Simon, like Socrates, was a practical philosopher, and he bore all their raillery as a philosopher, should—with unruffled calmness. As soon as the bell for the dinner hour rung, he left his work, and having despatched his own with all possible speed, he, not without some trepidation, made his way to a neighboring town, where he knew there was a savings-bank which would be open that day. On reaching his destination, he first looked cautiously round, to make sure he was unobserved, and seeing no one he knew, he boldly entered. Mr. Vivian, Simon's master, was one of the trustees and managers of this bank, and happened to be in attendance that day. Simon, and Simon's domestic grievances, were well known to him, therefore his appearance in such a place occasioned some little surprise. "Well, Simon," said he "what is your business; nothing the matter at the mill, I hope?"

"No, sir," replied Simon; "I came about a little matter of my own, regarding a bit of money I was thinking of putting into the bank."

"That's right, Simon; I am glad to hear it," said Mr. Vivian. "You are getting good wages, and are now strong and hearty: it is very proper you should lay by something against old age or sickness. But how is it," added he, smiling, "that you have come without Martha?"

The truth is," said Simon, twisting his hat round and round as he spoke—"the truth is, sir, Martha don't know nothing at all about it; and that's one reason I brought it here, thinking it would be safe, you know, sir."

"Oh, indeed!—that is it?" said Mr. Vivian

"Why, you see, sir, it's this way," continued Simon, lowering his voice to a confidential tone —"It's a trifle I made unbeknown to anybody; so I says to myself, if I kept it by me, Martha will be sure to get at it, and if I spend it why, she'll get to know, and I shall never hear the last of it; so I'll put it in the bank, and then I shall have it safe, and it'll be making more; and," concluded Simon, who, during this speech had been fumbling in his pocket, from the bottom of which he at length brought forth his shilling, "here it is, and you'll be so good as not to mention it, sir."

"Oh, certainly not, if you wish it," replied Mr. Vivian, unable to suppress his amusement at Simon's simplicity; "but you are mistaken in supposing your shilling will, as you say, be making more. If you leave it here for five or six years, it will still be but a shilling; on the contrary, if, every week or fortnight, you added a little more to it, it would at the end of that time amount to a sum that would really be useful to you."

It was no small disappointment to Simon to hear that his shilling would not accumulate of its own accord; but the great object was still attainable; so he said with a sigh, and in a somewhat despairing tone, "I'd like to leave it, if you 've no objection, sir, at any rate, it'll be safe, and if I should get another shilling, why, I'll be sure to bring it too."

"If," said Mr. Vivian, who, though greatly amused, pitied Simon's evident disappointment —"if you really are anxious to be laying something by, and do not mind a little extra work, I think I can enable you to do so. I have occasion to send twice or three times a-week to town on business, and am just now in want of a messenger I can trust. I know you to be honest and trustworthy, and if you like to undertake the job, I will put whatever you earn in that way into the savings-bank, and it will not interfere with your regular wages."

Simon's countenance brightened at his proposal. It was just the very thing for him. He eagerly accepted the offer, and after expressing his thanks, and begging his master's secrecy, he with a lightened heart as well as pocket, returned to Westleigh. He was now doubly armed against the raillery of his companions. Various were the devices to which they resorted to induce Simon to part with, or even to display his treasure; but, to their great surprise, against remonstrances, intreaties, and ridicule, he was proof. It was all in vain, even when Tom Jones hid himself behind the hedges. Whether Simon suspected the treachery of which it had been guilty, certain it is that he never again choose that part of his garden for his self communings.

So weeks, months, and years passed away, and the mystery of the shilling remained unsolved. What had become of it, nobody could tell; and, as it usually happens in such cases, there were not wanting persons faithless enough to doubt whether it had ever existed. In the mean time, it must not be supposed that Mrs. Sawley silently acquiesced in her husband's spending any of his time in the service of another, in return for which nothing was forthcoming. On the contrary, few days passed on which she had not some observations to make on the comparative merits of prudence and good nature, always placing the former virtue (which, according to her definition, consisted in getting everything and giving nothing) far above the latter, which, indeed, she considered as only another word for sheer folly, and concluding with a general remark on the contemptible weakness of those who were guilty of it. All this, however, Simon bore without flinching, for there is something in the knowledge of being treated with injustice that inspires even the meekest spirit with fortitude. Nay, sometimes Martha could almost have imagined that Simon turned away his face to conceal a smile. A smile at her! but no, it was impossible; she could not admit her own eyes as credible witnesses to so audacious an act.

About six years after Simon's first visit to the savings-bank, he had the misfortune to break his arm. The fracture was severe, and the pain of the setting, united with the anxiety caused by the knowledge that he was for some time disabled from his work, brought on a slow fever, which for many weeks confined him to his bed; and when at length he was able to leave it, he was so weakened and reduced as to render it doubtful when he would be strong enough again to provide for the wants of his family. Added to this misfortune, food was that year remarkably dear; the harvest was bad, and the potato crop indifferent; and though Martha was an excellent nurse and manager, it surpassed even her powers to provide food and medicine, with little or nothing coming in. Their neighbors sympathized sincerely in their distress, and gave the best proofs of their sympathy by rendering them all the assistance in their power; but they were but poor themselves, and found difficulty enough in making all ends meet. It was in the midst of these perplexities, when rent was due, a doctor's bill in prospect, and turn which way they would nothing but debt and poverty staring them in the face, that Simon remembered his secret hoard. From the time of their first agreement, his kind master had regularly provided him with the means of earning a small sum over and above his weekly wages, which, instead of paying to him, he had put into the savings-bank. What it amounted to by this time, Simon did not know; but he thought it never could be worse wanted, and whatever it might be, would afford some relief. His astonishment was scarcely less than his delight to find himself master of the almost incredible sum of thirteen pounds twelve shillings and sixpence. It was enough, more than enough, to pay all his debts. No farmer contemplating his flocks and herds his well-stored barns and crowded granaries; no merchant, welcoming into port the costly freight that almost doubles his already overflowing wealth; no young heir, gazing on the spacious park, the sunny fields, and stately woods that he can call his own, ever felt such pure and unalloyed happiness as swelled the heart and glistened in the eye of poor Simon as he looked upon his well-earned wealth. And Martha, what did she say, what did she think? Martha had been taking a few lessons in a school that seldom fails to profit and improve those who come under its discipline—the school of adversity. She had suffered anxiety, privation and want; seen the husband, whom, after all, she truly loved, feeble and suffering, without being able to procure those things she knew to be necessary to restore him to ease and health, & had known what it was to have her children crying around her for the bread she had not to give. The tears of joy she shed when informed of this timely but most unexpected relief were not unmingled with those of shame and reproach; and sincerely did she now regret her unkindness and selfishness. She still little, for Martha was not a woman of many premises: but she resolved that nothing on her part should ever again give occasion for concealment on his. Nor was her resolution in vain. In a short time Simon, with proper nourishment, and good nursing, regained his accustomed health and strength, and returned to his employment; and though it ended a hard winter and spring, yet, pleased with themselves and each other, they got well through it. Theirs had always been a clean, well-managed household; but now, brightened by love and confidence, there was no happier family in Westleigh, nor did they ever fail to spare something every week from their earnings to put into the savings-bank.

Great was the wonder, and many the congratulations, of the good people of Westleigh, and to think, as Simon said many times in a day, "to think that all this good should come from my shilling;" for he persisted in regarding that as the grand source of his happiness. To this day, it is common in the village, when speaking of an industrious, prosperous family, to say that such persons have "got a shilling that nobody knows of."

PURSUIT OF KNOWLEDGE.—He that enlarges his curiosity after the works of nature, demonstrably multiplies the inlets to happiness: therefore, we should cherish ardor in the pursuit of useful knowledge, and remember a blighted spring makes a barren year and that the vernal flowers however beautiful and gay, are only intended to nature as preparatives to autumnal fruits.—Johnson.

A FABLE.—The Cat and the Mouse.—The Nantucket Islander says the following story was told by a reformed inebriate, as an apology for much of the folly of drunkards:

"A mouse running about a brewery, happened to fall into a vat of beer, and was in imminent danger of drowning, and appealed to a cat to help him out. the cat replied, it is a foolish request, for as soon as I get you out, I shall eat you. The mouse replied, that fate would be better than to be drowned in beer. The cat lifted him out, but the fume of the beer, caused puss to sneeze; and the mouse took refuge in his hole.

"The cat called on the mouse to come out—'You, sir, did you not promise that I should eat you?'

"'Ah,' replied the mouse,' but you know I was in liquor at the time.'"

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) DECEMBER 18 1846. NO. 5

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. F. DAVIS,
Latina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Settee,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. De LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

ORATION,

Delivered D cember 1s, 1846, in the Baptist Church Monrovia, by Hon. H. Teage.

FELLOW CITIZENS:—A far back towards the infancy of our race as history and tradition are able to conduct us, we have found the custom every where prevailing among mankind, to mark by some striking exhibition those events, which were important and interesting, either in their immediate bearing or in their remote consequences upon the destiny of those among whom they occurred. These events are epochs in the history of man—they mark the rise and the fall of kingdoms and of dynasties—they record the movements of the human mind and the influence of those movements upon the destinies of the race; and whilst they frequently disclose to us the sad and sickening spectacle of innocence bending under the weight of injustice, and of weakness robbed and despoiled by the hand of an unscrupulous oppression they occasionally display, as a theme for admiring contemplation, the sublime spectacle of the human mind, roused by a concurrence of circumstances to vigorous advances in the career of improvement. To trace the operations of these circumstances from their first appearace as effects from the workings of the human passions, until as a cause they revert with combined and concentrated energy upon those minus from which they at first evolved, would be at once a most interesting and a most difficult task; and, let it be borne in mind, requires far higher ability and more varied talent than he possesses who this day has the honor to address you.

The utility of thus making the progress of time—of recording the occurrence of events and of holding up remarkable personages to the contemplation of mankind is too obvious to need remark. It arises from the instincts of mankind—the irrepressible spirit of emulation and the ardent longings after immortality: and this restless passion to perpetuate their existence which they find it impossible to suppress, impels them to secure the admiration of succeeding generations in the performances of deeds, by which, although dead they may yet speak. In commemorating events thus powerful in forming the manners and sentiments of mankind and in rousing them to strenuous exertion and to high and sustained emulation, it is obvious that such, and such only should be selected as virtue and humanity would approve: and that if any of an opposite character be held up they should be displayed only as beacons, or as a towering Pharos throwing a strong but lurid light to mark the melancholy grave of mad ambition, and to warn the inexperienced voyager of the existing danger.

Thanks to the improved and humanized spirit—or should I not rather say the chastened and pacific civilization of the age in which we live, that laurels gathered upon the field of mortal strife, and bedewed with the tears of the Widow and the Orphan are regarded now, not with admiration but with horror—that the armed warrior reeking with the gore of murdered thousands who in the age that is just passing away would have been hailed with noisy acclamation by the senseless crowd, is now regarded only as the savage commissioner of an unsparing oppression, or at best as the ghostly executioner of an unpitying justice. He who would embalm his name in the grateful remembrance of coming generations—he who would secure for himself a niche in the temple of undying fame—he who would hew out for himself a monument of which his country may boast—he who would entail upon his heirs a name which they may be proud to wear, must seek some other field than that of battle as the theatre of his exploits.

Still we honor the heroes of the age that has passed. No slander can tarnish their hard-earned fame—no morbid sentimentalism sully their peerless glory—no mean detraction abate the disinterestedness of their conduct. They bowed to the spirit of their age: and acting up to the light afforded them they yielded to the dictates of an honest conscience. While assembled here today on this festal occasion to commemorate the event for which the founders of our infant republic toiled, and fought and bled, we seem to behold the forms of the departed ones mingling in our assembly: we seem to behold them taking their seats by the side of their venerable compees yet spared amongst us: watching with intense anxiety the emotions which agitate our bosom, and marking the character of the resolves which the occasion is ripening. Rest in peace ye venerable shades! And ye their living representatives—calm be the evening of your days. We honor you. And though no sculptured marble transmit your fame, a nobler monument shall be yours—the happy hearts of unborn millions shall be the shrine in which your names will be treasured. In your high example—in your noble disinterestedness—in your entire subordination of every thought, an act, and scheme, and interest to the heaven born purpose of human regeneration and human elevation we hear the language of encouragement.

Fellow Citizens on this occasion so big with subjects of profitable meditation—when it is so natural that the mind should oscillate between the events of the past and the prospects of the future, we can conceive of nothing more proper than the enquiry, how we can best execute the solemn trust committed to our hand—how we may challenge and secure the admiration and the gratitude of a virtuous and a happy posterity, by transmitting to them the patrimony received from our fathers, not only in all its original entireness, but in vastly augmented beauty order and strength: In a word how we may best conduct so as to incite them to high and sustained exertion in the cause of virtue and humanity.

In order to impress your minds with the propriety of this inquiry, there is, I trust, no need that I shall remind you of the peculiarity of our condition. It will suffice that I remark that should you succeed in rearing upon the foundation already laid;—or, to drop the figure—should you succeed in establishing a community of virtuous, orderly, intelligent, and industrious citizens, this very peculiarity must enter largely into every consideration on the amount of praise to which you shall be held entitled.

Let us then for a moment look back, that from the events of the past we may derive hope for the future.

We have not yet numbered twenty-six years since he who is the oldest colonists amongst us was the inhabitant—not the citizen—of a country—and that too the country of his birth—where the prevailing sentiment is, that he and his race are incapaitated by an inherent defect in their mental constitution to enjoy that greatest of all blessings and to exercise that greatest of all rights bestowed by a beneficent God upon his rational creatures—namely the government of themselves. Acting upon this opinion; an opinion as false as it is foul—acting upon this opinion as upon a self-evident proposition, those who held it proceeded with a fiendish consistency to deny the right of citizens to those whom they had declared incapable of performing the duties of citizens. It is not necessary and therefore I will not disgust you with the hideous picture of that state of things which followed upon the prevalence of this blasphemous opinion. The bare mention that such an opinion prevailed would be sufficient to call up in the mind even of those who had never witnessed its operation, images of the most sickening and revolting character. Under the iron region of this crushing sentiment most of us who are assembled here to-day drew our first breath and sighed away the years of our youth. No hope cheered us; no noble object looming in the dim and distant future kindled our ambition. Oppression—cold cheerless oppression like the dreary region of an eternal winter chilled every noble passion and fettered and paralysed every arm. And if among the oppressed millions there were found here and there one in whose bosom the last glimmer of a generous passion was not yet extinguished—one, who, from the midst of the inglorious slumberers in the deep degradation arouud him would lift his voice, and demand those rights, which the God of nature hath bestowed in equal gift upon all His rational creatures, he was met at once by those who had first denied and then enforced with the stern reply, that for him and for all his race LIBERTY and EXPATRIATION are inseparable!!

Dreadful as the alternative was:—fearful as was the experiment now proposed to be tried there were hearts equal to the task—hearts which quailed not at the dangers which loomed and frowned in the distance, but calm, cool and fixed in their purpose prepared to meet them with the watchword—Give me Liberty or give me death.

On the 6th. day of February in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and twenty the ship Elisabeth cast loose from her moorings at New York, and on the 8th, day of March of the same year the pilgrims first beheld the land of their fathers the cloud-capt, mountains of Sierra Leone, and cast anchor in that harbor. A few days afterwards they again weighed anchor stood to the South and debarked upon the low and deadly Island of Shebro. On the character of those who formed her noble company I deem it unnecessary to remark. They are sufficiently commended to our esteem as being the first to encounter the difficulties and to face the dangers of an enterprise, which we trust is to wipe away from us the reproach of ages—to silence the calumny of those who abuse us and to restore to Africa her long lost glory. I need not detain you with a narrative of their privations and sufferings: nor will I stop to tell you—though it would be pleasing to do so—with what happy hearts they greeted a reinforcement of pilgrims who joined them in 1821 by the Nautilus. Passing by intermediate events, which did the time allow it would be interesting to notice, we hasten to that grand event—that era of our separate existence, the 25th, day of April in the year of Grace 1822 when the American flag first threw out its graceful folds to the breeze on the heights of Mesurado, and the pilgrims relying upon the protection of heaven and the moral grandeur of their cause, took solemn possession of the land in the name of virtue, humanity and religion.

It would discover an unpardonable apathy were we to pass on without pausing a moment to reflect upon the emotions which heaved the bosoms of the pilgrims when they stood for the first time where we now stand. What a prospect spread out before them!! They stood in the midst of an ancient wilderness, rank and compacted by the growth of a thousand years, unthinned and unreclaimed by a single stroke of the woodman,s axe. Few and far between might be found inconsiderable openings, where the ignorant native erected his rude habitation, or savage as his patrimonisl wilderness celebrated his bloody rites, and presented his votive gifts to Demons. Already the late proprietors of the soil had manifested unequivocal symptoms of hostility and an intention to expel the strangers as soon as an opportunity to do so should be presented. The rainy-season, that terrible ordeal of foreign constitutions was about setting in—the lurid lightning shot its fiery bolt into the forests around them—the thunder muttered its angry tones over their head, and the frail tenaments, the best which their circumstances would afford o shield them from a scorching sun by day and drenchings rains at night, had not yet been completed. To suppose that at this time—when all things above and around them seemed to combine their influence against them—to suppose they did not perceive the full danger and magnitude of the enterprise they had embarked it would be to suppose—not that they were heroes but that they had lost the sensibility of men. True courage is equally remote from blind recklessness and unmanning timidity; and true heroism does not consist in insensibility to danger. He is a hero who calmly meets, and fearlessly grapples the dangers which duty and honor forbid him to decline. The pilgrims rose to a full perception of all the circumstances of their condition. But when they looked back to that country from which they had come out, and remembered the degradations in that house of bondage out of which they had been so fortunate as to escape, they bethought themselves: and recollecting the high satisfaction with which they knew success would gladden their hearts—the rich inheritance it would entail upon their children and the powerful aid it would lend to the cause of universal humanity, they yielded to the noble inspiration and girded them to the battle either for doing or for suffering.

Let it not be supposed because I have laid universal humanity under a tribute of gratitude to the founders of Liberia, that I have attached to their humble achievements too important an influence, in that grand system of agencies which is now at work renovating human society, and purifying and enlarging the sources of its enjoyment. In the system of that Almighty Being without whose notice not a sparrow falls to the ground:

> "Who sees with equal eye as God of All,
> A hero perish or a sparrow fall:
> Atoms or systems into ruin hurled
> And now a bubble burst and now a world;"

In the system of that Almighty One, no action of a moral being is unimportant. Every action of every rational creature hath its assigned place in his system of operations, and is made to bear, however undesigned by the agent with direct force upon the end which his wisdom and goodness have in view to accomplish.

On the morning of the 1st day of December in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and twenty two; On that morning just when the gloom of night was retiring before the advancing light of day, the portentous cloud which had been sometime rising upon the horizon of Liberia—increasing and gathering blackness as it advanced, filling all hearts with fearful apprehension, burst upon the Colony with the force of a tornado. The events of that day have marked it as the most conspicuous in our annals, and it is the anniversary of that day we are here assembled to celebrate.

And what fellow citizens are the particular circumstances the events of that most eventful day which more than the others awaken our exultation? On which one amongst them all is our attention now most intensely fixed? Is it in that our fathers fought, and fought bravely, and strewed the ensanguined plain with the dead bodies of their savage assailants? Is it on the bloody lesson of their superiority which they taught them in the hoarse thunder of the murderous cannon? Is it on that greater skill they displayed in the inglorious art of slaughter and death? I trust not. These trophies of their valor serve not to awaken exultation, but to call up a sigh of regret. It was as the possessors of far higher and nobler virtues they desired to be remembered; as such we tenderly cherish the remembrance of them: and to exult over the fallen foe would be to grieve the pure spirit of those by whose arm the savage fell. Necessity—stern necessity unsheathed their sword and forced them upon an alternative, from which all the feelings of their heart turned with instinctive recoil.

But there is a circumstance connected with the events of that day, with which our hearts can not be too deeply impressed, as it will serve on each appropriate occasion as a check upon presumption and an antidote against despair. Think upon the number of the assailants, and compare it with the number of the assailed, and then say whether any skepticism short of downright, unblushing Atheism, can doubt the interposition in the events of that day of an overruling Providence. Most emphatically does the issue of that contest declare "The battle is not to the strong" The Lord was a shield around them—so that when their foes rose up against them they stumbled and fell. To the interposition of an ever-gracious Providence manifested in no ordinary way we owe the privileges and pleasure of this day.

At this epoch we date the establishment of the Colony.

Having sustained and repulsed every external attack and maintained its ground against the combined and concentrated force of the country it had now to commence its onward career. If there were any, who, because the Colonists had repulsed the natives supposed they had passed the greatest danger and overcome the most formidable obstacles they gave in this very supposition evidence of a deplorable ignorance of human nature and of human history. It is from within that the elements of national overthrow have most commonly evolved: and the weakness under which nations expire generally results from disease of the national heart. Luxury and ambition, oppression on one side and insubordination on the other—these are the fatal elements, which, with more than volcanic force rend to atoms the fabric of human institutions. A common danger—a danger equally menacing all, is almost sure to sink every minor and merely personal consideration, and to be met by a combination of energy, concentration of effort and unity of action; and in proportion as the pressure of danger is great, will there be want of scope for those passions which in a certain class possess such fearful and disorganising potency

From the period of their landing up to the moment of which we have just spoken all minds had been possessed by an undefined apprehension of impending danger, and the first and the constant lesson which their critical position inculcated upon them was, Union and Subordination. The pressure was now taken off,—the angry cloud had passed away, the heavens shone bright and clear—the face of nature was calm and placid, and on every breeze was wafted the fragrance from the surrounding groves. All breathed freely. Each one had time to look around him—to contemplate with calmness and composure the circumstances of his condition, and to select that particular mode of operation and line of conduct which was most congenial with his disposition. All were free—All were equal. Here was unbounded scope for the operations of the passions. Will they who have been declared incapable of enjoying the boon of liberty without running into the wildest excesses of anarchy—Will they now the gift is enjoyed in its largest extent, restrain themselves within the bounds of a rational and virtuous freedom.—Will they connect those two ideas which are at one and the same time the base and the summit of all just political theories, and which can never be separated? Will their liberty be tempered by just and wholesome law? Is it to be expected that a people just set free from the chains of the most abject oppression and slavery, can be otherwise than turbulent, insubordinate and impatient of the least restraint. Is it among the things to be hoped, that they into whose minds the idea of political action had not been allowed to enter, will not, now political power be entrusted to their hands rush into the wildest extremes of crude legislation!

Fellow Citizens! the voice of twenty-four years this day gives the answer; and we are assembled to hear it—and let those who abuse us hear it—let them hear it and be forever silent when they hear that Liberty regulated by Law, and Religion free from superstition form the foundation on which rests the cement which unites, and the ornament which beautifies our political and social edifice.

Let us now turn from those who preceded us and ask what are the peculiar obligations which rest upon us: what the particular duties to which we are called. Let us not suppose that because we are not called upon to drive the invading native from our door—that because we can lie down at night without fear—because the savage war-whoop does not now ring upon the midnight air therefore we have nothing to do. No mistake can be more fatal. Ours is a moral fight. It is a keener warfare, a sharper conflict.

For after indulging to the utmost allowed extent in hyperbolical expression and figurative declamation, still we are forced to confess the work is but just commenced. The nervous arm of our predecessors marked out the site, and laid the foundation and reared the walls of the edifice. The scaffold is still around it. It is ours to mount it—to commence where they ended and to conduct it on toward a glorious completion. How shall we execute our trust—how shall we conduct ourselves so as to stand acquited before the bar of coming generations, and obtain from them a favorable and an honorable verdict? By what means shall we secure and perpetuate our own prosperity and transmit it an inheritance to our children? These are questions which seem peculiarly appropriate to this interesting occasion. And let me congratulate you fellow citizens that you have the experience of others to guide you. The art of government is now elevated to the dignity of a science. The most gifted minds—minds which do honor to human nature have been long turned to the subject: and maxims and propositions which consecrated by time had grown into the strength of anxioms—maxims which had obtained universal assent and universal application—maxims which would have overwhelmed him who should have doubted them with more than sacrilegious turpitude and sent him to atone for his presumption upon the scaffold or in the gloomy depths of a dungeon—maxims the legitimate offspring of ignorance and oppression have been successfully explored and the human mind disenthralled. That more than magical phrase in the hand of the despot "the divine right of kings" has lost its power to charm; and frequent examinations into the foundations of society have at length taught men the interesting truth, that the duties and rights of magistrate and subject are correllate—that government is made for the people and not the people for the government: thus establishing the eternal truth first enunciated in the declaration of American Independence "That all men are free and equal." The bare utterance of those ever memorable words by the immortal Jefferson, whilst it struck the fetters from the human mind and sent it bounding on in a career of improvement, wrested the sceptre from the tyrant's hand and dissolved his throne beneath him. Truth threw a strong and steady light where there was naught but darkness before, man beheld his dignity and his rights and prepared to assert the one and sustain the other. But I return. By what means shall we advance our prosperity.

The first requisite to permanent advancement if I may so speak, is order. Order is heaven's first law. It is this which imparts stability to human institutions, because while like the laws of nature it restrains each one in his proper sphere it leaves all to operate freely and without disturbance. Here will be no jostling. When I say order, I mean not to restrict the term to the ordinary occupations of life; I extend the word to mean a strict and conscientious submission to established law. It is said to be the boast of that form of government under which we live that no man, however high in office, can violate with impunity the sacred trust committed to his hand and long insult the people by trampling upon their rights: that the distinguishing excellence of a republican form of government is, that under it oppression can have no place. This opinion I am not disposed to combat: but as it is a fact that a safe and constitutional remedy for all grievances to this kind is in the hand of the people, this circumstance alone should dispose every one to submit for a time to some inconvenience rather than apply a rash and violent corrective. I admit there are cases in which the minions of office become so intoxicated with a little brief power—that forgetting all men are free and possess certain constitutional privileges, and forgetting also that they were elevated to office not to be oppressors but conservators, their haughty, vexatious and oppressive conduct becomes intolerable. In such cases as these let the strong indignation of an outraged public, calmly but firmly expressed, awaken the dreamer from his vision of greatness and send him back to re-enact his dream in his original obscurity.

(To be continued.)

(Continued from the Fourth Page.)

where happiness may be found and degradation where true dignity may reside. Nay if our limits admitted of it, it might easily be shown, that the faithful discharge of the duties of an inferior station, and that contented and cheerful mind which partakes of its greatest enjoyments, are the surest and safest means of advancement. I shall satisfy myself, however, with pointing out, in the following chapter, some important cautions with respect to the improvement of our condition.

APHORISMS;

OR, SELECT SAYINGS OF THE LIVING AND THE DEAD.

TO CHURCH MEMBERS.

THE rule of Scripture is this: First pure, then peaceable." Let this be your rule. There is scarcely any blessing more desirable than peace—true well—grounded peace. It is so intimately connected with prosperity, that the Hebrew word which is commonly translated "peace," signifies also "prosperity." "Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces.' The Hebrew word is the same in both instances.—Rev. A. Fuller.

Endeavor by all means to preserve a good understanding with YOUR PASTOR. His peace of mind is essential to his happiness and your edification. * * Enemies will watch him with a desire for his halting; but do not you. Be not hasty in taking up or falling in with reports to his disadvantage. Let your contributions for his support be distinguished, not only by liberality but also by the cheerfulness with which they are given. Let them be a tribute of love. * * * Always unite with him that he may not have to endure all the prejudice and odium consequent on strict discipline.—Ibid.

Do not intermeddle with each other's temporal affairs. Different people have different ways of managing their domestic affairs; and if your brethren do but act so as to be honorable in the world, what right have you to interfere?—Ibid.]

Guard against a touchy temper.] Charity is not soon angry.

"For every trifle scorn to take offence,
It either shows great pride, or little sense."—Ibid.

Encourage no tale-bearers. Persons that make it their business, and feel it their delight to go about telling secrets to the disadvantage of their neighbors, deserve the deepest marks of censure. Are you at variance with a brother? Mark the man who by his insinuations and innuendoes, would make the breach wider, and shun him.—Ibid.

We shall never carry on the work of communion, unless we grow up into Christ by express dependence upon him, and deriving life and strength from him and returning all unto his praise and glory, as our Head being thereby brought nearer, and more like unto him. The increase of faith in these things is our growing up into Christ.—Rev. Dr. John Owen.

Whatever your concern is in the truths of the gospel let love be acted in it; and that is the means whereby you convey your supplies from every joint and part into the whole. Truth requires surity of compassion, admonition, exhortation forbearance, and the like; do it all in love. A church full of love is a church well built up. I had rather see a church filled with love a thousand times than filled with the best, the highest, and most glorious gifts and parts that any man in this world may be made partaker of. Could they go beyond and exceed all we aim at or desire: could they speak with the tongues of men and angels; it is ten thousand times more for the glory of God and our own comfort to be with a company of poor saints, who are full of love, than with those of the highest attaintsments, without it.—Ibid.

The blessedness of a future world is ever represented in Scripture as the final end and scope of the Christian profession: the doctrines which it embraces the duties which it enjoins are represented as terminating in that as its ultimate object. * * * The church of Christ is unquestionably ordained merely as one of the instruments of qualifying its members for the possession of eternal life: but for this it would have no existence.—Rev. Robert, Hall.

SKILL OF THE ANCIENT EGYPTIANS.

LOST ARTS.—If the Thebans, 1800 years before Christ, knew less in some departments of useful knowledge, than ourselves, they also in others knew more. One great proof of the genius of that splendid line of potentates, entitled the eighteenth Theban dynasty, and the extent of civilization under their rule, was that the practical, chemical, astronomical and mechanical knowledge which they shared with the priestly (scientific) colleges was in some respects equal to, in some respects greater, than, our own. They made glass in great profusion (Diodorus Siculus,) and burning glasses, and lenses for spectacles. They must have cut their delicate cameos by the aid of microscopes. —Ptolemy describes an astrolabe; they calculated eclipses; they said that the moon was diversified by sea and land (Plutarch de facie lunæ;) that "one lunar day was equal to fifteen of the earth;" that "the earth's diameter was a third of the moon's;" and that "the moon's mass was to that of the earth as 1 to 72." All these things show good instruments. They made gold potable, (inferentially; Moses did so, who was a scribe brought up up the Sovereign Pontiff, and nursed in the "wisdom of the Egyptians;") an 'art lost,' till recently recovered by a French chemist. Their workmanship in gold, as recorded by Homer, and their golden clockwork, by which thrones moved, must have been exquisitely ingenious. They possessed the art of tempering copper tools, so as to cut the hardest granite with the most minute and brilliant precision. This art we have lost. We see the sculptors in the act of cutting the inscriptions on the granite obelisks and tablets. We see a pictorial copy of the chisels and tools with which the operation was performed. We see tools themselves. (There are sculptors' chisels at the museum the cutting end of which preserves its edge unimpaired while the blunt extremity is flattened by the blows of the mallet.) But our tools would not cut such stone with the precision of outline which the inscriptions retain to the present day. Again, what mechanical means had they to raise and fix the enormous imposts on the lintels of their temples at Karnac? Architects now confess that they could not raise them by the usual mechanical powers These means must, therefore be put to the account of the lost arts. That they were familiar with the principle of Artesian wells has been lately proved by engineering investigations carried on while boring for water in the Great Oasis. That they were acquainted with the principle of the railroad is obvious, that is to say, they had artificial causeways, levelled direct, and grooved, (the grooves being anointed with oil,) for the conveyance from great distances of enormous blocks of stone entire stone temples, and colossal statues of half the height of the monument. Remnants of iron, it is said have lately been found in these grooves. Finally, N. Arago has argued that they not only possessed a knowledge of steam power, which they employed in the cavern mysteries of their Pagan freemasonry (the oldest in the world of which the Pyramids were the lodges,) but that the modern steam-engine is derived, through Solomon de Caus the predecessor Worcester, from the invention of Hero the Egyptian engineer. The contest of the Egyptian sophos with Moses before Pharaoh pays singular tribute to their union of "knowledge and power." No supernatural aid is intimated. Three of the miracles of their natural magic (See Sir D. Browster) the juggelers of the East can and do now perform. In the fourth, an attempt to produce the lowest form of lice they fail. From the whole statement one inference is safe, that the daring ambition of the priestly chemists and anatomists had been led from the triumphs of embalming and chicken-hatching (imitatings and assisting the production of life) to a Frankenstein experiment on the vital fluid and on the principle of life itself, perhaps in experiments like those (correctly or incorrectly) ascribed to Mr. Crosse, in the hope of creating not reviving the lowest form of animal existence. —Westminster Review.

Electric Girl.—The Paris Constitutional co[ntains] a remarkable account of a young girl from N[ormandy] who is so completely charged with electricity, [that] she presents the same extraordinary phenomena which is seen in torpedos, and other electric fishes. All be[ings] that come in contact with her experience a shock or movement of repulsion which displaces and even, in some cases throws them down violently, at the same time she experiences an instantaneous and irresistible attraction towards the objects that repulsed. M. Arago has been a witness of many of these phenomena, and has brought them under the notice of the Academy of Science at Paris, which has appointed a commission charged to inquire into them.

It is the left side of the body which alone has acquired this power—sometimes attractive, but more frequently repulsive.

The girl is fourteen years of age only, and the singular occurrences do not take place at all times, but appear at intervals during the day with the greatest intensity in the evening.

True godliness does not turn men out of the world, but enables them to live better in it, and incites them endeavours to mend it. Christians should keep the helm and guide the vessel to its port; not meanly steal out at the stern, and leave those in it without a pilot to be driven by the fury of evil times upon the rock or sand of ruin.

Aim at maintaining communion with God; whether ye eat or drink, do all with this end in view. This is to walk with God, to dwell with Him, and to have Him dwelling with you. Archangels can rise no higher; saints in glory cannot rise higher than to know, in its fullest extent, what it is to have fellowship with God; and this is the privilege of the church militant whilst passing through the wilderness on her way to the church triumphant; "for truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." This communion is like that hidden manna and that white stone which has written on it that new name which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."

Pride in men.—Take some quiet, sober moment of life, and add together the two ideas of [pride] and [men], add them, if you can without a smile. Behold [the] creature of a span high, strutting in infinite space, and darting disdain from his eyes' in all the grandeur of littleness. Perched on a small speck of the universe, he is rolling along the heavens, through a road of worlds, while systems and creations are flaming above and beneath; he is an atom of atoms. Ye will this miserable creature revel in his greatness and deride his fellow, sprung from that same dust to which they both shall soon return. Well has man in his unregenerate state, and in the pride of his heart, been compared to the fly on the coach-wheel, saying, "What a dust I raise!"—Sinclair.

Terrible Steamboat Disaster and Loss of Life.—The Southern papers give an account of another distressing accident on the Mississippi, by which some forty or fifty persons were drowned or frozen to death. The particulars are as follows: On the night of the 18th December, the steamboat Belle Zone, Captain Brazier, while on her way from Zanesville, Ohio, to New Orleans, struck a snag about twelve miles below the mouth of the White River, on the Mississippi and immediately turned bottom up. It was about twelve o'clock when the accident occurred and the night was bitterly cold. Out of some ninety souls on board at the time, upwards of fifty perished in this terrible accident. Some of the unfortunate victims only escaped being drowned to freeze to death after reaching the shore At the time of the disaster of course all the passengers were asleep or in their berths, and so suddenly did the boat careen and go over, that such as made out to release themselves were only able to snatch a blanket or counterpaine from their beds—they had no time to save, much less to put on their clothing.—The Friend.

C. J. Lavater.—Karamsin, the Russian traveler, having witnessed Lavater's diligence in study, visiting the sick, and relieving the poor, was greatly surprised at his fortitude and activity, and said to him, "Whence have you so much strength of mind and power of edurance?" "My friend," replied he, "man rarely wants the power to work when he possesses the will: the more I labour in the discharge of my duties, so much the more ability and inclination to labour do I constantly find within myself." —The Friend.

Knowledge—Knowledge did not teach Charlemagne to sacrifice his own desires to the happiness of any living creature. It neither made Augustus respect the life of Cicero, nor the pupil of Aristotle restrain his passions. Mirabeau the genius of the French was a monster of depravity; and Robespierre himself, was a man of education. Knowledge, on the contrary, when undirected by virtue, is made the servant of vice, and has in all ages produced most fearful consequences.—Extract.

FACTS AND ARGUMENTS ON THE TRANSMISSION OF MORAL. and Intellectual Qualities from Parents to Offspring. Second Edition Improved. (Pp. 202. 12mo.) J. Winchester. Price 37 cent.

This work from the pen of a lady of New-York, has hitherto been scarcely known beyond a very limited circle, yet its intrinsic worth and the great importance of the subject it treats must secure it an earnest and general consideration.—The following extract from the concluding chapter will give a fair idea of the scope of the work, though not of the fidelity, purity and careful elaboration with which its idea has been traced out, and fortified with the concurring opinions of nearly all eminent authorities in physiological and moral science:

It has been the aim of the writer to convince her sex that influence' such as few of them have ever

...ground of its appointed theme in Nature, and that ...influence is of such a character as to ... the ...foundation of the prosperity and welfare of mankind.

To accomplish her object, she has chosen the mode best adapted to the great mass of female minds, viz; that of illustrating the positions taken, by cases brought from private experience, from biography, and from history. She might have gone into abstract reasoning upon the several laws stated, and have equally sustained herself; for where facts illustrate general principles, reason and philosophy never fail. But she has adopted that manner of making the truth apparent, which while it detracts nothing from its power, will present it to the female mind in a more fascinating garb than if clothed in mere philosophical argument. The facts which have been adduced and the arguments which have been offered are designed to establish the following principles:—

First. The offspring are dependent on their parents for their mental and physical constitutions.

Second. That these may be modified by the will of the parents.

Third. That, in the transmission from parents to offspring, more depends on the mother than the father.

Fourth. That this is especially and strikingly true of the intellect and feelings.

Fifth. That every female, from the moment she is liable to become a mother, is solemnly responsible to her Maker, to her future offspring and society for the mind she will impart and the morally and physical qualities she will transmit.

Sixth. That it is the duty of every female, one of the highest she is called upon to discharge,) to spare no efforts that the circumstances which make up her condition during the period of gestation shall be such as will be most favorable to the transmission of a sound organization and of a well balanced mind.

And lastly. That if any faculty or set of faculties, are in frequent and high exercise in the mother during this period, they will be inherited in increased strength and energy by her offspring.

The importance of these principles to mankind at large, cannot be too highly estimated. They lie at the very basis of all that we desire for man. They embrace the springs of human ability motive and action. They show that the complicated physical and mental machine called man, is no random result of fortuitous circumstances but a being taking his origin under fixed laws; that all the diversities of moral and physical aspect which he presents are but the results of those laws.

This work has been considerably extended since the former edition and being thrown into the cheap form, it is sold at about half the former price. It is richly worthy the regard of all, especially of parents.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. DECEMBER 18 1846

OUR AFFAIRS.

The colonial Legislature meets on the first Monday in the ensuing month—January. Matters of the greatest moment to us—matters which cannot fail to affect us deeply for good or evil—to establish our character as a public spirited, enterprising and progressing people or brand us as a timid, dependent and grovelling community will come up for discussion and determination. Hence the ensuing session is looked forward to with the most intense anxiety by all classes of people. Considerable anxiety is felt by many in regard to the course which rumor says the members from the lower counties will pursue. Rumor says they intend to maintain the position which they took and so strongly and strenuously defended in the session of last July. We know nothing of the views of these gentlemen except through the uncertain channel of rumor, as we are not honored with a place among their correspondents, yet we are unwilling to believe that no change has come "over their dreams;" that they will still refuse to vote for a law and distinct organization,—that they will still hold out their leading strings and endeavour to hang an unwelcome load on the hands of the Colonization Society, when that Society has given indications so unequivocal of a desire to be relieved of them. We are unwilling to believe that these gentlemen, in all the time which has elapsed since the last session have not been able to seperate the question now every where mooted from all that is extraneous and foreign from it, and to look at "Sovereignty" naked and alone, wholly distinct and disevered from those circumstances, which, although usually found to attend it in established and full-grown communities, enter nevertheless not in the least degree into its character and integrity.

In the discussion of practical questions which may be supposed to affect the interest of more parties than one, great deference is undoubtedly due to established maxims and usages. These are indispensable to the peace and repose of nations. They regulate their intercourse—define their privileges and in litigated cases form a standard of appeal: but in determining cases of a purely abstract character, there is danger, by an exclusive regard to them of being conducted to an erroneous conclusion. Into this error, our highly respected opponents in our humble opinion have been betrayed; and it is with us an earnest hope that their mind may be freed from its influence when they shall meet in legislative capacity in January.

Indeed there is no alternative. The Rubicon is passed." To falter and hesitate now can serve only to display a child-like imbecility on the part of the colony while at the same time that it must greatly embarrass the Colonization Society. That Society has dissolved the connexion—re-organized itself to meet expected re-organization on our part and invited us to take up a position to which, from our previous boasting and swaggering it was supposed we would rush with all the ardor of a proud and enthusiastic patriotism. Although we are aware that opposition by the members from the lower counties cannot arrest the progress of things, or defeat the consummation of the measure, yet we are not willing to close our eyes against the evils and inconveniences which will assuredly attend continued opposition. A transition state is always a critical state, and demands more than all other states unanimity and concord. In addition to the dangers which evermore attend that state, there be one, which threaten, the disintegration of the members of the community, that difficulty cannot be looked upon by the most careless but with the deepest solicitude. But we feel confident that these dangers so threatning in the distance will vanish before the face of free and dispassionate discussion—that if those who are called to determine the question will but open their minds to truth and their ears to reason, and not suffer the pride of opinion to usurp the throne of judgement, it will be determined in a way honorable to Liberia and satisfactory to its friends abroad. Let our Legislators therefore look well to this matter. The fate of the colony—awful responsibility! depends upon their decision: the record of their vote will be the bright register of an honorable name or the gloomy imprint of a melancholy epitaph: and let them further remember, that their action in this case will for mental ability and political sagacity decide the ... the estimation of the present and of the ... generation.

Our harbour a few days ago presented a lively and busy scene. There were at one time six Vessels of War at anchor—three American including the Flag-Ship—two English and one French. They have jam nigh exhausted our stock of fresh provisions.

A most destructive war is raging at and around the Gallinas. It commenced among the natives but soon extended itself until it included in its circle some barracoons of foreign slavers. Two Spaniards are said to have been killed in the melee and a large quantity of Rice destroyed.

LIBERIA LYCEUM.

Jno N. Lewis Esq. by appointment of this institution pronounced an Eulogy before the body on the evening of the 9th inst. on the life and character of the late Mr. A. W. Anderson corresponding Secretary of the Lyceum. The remarks in themselves were good, and such as ardent friendship would naturally suggest.

BARBARIC POMP.

A grand affair has lately gone off somewhere in the vicinity of Tuemba. The mother of Will Buckler a chief of some note in that region died last June. She had been lying in state from that time until about ten days ago, and while she was thus lying, preparations were making to give her a sepulture befitting her character and her son's dignity. The time for the burial arrived and all the country was invited to the play. There was in consequence a total cessation of trade to the great annoyance of Palm Oil buyers. Of course the occasion demanded a great feast, which, it is but reasonable to suppose, was much more than the interment the great attracting influence. The body enclosed in a rude chest, was taken from its place of six months' repose and laid in the path leading to the grave where it lay four days previous to interment. During this time the assembled multitudes occupied their time in dancing by night and sleeping by day, and in minor feasting on such things as chance threw in their way. The Big Dinner given by Mr. Buckler was kept back until the day of interment. Great preparations were made for the feast. For the solid part there were fifty Bullocks and numberless small things, such as goats and sheep, and for the liquid, oceans of Palm-Wine and Jamaica, of which the guests were permitted to drink ad libitum. He is a great man, that Will Buckler.

We hear it is contemplated by a Liverpool commercial house to purchase "Teembo." This, as all other recent movements of the kind can be regarded no otherwise than opposition to the colony. These purchases of private individuals and all the rights they are supposed to confer, officers of the British Government have avowed a determination to defend. What these rights are defined to be—how extensive or how exclusive, it has not been our privilege to hear: and if the government here be as ignorant in the premises as we are, the present correspondence which it is said is going on between the Executive and the senior British Officer on this station presents a convenient opportunity to inquire. Whatever interpretation may be given of the matter—it it should be determined that the purchases confer only an irresponsible right to the trade, still they cannot but seriously embarress the operations of the colony and greatly retard its growth. The British government has expressed a readiness to respect our claim to territory which we have acquired by fair purchase from the natives: but denies to us the right which alone gives value to the acquisition! Of but little use will a line of coast be to us if it be dismembered and cut up by little principalities and sovereignties; wholly irresponsible and independent, burning with hostility against the colony, determined to throw every possible annoyance and impediment in its way and backed at the same time by a power before which we dare not say our soul is our own. This is a most serious affair. It demands the combined wisdom of the colony, and calls for immediate action.

Threatening as the aspect of this question is, we are nevertheless of the opinion that it can be satisfactorily ... isted. If we would have our rights respected we must respect the rights of others. If Englishmen have purchased land no argument or discussion can take it from them. They have as good right thereto as we have to our purchases. If their presence annoy us, it is clear we have no alternative, but must submit to the annoyance until we have assumed that character which will enable us to seek for a removal of the inconvenience by treaty stipulations or by purchase. A distinction however should be made between right to property and political jurisdiction.

It is not to be believed that the British Government meditates wrong against this infant people. If we were at once blotted out of existence what benefit would it confer upon England? But it is to be expected that, that government will guard, and with jealousy too the rights of its subjects even in Africa. We, if we would be successful must lay our case by our own representatives before the British people.

The Subscriber by the assistance of friends having been enabled to commence business again, takes this opportunity to solicit a share of public patronage. He sets with him a fixed and unalterable purpose to pay off all his just debts—and not to avail himself of the lenity of the "Insolvent Act" and withhold from his creditors their just dues when it may be in his power to pay them, he especially asks commission business of them: as every cent of commission arising to him shall go to his credit. The subscriber has opened on Broad Street just opposite his residence. He will sell at a small profit—and his terms will be cash both in selling and in buying.

E. TEAGE.

Monrovia Dec. 12th 1846.

Office of the Liberia Herald.

Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

NOTICE.

NEW GOODS, Flour, Pork, Beef, Tobacco and Blue Baffs, for sale. American and foreign dry goods, both staple and fancy, varied by and with every modern improvement, in price, quality and fashion. The same may be said of lots of bonnets and shoes, &c, &c, &c, too tedious to mention. The above named assortment was purchased for cash and therfore will be only sold for cash or produce down on the nail on the fairest terms.

EDWARD J. ROYE.

Monrovia June 10th 1846.

WANTED, by the subscriber 1000 bushels of peanuts very dry and in good order for shiping for which goods will be given at the lowest price.

E. J. ROYE.

ALSO Products of the soil that will bear shiping hitherto not exported together with every species of rare animals, birds, shells, or phenomena, of this portion of the Globe.

E. J. ROYE

NEW SUPPLIES, Flour, sugar, pork, beef, fish, & dry goods &c. recently bought & for sale at my usual low prices.

E. J. ROYE.

Monrovia Nov. 5 th 1846

For the Liberia Herald.

MESSRS EDITORS,

Horrid Murder at Sinoe.—As the Rev. James H. Stevens, formerly a member of the Liberia Annual conference of the M. E. Church, was sitting in his residence at Sinoe, on the evening of the 10th inst., he was shot by some person from without. Deliberate aim was taken by the murderer, as his victim received the contents of the gun in his head and right shoulder. A young lady who resided in the family was also severely wounded by the same discharge. Mr. S. lingered until the 14th, when he died, leaving good evidence that he was supported in this most dreadful affliction by the Lord his Saviour in whom he had a firm trust.

The supposed murderer has been arrested, and is now in chains awaiting his trial: but I forbear giving the name of the suspected person, until more definite evidence is received than vague reports.

Yours,
W. B. H.

RESULT OF ACCIDENT.

Many of the most important discoveries on the field of science have been the result of accident. Two little boys of a spectacle maker in Holland, while their father was at dinner, engaged to look at a distant steeple through two eye-glasses, placed one before another. They found the steeple brought much nearer the shop windows. They told their father on his return and the circumstance led him to a course of experiments which ended in the telescope.

Some shipwrecked sailors once collected some sea weeds on the sand and made a fire to warm their shivering limbs, and cook their scanty meal. When the fire went out, they found that the alkali of the sea-weed had combined with the sand, and formed glass, the basis of all our discoveries in astronomy, and absolutely necessary to our enjoyment.

Sir Isaac Newton's most important discoveries concerning light and gravitation, were the result of accident. His theory on experiments on light were suggested by the soap-bubbles of a child, and on gravitation, by the fall of an apple as he sat in the orchard. And it was by hastily scratching on a stone, a memorandum of some articles brought him from the washerwoman's, that the idea of lithography first presented itself to the mind of Senefelder. —S. S. Advocate.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	none
Beads, pound,	"	10 00	12 00
Beef, barrel,	Bb	3 75
Blue Baffs,	Ps.	12 00
Bricks,	100	30
Butter,	Firkin	none
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	20
Cheese,	"	none
Corn meal,	Bbl	none
Checks domestic,	Ps
Cotton wrapping,	Bale	8	12 1.2
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	10 00
Flour superfine,	Bbl	30 00
Guns,	Box	5 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	none
Lead, pig,	"	20
Lard,	Keg,	50
Lime,	Bushel,	45
Molasses,	Gallon
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00
Nails	100lb	8 00
Oil paint	Gallon	1 50
Oil palm	"	— 34
Pork	Bbl	none
Pots iron	Cwt.	none
Powder	Bl.	15 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter,	"	3 00
Pipes gumbo	Box	none	20
Prints assorted	various	10	1 50
Romals,	Ps.	1 00
Salt,	Ton	14 00
Sugar loaf	Lb.	— 18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 75
Tobacco	100lbs	20 00
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wines		5 00	8 00

MARINELIST

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Decr. 5. H. M. C M. Brig ——, ——commanding from the windward.

" " Col. sloop Nathan Bangs, G. Ammons master, from the leeward.

" 6. H. B. M. Sloop Favorite, Murray Esq. commander, from the windward.

" 7. U. S. Ship United States, Smoot Captain, commanding from the windward

" 8. U. S. Brig Dolphin, Pope Esq. commander, from the windward.

" " U. S. Ship Marion, Simond Esq. commander, from the windward.

" 10. H. M. C. M. Brig —— commander from the leeward; left same day for the windward.

DEPARTURES.

Decr. 5. U. S. Brig Boxer, Bispham Esq commander, for the windward.

" 6. British brig——, ——master, for the leeward.

" 7. H. M. C. M. Brig —— commander for the leeward.

" 12. H. B. M. Sloop Favorite, Murray Esq. commander, for the windward.

" " H. B. M. Brig——commander, for the windward.

" 15. Col. schooner Pedler, Carroll master, for the leeward; Passengers, to Grand Bassa, N. Brander, F. S. James, and ... White.

" 17. U. S. Ship United States, Smoot Capt. commanding, for the leeward.

" " U. S. Ship Marion, Simond Esq. commander, for the leeward.

" " U. S. Brig Dolphin, Pope Esq. commander, for the leeward; Passenger, Gen. John N. Lewis.

POETRY

From the Friend.

THE TWO PILOTS:
OR A SHIPWRECK.

Life is a summer voyage for me,
And I shall make it pleasantly,
For cloudless is the sun;
There is no dark or gloomy thing,
That can a passing shadow fling,
Across my horizon.

Thus a young mariner believes,
As, outward bound, he gaily leaves,
With all his canvass spread;
Upon life's wide and swelling sea,
His bark is bounding fast and free,
By summer breezes sped.

Now, the Good Pilot goes abroad,
And kindly offers to afford
The mariner his aid:
"I need it not," the sailor cries,
"Before my bark all danger flies,
And I am not afraid.

"The Pleasant Isles for which I start
Are clearly laid upon my chart,
And even now in view;
I surely have no need of thee,
For winds and skill will carry me,
In perfect safety through."

Thus with his hand upon the helm,
Heedless that tempests may o'erwhelm,
He bids adieu to fears;—
An archipelago's in sight,
Full of the Islands of Delight,
For which he gaily steers.

He seeks the port of Present Bliss,
A harbour which he would not miss,
It looks so bright and fair;
Through Straits of Joy he means to glide,
And thinks he feels a rising tide,
Flowing directly there.

But just as he is passing in,
He strikes upon a Shoal of Sin,
Which at the entrance lay;
But still he keeps his canvass free,
Determined to pass gallantly
Upon his onward way.

But now arose a sudden gale,
(Such in that latitude prevail)
Which from the harbour blew;
It carries him far out to sea,
Where Isles that loom so gay pleasantly,
Are hidden from his view.

This was a Disappointing Blast,
Which tore his sails, and sprung his mast,
And gave his hull a strain;
Yet, when the gale had spent its force,
Again he held his former course,
The promised port to gain.

Again the Islands of Delight,
And Present Bliss appear in sight—
The Straits of Joy are there,
Impatience lends his bark a breeze,
Propelling it across the seas,
And blowing fresh and fair.

Through Straits of Joy he's sailing in,
Beating against the Shoals of Sin,
With all his canvass strained:
"Huzza! for I have passed the strait,
All hindering things are now remote,
For Present Bliss is gained."

Alas! his cheering is too soon—
In what appeared a fair lagoon,
His bark is blown about;
He cannot reach the tempting shore
By press of sail, or lab'ring oar—
The tide is running out.

Now at the helm another stands,—
'Tis Sin's Old Pilot who commands,
And boasts of skill and care;
The bark goes rapidly along
With currents that are swift and strong,
But bearing it—oh! where?

Instead of reaching Present Bliss
Father he goes away from this,
Straining on hidden shoals;
The pilot steering all the time
To reach the rocks of Open Crime,
And point of Shipwrecked Souls.

But now a tempest called Disease,
Which often sweeps across life's seas,
Comes down upon the bark;
Before the blast his vessel flies,
Where no inviting harbour lies,
But all is drear and dark.

How like a hurricane it blows!
Sail after sail, his canvass goes,
His masts are falling round!
And now one last despairing shriek,
Proclaims, a death-insuring leak
The mariner has found.

From wave to wave the wreck is cast,
Borne headlong onward by the blast,
Beyond man's power to save;
And now, he yields his latest breath,
Drawn into that great whirlpool, death,
He finds an awful grave.

Thus he who started fresh and gay,
Has soon become a castaway,
Because he would not take,
The only Pilot that can guide
Safety across life's changing tide,
And heaven's sure harbour make

E. S

Religion is a treasure affording continual expenses, not exhausted, yet increased by expenses, wherein it exceeds all the other treasures in the world.—Shaw.

MISCELLANEOUS

CHAPTER III.

The DUTIES of those who are placed in the INFERIOR STATIONS of life endowed with INFERIOR CAPACITIES and POWERS.

IF the distribution of abilities illustrated in the first Book, and a diversity of ranks in society be best calculated to promote the happiness, not only of the social body in general, but of every individual that composes it how iniquitous and unreasonable is it to oppose this plan, and to complain of its arrangement, because it coincides not with the suggestions of ambition and caprice? When men despise those talents and that rank in life which divine providence has allotted them and aspire at others for which they were never designed by nature, they aim at subverting that equality of obligation which assigns particular duties to particular abilities and situations, and requires them to be answered by others of a different order. For, if every man is at liberty to desert the post assigned him and to invade another's province, how shall the inferior stations be filled, which are not less necessary to the general welfare than the more eminent? If in the circumstances in which any given number of men can be placed, there be unavoidable hardships and inconveniences, why should these rather be supported by such as have never been accustomed to them, and are therefore totally unqualified for their duties, than by those whom education, and habit, have best adapted to such situations? Yet, unless these inconvenences be endured, these difficulties encountered by some, the stations in question must be deserted, and a void left in the order of society equally pernicious to public and to private interest.

Still men complain of their situation, and eagerly aspire to others more exalted! But is their any real foundation for this discontent, for this restless desire of change? Is it, as people pretend; that their present condition is more painful, more adverse to virtue, more inauspicious to the development and exercise of their powers, than those which they so fondly desire? Or is it that men are better acquainted with the difficulties and temptations of their present situation, than with those of any other, have fondly magnified their own abilities and ignorantly placed all excellence in the discharge of the duties of superior stations? If we examine the case with impartial attention we shall find no reason to hesitate in determining the qustion.

Men readily grant the complaints of those who are placed above them to be ill founded and ascribe their dissatisfaction to their folly. They hastily presume that, if they were fixed in their situation, they would easily surmount its difficulties, resist its temptations, and fully discharge its duties. Their inferiors pronounce the same judgment with regard to them and their circumstances, and, if they envy, they are envied in their turn. A convincing proof this, that in every condition, there are advantages as well as difficultes that though none is excepted from inconvenience, none is absolutely insupportable; and that discontent with a present station and impatient desire of a higher proceed from mistaken notions of both.

I beg that it may be considered that I am, at present speaking only of the different ranks and situations of human society as they are diversified for the common happiness of mankind; and not of those singular conditions of distress and misery which fall to the lot of individuals. In those patience and fortitude may be recommended as duties and as consolations; but contentment can hardly be required.

But in surveying the different stations of life, although men grant that there are difficulties and hardships in all of them they still believe that those diminish in proportion to the degree of elevation; and fall, with the greatest weight, on those who occupy the lowest places. They fondly imagine, that if they could ascend to a considerable height, they should there find some agreeable spot, where unmolested and composed they might survey the steep which they had climbed, and enjoy the delightful prospect opened around them. But they reflect not on the difficulty of the ascent, on the giddiness of the situation, or, if they should chance to slip on the severity of the fall. The pressure of corporeal wants, the burden of daily labor, and the humiliation of contempt; constitute the primary pains of a poor and ignoble condition. It is further deprived of the enjoyments which result from the cultivation of reason; and of the other nobler faculties of the soul, and is constrained to toil amidst the darkness of ignorance. If those to whose share it falls, feel for the miseries of others, they are destitute of the means of relieving them and must suffer the pangs of compassion, without the divine satisfaction of beneficence. Pressed with their own distresses, feeling for those in similar or in still more afflicting circumstances, and observing the superfluity of the sons of fortune, they are apt to envy their prosperity to murmer at the Divine dispensations, and to practice violence or fraud in order to obtain what their situation has denied them.

They consider not however that the pleasures of life depend not so much on the externals of condition as on the dispositions of the possessor; that what seems calculated to satisfy and to limit, desire serves often to inflame and extend it, that the enjoyments which are in men's power are not those which they really taste; and that to wish and to pursue is the unceasing employment of man upon earth. He who ascends a mountain and beholds the view unfolding around him is fired with greater curiosity to reach the summit, whence the utmost bounds of the prospect can be descried. In like manner no moderate exaltation in the scale of society can satisfy men, whose ambition is kindled, and whose activity engaged. Every step becomes only a help to rise higher; and desire continues importunate even after its objects are all exhausted. Alexander is the true emblem of ambition, which is restless while any thing remains above it; and when it has reached the summit of its desires, weeps that the progress is finished!

Ye who envy fortune and rank, not so much for the sensual pleasures or the indulgencies of vanity and pride which they afford, as for the sublime and elegant enjoyments which they seem to offer, in the improvement of knowledge, the cultivation of genius, and the exercise of the noblest virtues of human nature—say if the engagements of public business, the contentions of ambition the interruptions of company, the endless exactions of ceremony, the allurements of pleasure, can afford much leisure for the improvement of the mind and the cultivation of elegant studies; or that when the reputation of wisdom, of learning or of wit, is acquired without judgement: application or parts, and flattery amply supplies every deficiency, there is any incitement to such noble and pleasing pursuits? In a low and indigent station are there greater temptations to discontent and envy, than when success enflames ambition and ambition spurns every inferior degree? Are the motives stronger to cultivate honesty, and to observe the dictates of justice, when the severity of punishment hangs over the head of the offender, than when concealment is promised by interest, inquiry removed by intrigue, or impunity secured by power? Is there less sympathy with the distress or less sincere joy on the prosperity of others, when men are reminded of their sufferings by the experience of their own, and depend for subsistence on their bounty and good opinion—than when luxury removes even the aspect of want, and opulence secure independence? Is there less piety and devotion less reverence for God, when men literally implore him for daily bread, and depend for its supply on the continuance of health, and on the fertility of the seasons, than when having much goods laid up for many years they eat, drink, and are merry, and the immoderate draughts of plenty render them forgetful of the bountiful hand that bestows it?

Supposing after that the advantages of cultivation and virtue are fully improved by those in the higher stations, in what do those exceed the same advantages of the inferior, so to render them objects of envy or causes of discontent?—Has not every member of Christian society sufficient opportunity of acquiring the sublimest and most useful branches of human knowledge —the relation in which he stands to his Creator and to his fellow men—the divine nature and perfections—the gracious plan of salvation the Deity has published to guilty mortals by the mouth of his own Son and by his inspired apostles—the glorious prospects opened to his penitent and amended children beyond the grave and the gracious means he hath instituted for their perfection and felicity? Do not the heavens the ocean and the earth, unfold their magnificent and numberless beauties to the eye of the peasant, as well as to that of the monarch; nay, do they not disclose to the former many ravishing scenes which the latter can seldom behold? Are not many even of the most striking and admirable displays of art, which riches have produced, and continue to support, equally enjoyed by the meanest passenger, as by the proprietor himself? It is a gross mistake to suppose, that to provide for one's family by assiduous and honest labor, is less meritorious than to supply the poor out of an opulent fortune that patience is less commendable than generosity, resignation than munificence, meekness than moderation, contentment than condescension; that society is less benefited by being furnished with the necessaries of life than dy being adorned with the refinements of art and by the productions of genius, that the public welfare is less promoted by dutiful submission to lawful authority, by an inoffensive, regular, and serviceable conduct, than by the enaction of salutary laws, by the judgment and punishment of offenders and by a zealous and disinterested discharge of public trust. God accepts no less the artless devotion of the grateful though uninstructed, heart, than the copious and swelling praises of the enlightened ununderstanding. The coarser and brawny muscles are as necessary to the perfection of the body as the organs of the most delicate texture.

It is thus evident that real happiness and virtue are not limited to any station but are equally open to all. if there is any exception to this conclusion, it must be in favor of the middling spheres of life—in which neither power and opulence tempt to oppression and dissoluteness of manners, nor poverty and ignorance lead to fraud and violence; in which neither pride hardens the soul, nor servility debases it; in which the best enjoyments of life are offered and its greatest enticements to corruption excluded.

From all that has been said on this subject it clearly appears, that as it is the duty it is equally the interest of all who are placed in the inferor ranks of life to discharge, with diligence and affability the humble offices of their station, to cultivate contentment with their lot, and to suppress the emotions of envy towards those who are more exalted.

It may indeed be objected that the desire of rising is one of the most powerful motives to the honest and active discharge of every social duty that one great point of equality among men consists in the opportunity which all ought to enjoy of exercising their useful or elegant abilities and that if every one is to rest satisfied with the condition in which his birth or his circumstance have placed him exertion must be discouraged and the general welfare be deprived of the benefit which results from honest and generous ambition. We have moreover shown above, that frequent exchange of ranks and conditions seems to compose a part of the divine administration of human affairs. If those therefore, whose situation is at present ignoble and depressed are to condsider it as a duty never to aspire higher, one of the strongest checks is removed from pride, namely, the uncertainty of its elevtion, while rejection and poverty are deprived of one of their most powerful consolations—the expectation of more prosperous days.

It ought however, to be considered, that the doctrine above inculcacated tends not to preclude laudable ambition and industry, but only to suppress, on the one hand discontent, avarice, and envy, and to remove every pretext for indulging those passions under the specious colorings of more elevated and generous motives; and on the other, to comfort and strengthen those who are apt to view their inferior stations with an undiscerning eye; which beholds affliction (Concluded on the Second Page.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) JANUARY 1 1847. NO. 6

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Basse Cove,	REV. A. F. DAVIS,
Edina,	REV. JAMES MOORE
Stowe,	MR R MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	DR S. A. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE ESQ.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	REV. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	REV. W. MYRNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY ESQ.
Baltimore Md.	WM. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	REV. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	REV. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	REV. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	MR. WM. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

CHAPTER II.

All men equally bound to respect the PRIMITIVE RIGHTS of HUMAN NATURE.

AS the inherent right of human nature are the fundamental articles of the social compact for the maintenance and preservation of which civil society is constituted every violation of those is not only an atrocious injury to the individual who suffers it, but is a direct attack on society itself. No pre-eminence or prerogative whatever can give a title to deprive an innocent member of the community of those rights without which his existence is either precarious or miserable; and every attempt to infringe them is, on the part of the aggressor a renunciation of his social advantages; because those advantages are inseparably connected with the observance of the right now under consideration It is to substitute force in the place of right and of consequence, to acknowledge that superior power is entitled to made him submit in his turn. This principle carried in every instance as far as it will go tears asunder every social and civil tie, tramples under foot every dictate of justice, and introduces a state of unceasing hostility and violence.

Indeed, so essential are some of those rights to the very existence of society, that they are fenced and secured by the strongest civil sanctions. Life and property cannot be directly attacked without exposing the aggressor to the severest penalties. But in what a variety of indirect ways may injuries of this nature be offered, without any risk of human punishment; Life is destroyed not only by the dagger, or by the bowl; but by withholding the means of its support, Life is not so desirable on its own account, as on account of the enjoyments which it furnishes. Property is withdrawn from its lawful possor not only by robbery, or by theft but also by every species of unfair commerce. Every deceitful practice, therfore whereby advantage is taken under whatever colour of the ignorance or of the necessity of the men, to deprive them of their property without an equivalent, is a violation of the right of property, and every oppressive act which cuts off or diminishes the means of a comfortable subsistence is an attack upon life itself. To reduce men to the dismal necessity of dragging out existence in misery and contempt, to make them curse the day of their birth and sigh for that of their dissolution, to render the tenderest of nature's ties an aggravation of distress; what is this but to spare life in order to perpetuate torment? And to this dismal condition how great a portion of the human race is reduced—a condition more abject than that of the brute creation which nature has provided with the necessary supply of their wants and given them desires for nothing more! Shall any rights whatever derived wholly from political institution founded, for the most part, in barbarous ignorance and tyrannic oppression, be opposed to those clear and permanent rights which the Creator has conferred on all men equally by, the gift of life itself, and by the natural faculties of providing for its supply! Shall he who cultivates the soil be deprived of an adequate share of the fruits which his industry produces and pine in want, while the labour of his hands feeds luxurious idleness! Shall the right of property be estabished only for those who contribute nothing to the general stock but consume and waste what the industry of others has provided; and shall that property which nature has bestowed on her children, in the faculties of their minds and of their bodies, be considered as a mark of degradation and a badge of savery!

How contrary are such sentiments, and the conduct they produce to that just notion of equality above established which represents every human being as a constituent member of the social body, and in his peculiar station, equally necessary, with every other, to the common welfare; which exhibits man to man as children of one common parent, as brethern connected no less by one common interest than by one common origin, and discriminated, by different distinctions of occupation and place merely that the general good may be more effectually advanced. For, although such views of society may by some whose policy is but half wisdom be classed among the theories of moralists, or the visions of divines, they are the only representations that can stand the test of reason, or bear the eye of inquiry.

Equally incumbent on all men is the duty to respect the right which every innocent individual has to character and liberty. But how little is this duty regarded? Civil laws cannot do so much for the security of the rights, to which it relates as for those of life and property: because it is not so easy to define in every case, their exact extent and much more is, on that account, left to the discretion and virtue of individuals. That degree of character which is assaulted by open and direct calumny may, indeed, be always exactly ascertained, and every infraction of it become the subject of legal animadversion This is also the case with regared to personal liberty. But, in how many instances may a character be ruined without its being in the power of the injured person to find any legal redress; and how much may one's just liberty be circumscribed and infringed without any ground of legal complaint? The daily conduct of mankind towards one another, in these respects, is the strongest evidence both of the necessity of a civil government, and of its insufficiency for the security of human happiness. It manifests the malevolent propensities by which mankind are often actuated and of consequence, the necessity of coercive power; and since these evil propensities burst out on so many quarters, notwithstanding the authority of laws, this, evinces the great utility of philosophical and religious instruction, which applies to the understanding and the heart, and by purifying the source of action, renders conduct more conformable to human nature, and more conducive to human felicity.

Do unto others as you wish them to do unto you, is a maxim that answers every case in which we can have any intercourse with our fellow men. It is founded on the equality of human nature, amidst all the diversities of condition and circumstance. It takes, as the rule of conduct the feelings of every individual, supposing his condition were exchanged with that of the person towards whom he acts. It could never, therefore, be a just standard if the same duties were not equally incumbent on all in the same circumstances. Now, with respect to reputation and liberty, which every human being so warmly cherishes, and so eagerly pursues, this rule ought to have peculiar efficacy. Yet, in these respects, it is most shamefully frequently violated. It is astonishing to observe the general aversion to reproach and censure, and the general propensity to reproach and censure others; the high opinion which most people entertain of themselves, and wish the world to entertain of them and their inclination to think ill of others and to undervalue and diminish their good qualities. It is natural to suppose, that, as the experience of distress renders men prone to compassion, so the love of character, and aversion from disgrace, which operate so powerfully in every human breast, would render men delicate in inflicting on others, those pains which are so grievous to themselves, and in depriving them of those satisfactions which they account so delicious. But these sensations act under the impulse of selfishness in a contray manner. Men think that the reputation of others stands in the way of their own and that their excellence cannot be exhibited unless those interposing eminences be thrown down, and the public eye wholly fixed on themselves. While men are thus employed in levelling each other, no real pre-eminence remains to any and nothing is displayed, to every judicious eye but one wide extent of malignity and corruption Every one wishes his opinion of his neighbor to be believed; and his wish is granted. But the fulfilment of this wish equally wounds the characters of all. The blemishes he discovers in another, or imputes to him, are acknowledged; those which another lays to his charge meet with the same credit. Thus every one by endeavoring to exalt himself at another's expence only points out the means of his own depression, and, by setting the example provokes the rest of mankind to use them. Such however, is the fascination of self-love that the generality of men suppse themselves very little obnoxius to censure; and while they care indulging the most vicous passions of the human heart, envy or revenge; they flatter themselves with the vain notion that their turpitude is unobserved. As often as I reflect on the prevalence of detraction of obloquy, and of slander, I find it difficult to determine whether it proceeds more from weakness or from malignity whether it is more an object of contempt or of detestation. What can be more malignant than to delight in the destruction of one the dearest of human enjoyments? What more foolish and ridiculous than for a person to assault others, and to suppose that the attack will not be returned?

The same absurdity and injustice is conspicuous in the mutual conduct of men with regared to liberty. How few are ready on every occasion to grant to others the same freedom which they take to themselves! Such is the spirit of domination universally diffused, that what Pope limits only to one sex, is equally applicable to both—the love of pleasure and the love power. Indeed, the one necessarily draws after it the other. The love of pleasure produces the desire of the means of obtaining it and of extending influence and power as far as possible. For why are men tyrants but because they wish freely to indulge their inclinations. unrestrained by justice, unlimited by moderations? While self-love, therefore, is the predominant, principle of the human heart tyranny will not be confined to thrones and dominions, to principalities and powers, but spread through every sphere and condition of life. It is not so much the inclination as the power that is wanting: and the temper, which is overbearing and unjust in private life, would be a Nero if seated on a throne. Let us only consider the fond attachment which most men have to their own opinions and mode of life, their eager desire to impose them on others, their impatience of contradiction, their propensty to square the actions of other men by their own rule, their lust of homage and precedence, their eagerness to rise above others, and to indulge their ambitions in every little manner which their sphere presents to them, their resentment of affronts and injuries, apparent as well as real, their self-conceit and aversion from amendment—we behold the seeds of tyranny lurking in almost every humad breast and shall cease to wonder that when great power is possessed, it shoud be so frequently abused. How seldom is the freedom of speech and action enjoyed even in the freest states of civil society? Let any one recollect what passes before his eyes every day; let him consider how often he is obliged to regulate his words, not so much by the internal sentiments of his own heart as by the opinions and prejudices of those with whom he associates, and his actions, not so much by the immutable rules of duty as by the fictitious standards of the world, and he will confess that none can enjoy the true freedom of a man but he who has the fortitude to sacrifice to this exalted privilege, his most valuable temporal interests, and his chief social pleasures. Prejudices born of ignrance or of pride, are nourished by education, strengthened by interest, or supported by that self-love which is humbled by the exposition of them. Custom and fashion have established arbitrarty rules and forms, which however contrary to reason it is considered as unlawful, as highly ridculous, to infringe. The man who presumes to think to speak, or to act, differently from the generlity, even in matters of singular importance to the common good is looked upon as an unsocial savage being who separating himself from his species, is entitled to no share of their regard and affection. It is well, if he is not exposed to the severest effects of resentment and hatred.

Wealth and external dignity, alhough they cannot of themselves introduce one ray of light into the understanding or implant one virtue in the heart, assumes the privilege of dictation in matters of taste, of politics, of science, of morality and of religion and of bearing down all who subscribe not to their arbitrary decrees. The respect due to rank and the influence which fortune justly claims every man of sense and of integrity will readily acknowledge and bestow. But that a man's judgement should be measured by his title, or his merit, weighed by his gold; that fortune and rank should not only possess their rightful precedence, but also usurp the honour which is equally due to genius and learning, to wisdom and virtue; that a sensible and honest man should not dare to express his sentiments, because they are repugment to those of another decorated with the badges of distinction or possessed of a large estate is such a perversion of nature, such an inversion of morey, as mankind could never be brought to endure but by those habits of servility which luxurious effeminacy has introduced. It will be answered, that this freedom every man who chooses to use it may enjoy. But at what expence? at the expence of incurring the keenest displeasure of the exalted person whom he disobliges, and of feeling his power employed to ruin him and his nearest connections.

But why complain of the exorbitent tyrannical pretensions of rank and fortune, when genius, which has already secured fame, frequently exhibits the same dogmatical and oppessive spirit? How often have those, whose literary character has already attraced the greatest consideration and respect, us urped a dictatorial power both in conversation and writing, contradicted without argument, keenly resented the smallest difference of opinion even when their sentiments were immensely absurd, shared out their approbation by the measure of flattery they received, and inflicted censure, not according to personal or literary merit, but according to the prejudice or disgust by which they were influenced. In reading the lives of some distinguished geniuses I have found my indignation as much fired by their pride and insolence; and by the tame submission with which they were borne, as by the oppression of civil despots and the servility of the rest of mankind. In fact genius and reputation give as little title to domineer as fortune and rank. For whatever mental superiority a man may display, he is inferior to others in many qualities, equally necessary to the common good as the talents he possesses. Brillant powers are frequently counterbalanced by contemptible weaknesses, and great virtues by shameful vices. In proof of this assertion, I might instance the lives of some of the greatest literary characters.

(To be Continued.)

GLASS-MAKING IN ANCIENT EGYPT.

A STRIKING fact is proved by the extant relics of the glass manufactures of ancient Thebes in the British Museum, as well as other museums, and by the illustrations of Rosellini (copied from the Tombs of Thebes) of the laboratories of the glass-blowers, and the workshops of the glass manufacturers of Thebes during the early eras of the eighteenth dynasty (1709 or 1900 B. C.)

It exposes the error of the ordinary ideas indulged by historians and antiquarians on the subject. It is common to assert that, with the exception of some glass vessels at a great price, glass was little known, and little used till the time of Augustus and was never employed in windows till after the fall of the Roman empire. The circumstance of pieces of glass of good manufacture having been found at Pompeii ought to have thrown light upon this allegation derived from an ambiguous assertion of Pliny. The fact is, that glass and porcelain of an equally good quality as that in common use in modern times, was made sixteen or seventeen hundred years A. C. in Upper Egypt. It appears, also, to have been made in profusion. This is a second allegation supported by adequate proof. But a third, of a more startling character has been added. It is affirmed that the glass blowers of Thebes were greater proficients in their art than we are. They possessed the art of staining glass which although not wholly lost is comparatively but little known, and practised only by a few. Among the illustrations of Rosellini is a copy of a piece of stained glass which was found at Thebes. It comprises various colors, which he describes as struck through the whole vitrified structure, and refers to other instances of ancient Egyptian stained glass which he has seen, in which the colored design is equally struck through squares of glass an inch thick, thoroughly incorporated with the vitreous structure, and appearing the same on the obverse as on the reverse side. It was in consequence of being aware of this fact, that Winckelman asserted that the Egyptians of the eighteenth dynasty brought the manufacture of glass to a much higher point of perfection than ourselves. In fact after the decline of the art Egypt became to Rome what Venice became afterwards to Europe. The greater part of the supply of glass in his time, was considered by Pliny to derive its good quality from the ashes of a peculiar genus of kelp growing in abundance by the Lake Mareotis and the Red Sea. That kelp reduced to a kind of green ash, is represented by Rosellini as brought by the workmen in baskets to the glass manufactories, and also to the potteries where a vitreous process was evidently employed for the purpose of glazing the earthen vessels. It would appear both from proofs that remain and cotemporary records—provided full reliance can be placed on the latter—that Winckelman's somewhat startling allegation comes very near the truth. The Egyptian glass blowers and glass cutters of Thebes imitated amethysts rubies and other precious stones, with wonderful dexterity, and besides a great proficiency in the art of staining glass, to which reference has been made, must have been aware of the use of the diamond in cutting it and engraving it. In Mr. Salt's collection in the British Museum, assignable to the era of Thothmes the Third, there is a piece of glass beautifully stained throughout, (like that described by Rossellini), and skilfully engraved with his heraldic emblazonment, precisely on the principles of modern heraldry; or, as the double oval shields containing the names and titles of kings have (for some reason unexplainable by Champollion) been called "cartouches." The profusion of glass in ancient Egypt is attested by several trustworthy authorities. The historical relation that the embalmed bodies of Cyrus and Alexander were deposited in glass coffins in Egypt has been, indeed, considered as a fable; but it may be said to be analogically proved by recent discoveries of portions of granite sarcophagi which are covered with a coating of stained glass through which the hieroglyphics on the stone appear. Diodorus Siculus says the entire coffins were commonly made of glass in Upper Egypt. This would demonstrate an extraordinary profusion; but certainly an equal of the dearest glass manufactures may be practically proved. Vast numbers of imitative precious stones, in glass, made by the jewellers of ancient Egypt, are to be found in all the museums of Europe. Among them are false emeralds of considerable size in which the artisans of hundred gated Thebes appear to have principally excelled. There is little doubt that many of the large emerald basins used in the early Christian churches were of their manufacture. The extensive character of the manufacture may further be inferred from a circumstance recorded by Pliny, that in the Temple of Jupiter Ammon there was an obelisk of emerald, that is to say of glass in imitation of emerald sixty feet high. The emerald hue which the glass-manufacturers of Egypt gave to glass, appears from a chemical analysis to be imparted by oxide of copper, and the reds used on ordinary occasions in staining plate glass appear to have been given by minium. All these facts prove the extensive knowledge of chemistry among the natives of old Thebes. Glass bottles, (quart bottles!) nearly similar to our wine bottles in color and measure, though in shape resembling the wide-monthed bottles used in preserving fruit, may be seen in the British Museum, and are found in abundance in other European cabinets.

A remarkable fact connected with the manufacture of ancient Thebes 4,000 years ago, shows the traditional tenacity of ancient custom. It is well known that the oil-jars of the Levant are precisely similar to those which appear in the illustrations of Rosellini. So the Egyptian earthen amphora, without feet adopted afterwards for strong wines by the bon vivants of Rome, retain their original shape and purpose among the Tuscan farmers. With reference to glass bottles there are two classes used at the present day of equally ancient origin: these are the Florentine oil-flasks' holding about three quarrers of a pint, and the turpentine carboys, as they are called, holding four or five gallons, from Cyprus and the adjoining shores of the Levant. Both are protected by matting, the first of a fine, the second of a coarser nature. Both are seen with slight alterations, in the illustrations of Rosellini. Sir G. Wilkinson thinks that glass lanterns were used by picked soldiers, and gives a specimen of a group of Egyptian sentinels carrying a lantern on a curved pole. It is not improbable that the hieroglyphic on the Rosetta stones, translated manifestation, resembling a magic lantern with a handle from which rays of light are issuing may be something of the kind. That the glass-manufacturers made magnifying lenses is clear from Plutarch, (de-facie lunæ,) Diodorus and Ptolemy, the astronomer and is proved by the extant cameos, which could only be cut by the aid of a microscope. But reverting to the subject of lanterns, it is probable though it cannot be gathered from Pliny, that the lamps employed for yearly illumination at the Saite festival—a custom transmitted from remote ages to modern China—may have been of glass. The Egyptians in the time of the eighteenth dynasty, appear to have used colored lanterns like the modern Chinese, on the latter as well as ordinary occasions. Indeed, the modern people of Cairo use colored lanterns of striped gauze strained over a wire frame, after the Chinese fashion. But they are cylindrical and less florid and various in their decoration. The singularity is that in the illustrations of Rosellini precisely similar cylindrical lanterns of colored gauze are seen in the hands of the running footmen and attendants on the grandees of ancient Thebes when in the act of lighting their masters home from their evening banquet or fetes-champetres

In conclusion, it may be remarked as a singular circumstance, and which applies as well to other manufactures, (such as the potteries, metal founderies, the tanners, the turners the dyers, and the hand-loom weavers.) that the initial process of glass-making retains its primitive simplicity. Now, as 4,000 years ago the blow-pipe, shod with iron and heated red-hot, is inserted into the melted glass. In the ancient manufactories, workmen are employed in bringing the "frit" in baskets for the purpose of vitrification. There can scarcely be a doubt, that this frit is a combination, as in Venetian glass making derived from Egypt of kali, from the ashes of salsola communis, or kelp, and a particular kind of sand. But this paper ought not to conclude, without some more distinct reference to the chemical knowledge displayed in the more elaborate processes of glass-making. There are many striking examples of this proficiency in the new Egyptian room at the British Museum. But we will only cite the single instance of the tablet of stained glass before and at Thebes, and of which Rosellini gives the illustration to which reference has been made. The design, as it has been stated, is tasteful. It consists of a quadruple star, with a rose in the centre, and with an edge on the angles. Blue yellow red, and green zones are introduced, and they are struck through the body of the glass. In order to produce this effect of glass staining oxides of cobalt, or of calcined copper and zinc, must have been used for blue, oxide of silver for yellow, and oxide of copper for green. The ruby color of the rose, that color of which it is likely we had lost the art of imparting, must have been given as well as the rich purple hue of some of the fictitious gems) by the oxide of gold.

This proficiency may appear extraordinary; but indeed, the richly-painted walls of the tombs, palaces, and tombs, where the unmatched colors remain as fresh as when first laid on show not only a perfect proficiency with the mineral pigments, but a perfect use of the metallic oxides in their composition.

It is as easy as invidious to ascribe these applications to unintelligent accident or experiment, rather than to high proficiency in chemistry. Evidences drawn from all the other arts and trades, prove that the ancient Egyptians, in the earliest times, were skilful chemists; and why should we deprive the land of Cham, Chemosh, and Chemonis, from which the name and part of chemistry—as well as alchemy, its foster-parent—was derived, of the just tribute due to its original study, discoveries and inventions?

Quid ferat Ilium
Mavortisque puer si taciturnitas
Obstaret meritis invida Romuli?

Note.—Winckelman, on the Arts of the Ancients, has some observations on the ancient manufacture of glass which may be conveniently added. Pliny attributes the discovery of glass to some Phœnician mariners, who having kindled a fire on the beach for the purpose of cooking placed their utensils on blocks of nitre. The fire melted the nitre and the sand and produced a vitrified substance, which improvement converted into pure glass. The Tombs of Thebes demonstrate that 4,000 years ago the manufacture of glass was well known to the Egyptians. The frescoes exhibit glass-blowers forming bottles and vials of green glass. The specimens of Egyptian vials in the British Museum are by no means inelegant; they have long necks and long towards the bottom, which when filled with any liquid would be much less easily subverted than the vials in common use amongst us. Pocket-bottles, cased in leather, such as are used in sporting, for containing spirits or liqueurs are amongst the curious relics of the Theban glass manufacture. It is clear from specimens that are left that the ancient Egyptians knew how to make cast in vitrified materials, and to counterfeit in glass the amethyst and the emerald with a degree of success unequalled in any country. Nor were they unpractised in the ingenious process by which the representation of a bird or flower may appear to be imprisoned within a piece of glass so as to form part of its own substance. It appears that they constructed the device from filaments of colored glass, in the first instance; it was then covered with transparent laminæ of glass, and all were fused together with so much skill that no joinings in any part of the work can even now be detected by the most powerful magnifier. In these specimens the colored device appears as perfect on one side as the other. Figures of birds were thus composed; and if cut through at intervals each portion so divided contained in itself a perfect copy of the bird. The celebrated Portland vase was long supposed to be a real sardonyx; but it is now known to be formed of layers of purple-colored glass united by fusion. By similar superfusion the glass pieces used in the mosaics on the vaults of the domes at Venice have been enabled to preserve unimpaired their original coloring and gilding. A small diamond of the glass mosaic was gilded in the usual way, and then thinly coated with the vitrified material while in a state of fusion. Thus was an Egyptian art. The gold color and device appear incorporated with and struck through the body of the glass so as to appear the same on both sides. An Egyptian sarcophagus of granite may be occasionally seen cased over in the same manner, in order to preserve unimpaired the sculptures and legends engraved upon the stone. To the eye of an ordinary observer, several necklaces scarabæi, brooches, and small ornamental figures in the cases of the new Egyptian Room would appear composed of precious stones. They are, in fact, at least the great majority of them composed of glass throughout the whole substance, or of materials covered with a glass coating. The tasteful colored networks of glass bugles, with which the wrappers of mummies were decorated were made of the same materials and are remarkable as being identical with similar ornaments made into bracelets, headdands and waistbands by fair dilettantis at the present day. With reference to the larger examples of vitreous superfusion to which reference has been made, a sarcophagus of this description was found by Belzoni in the Tombs of the Kings. The historical assertion is well known and has frequently provoked commentary that the body of Alexander cased in gold was buried at Alexandria in a coffin composed entirely of glass. If the record be true, it is probable that the body so inclosed in glass was, for protection sake, reinclosed within a granite or other more durable sarcophagus.—Living Age.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. JANUARY 1. 1847

"'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours."

The celebrated author of the "Night Thoughts" never uttered a truth more important than the above, nor one more suitable as a maxim for the day on which we write—the first day of January in the year of Our Blessed Saviour Eighteen Hundred and Forty Seven.

In looking back upon the period we have just left—a period already with the—

"Years beyond the flood"—

we experience sensations similar to what we conceive a man would feel, who having been long entangled in a dark and dangerous waste, has with great difficulty emerged and gained the summit of a neighbouring eminence. Thus far he is safe; and for deliverance from dangers past his bosom heaves with emotions of gratitude; but when he looks forward, the same gloom hangs over his path; the same dangers infest his course! His only comfort—which is at best of but a negative sort is in not knowing the extent and magnitude of the danger to which he is exposed.

This day should be sacred to meditation. At one and the same moment, time, ever-moving time, chants the dirge of the departed year and proclaims the birth of the rising one. He seals up another leaf of the history of humanity with all its record of crime, and perfidy, and tears and broken hearts and deposites them in the archives of eternity, to be brought forth as witnesses in that day when time himself shall be no more: and opens before the human family another, written, no doubt for many, "with mourning and lamentation and woe." It was therefore at the dictate of both philosophy and morality that the Romans called this month by the significant name "Janus" It is the dividing line—the solemn boundary of the past and the "shaded frontier" of the future.

Man too can look in both directions; and it is wise in him to do so. He can look however with distinctness only into the past. Human history and experience present a mirror in which may be seen as by reflection events necessary from the constitution and laws of nature—occurring somewhere, at some time and to some individuals. That men will in the future alternately rejoice and weep—that some will grow rich and others grow poor—that some will embody in outward acts the odiousness of a vicious heart, and some shed a lustre on humanity by a virtuous and honorable life—that some will be cut off by a sudden and unlooked for casualty and others gradually melt away by slow consuming disease, we have abundant evidence in the past history of man. The events are certain and we entertain no doubt that they will occur. Our ignorance of the precise time and place of their occurrence, and of the particular individuals who will be affected by them alone constitute the indistinctness we speak of.

The book of the past lies open before us: and upon most of the events therein recorded we can cast a clear and a scrutinizing eye. It is no more a question whether we or our friend has been unfortunate—whether we have sighed for an absent or wept over a deceased friend—whether we have lived a vicious or a virtuous life—whether we have turned every moment to account, or let golden opportunities to do good slip by unimproved. These events are written in bold relief upon the page of the past: and on this day "whoso is wise and will observe these things even he shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord" in bringing him safely through so many and so various scenes.

There is another class of events, if we may so call them, which although graven with the same indelible pen and on the same unblotted page, and preserved in the records of heaven to be produced in the inquisition of the last day, yet from the inattention of men and from their aversion to introspection is apt to be overlooked. Fortunately for man conscience here comes to his aid explores every recess of the heart—pours a flood of light upon every motive, weighs them in the scales of impartial justice and pronounces upon them her infallible decisions. How much of pure selfishness has entered into our motives to action—how often we have declined the performance of an act—not because it was really impracticable but for want of a hearty disposition to engage in it: How often we have sat in judgment on the wisdom of Divine Providence by repining at His dispensations: How we have been resigned to these dispensations when they have fallen heavily upon others and left us untouched: How when the path of duty has been made known we have sought in a thousand vain and frivolous apologies a pretext to abandon it: How in a thousand instances we have sat "in the seat of the scorner" and how in instances unnumbered by thousands we have indulged in idle thoughts and idle conversation—these although deeply affecting in character which must shortly undergo the scrutiny of an omnicient Judge, are too often unnoticed by man until in the hour of calm reflection conscience lifts her voice and proclaims them in his ear. Therefore

"'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours,
And ask them what report they bore to heaven."

At this season which gives the idea of an accelerated speed in the whole system of nature towards its final end, how salutary it is for men to enquire what preparations they have made for that eternal state of existence of which, reason, observation, conscience tell them the present is but the embryo? And now while the events of the past year are speaking as it were from their graves, and the entombed generations from the melancholy wreck of their hopes and desires are proclaiming the vanity of pursuits whose object is limited by time: men if they are wise will attend to the admonition and apply their hearts to wisdom?

CHRISTMAS.

This has been the most lively, joyous Christmas we recollect to have seen in Liberia. Expecting to be beseized by numberless little urchins with the usual demand for "Christmas gift" we left our bed at dawn and from our piazza bid a hearty "happy Christmas" to one and all of Liberia, demanded the compliment of the season and returned to bed. This device saved us—at least from giving, which in the present confused state of our exchequer could be done only with a miserable grace. This device reminds us of an innocent and humorous trick once resorted to by one whose image is still vividly before our mind's eye. He had been usually much annoyed by hosts of children demanding "Kismas, Kismas giff." As Chrismast drew near he collected a large number of tracts bearing the title "Happy Negro" The day arrived, and in the children poured, when as each one said "Kishmas" a tract was handed to it Disappointed and disconcerted the little ones turned away unhappy with the "Happy Negro" yet afraid to refuse it.

Even the natives were infested with the joyousness, and marched in scores through the streets demanding of all whom they met "Kismas, Kismas."

Where other people spent the forenoon of the day we have no right to say. We remained quietly at home thinking particularly of nothing and generally of every thing. In the afternoon we sallied forth and directed our steps towards the beach. Hundreds had preceded us, and the tout ensemble was truly inspiring. There were all shades and colors, from the fair Brunette to the glossy Black; all ages and sizes were there, and all sexes to boot. In one place Rev. Mr. Herring was bestowing a lecture of morality and good breeding upon a collection of juveniles grouped around him. Just behind the lecturer stood a table bestriding a number of buckets &c. which gave token of a coming demonstration in which the little disciples would probably be delighted as much as in the present. A few rods distant on one hand sat a party quietly feeding—on the other another conversing with a fourth lady. Here a party of ladies was jumping the rope, and there one of young gentlemen firing crackers. Some were racing some walking, others talking and all happy; and all in so close vicinage to the lecturer as almost entirely to "drown his voice." The amusements of the day closed by exciting athletic exercises by the Kroomen.

It is said the Fall expedition to Cape Palmas passed some days ago on its way down to that place. If report be true the long talked of "Liberia Packet" carried the immigrants.

We are much in want of a vessel from the old country —Tobacco and some other articles are in great demand and there are none to be had.

Query would it be a bad scheme for this government to engross the sale of tobacco and some other staples of trade for the purpose of Revenue? Its exchequer must be enlarged by some means. Something like the above seems to us quite practicable and would probably meet all immediate demands.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

GEMS FROM FRANKLIN.

"So much for industry my friends, and attention to one's own business, but to these we must add frugality, if we would make our industry more certainly successful. A man may if he knows not how to save as he gets, "keep his nose all his life to the grindstone, and die not worth a groat at last.

A fat kitchen makes a lean will;" and

"Many estates are spent in the getting,
Since women for tea forsook spinning and knittings,
And men for punch forsook hewing and splitting."

"If you would be wealthy, think of saving, as well as of getting. The Indies have not made Spain rich, because her outgoes are greater than her incomes."

"Away, then, with your expensive follies, and you will not then have so much cause to complain of hard times, heavy taxes, and chargeable families; and farther, "that maintains one vice, would bring up two children."

"You may think, perhaps, that a little tea, or a little punch now and then, diet a little more costly, clothes a little finer, and a little entertainment now and then, can be no great matter; but remember many a little makes a mickle."

Beware of little expenses; "a small leak will sink a great ship," as Poor Richard says; and again, "who dainties love, shall beggars prove!" and moreover, "fools make feasts, and wise men eat them." Here you are all got together to this state of fineries and nick-nacks. You call them goods; but if you do not take care, they will prove evils to some of you.

You expect they will be sold cheap, and, perhaps, they may for less than they cost; but, if you have no occasion for them, they must be dear to you. Remember what Richard says, "Buy what thou hast no need of, and ere long thou shalt sell thy necessaries." And again, "At a great pennyworth pause a while:" he means, that perhaps the cheapness is apparent only, and not real; or the bargain, by straitening thee in thy business, may do thee more harm than good.

For in another place he says, "Many have been ruined by buying good pennyworths." Again, "It is foolish to lay out money in a purchase of repentance;" and yet this only is practised every day at auctions, for want of minding the Almanac. Many a one, for the sake of finery on the back, has gone with a hungry belly, and half starved their families; "Silks and satins, scarlet and velvets, put out the kitchen fire," as Poor Richard says.

These are not the necessaries of life; they can scarcely be called the conveniences: and yet only because they look pretty, how many want to have them! By these and other extravagancies, the genteel are reduced to poverty, and forced to borrow of those whom they formerly despised, but who, through industry and frugality have maintained their standing; in which case it appears plainly, that a ploughman on his legs is higher than a gentleman on his knees," as Poor Richard says.

Perhaps they have had a small estate left them, which they knew not the getting of: they think "It is day and will never be night:" that a little to be spent out of so much is not worth minding; but always taking out of the meal-tub, and never putting in, soon comes to the bottom," as Poor Richard says; and then, "When the well is dry, they know the worth of water."

But this they might have known before, if they had taken his advice. "If you would know the value of money, go and try to borrow some: for he that goes a borrowing goes a sorrowing," as Poor Richard says; and, indeed, so does he that lends to such people, when he goes to get it again. Poor Dick farther advises, and says,

"Fond pride of dress is sure a very curse;
Ere fancy you consult, consult your purse;

And again "Pride is as loud a beggar as Want, and a great deal more saucy." When you have bought one fine thing, you must buy ten more, that your appearance be all of a piece; but Poor dick says, "It is easier to suppress the first desire, than to satisfy all that follow it:" And it is truly folly for the poor to ape the rich, as for the frog to swell in order to equal the ox.

"Vessels large may venture more,
But little boats should keep near shore."

It is, however, a folly soon punished; for as Poor Richard says, "Pride that dines on vanity, sups on contempt; Pride breakfasted with plenty, dined with Poverty, and suppered with Infamy." And, after all, of what use is this pride of appearance for which so much is risked, so much is suffered! It cannot promote health, nor ease pain; it makes no increase of merit in the person, it creates envy, it hastens misfortune.

"But what madness must it be to run in debt for these superfluities! We are offered, by the terms of this sale, six months credit; and that, perhaps, has induced some of us to attend it; because we cannot spare the ready money, and hope now to be fine without it. But, ah! think what you do when you run in debt; you give to another power over your liberty.

If you cannot pay at the time, you will be ashamed to see your creditor; you will be in fear when you speak to him; you will make poor, pitiful, sneaking excusses, and by degrees, come to lose your veracity, and sink into base, downright lying; for, "The second vice is lying, the first is running in debt," as Poor Richard says; and again, to the same purpose, "Lying rides upon Debt's back:" whereas a free American ought not to be ashamed, nor afraid to speak to any man living.

But poverty often deprives a man of all spirit and virtue. "It is hard for an empty bag to stand upright." What would you think of that nation or of that government, who should issue an edict, compelling you to dress like a gentleman or gentlewoman, on pain of imprisonment for servitude? Would you not say, that you were free have a right to dress as you please, and that such an edict would be a breach of your privileges, and such a government tyrannical!

And yet you are about to put yourself under that tyranny when you run in debt for such a dress! Your creditor has authority to deprive you of your liberty, by confining you in jail, if you should not be able to pay him; when you have got your bargain, you may, perhaps, think little of payment; but, as Poor Richard says, "Creditors have better memories than debtors; creditors are a superstitious sect, great observers of set days and times."

The day comes round before you are aware, and the demand is made, before you are prepared to satisfy it; or, if you bear your debt in mind, the term, which at first seemed so long, will, as it lessens, appear extremely short: Time will seem to have added wings to his heels as well as his shoulders. At present, perhaps, you may think yourselves in thriving circumstances, and that you can bear a little extravagance without injury but,

"For age and want save while you may,
No morning sun lasts a whole day."

Gain may be temporary and uncertain, and, "It is easier to build two chimneys, than to keep one in fuel," as Poor Richard says: So,

"Get what you can, and what you get hold,
'Tis the stone that will turn all your lead into Gold."

And when you have got the philosopher's stone, sure, you will no longer complain of bad times, or the difficulty of paying taxes.

This doctrine, my friends is reason and wisdom: but after all do not depend too much upon your own industry and frugality and prudence though excellent things; for they may all be blasted without the blessing of Heaven; and therefore, ask that blessing humbly and be not uncharitable to those that at present seem to want it but comfort and help them. Remember' Job suffered and was afterwards prosperous.

And now to conclude, "Experience keeps a dear school but fools will learn in no other as Poor Richard says, and scarce in that for, it is true," We may give advice, but we cannot give conduct: "However, remember this," They that will not be counselled cannot be helped;" and farther, that "If you will not hear Reason she will surely rap your knuckles," as Poor Richard says."

Thus the old gentleman ended his harangue. The people heard it, and approved the doctrine, and immediately practised the contrary just as if it had been a common sermon; for the auction opened, and they began to buy extravagantly. I found the good man had thoroughly studied my Almanacs, and digested all I had dropped on those topics during the course of twenty-five years.

The frequent mention he made of me must have tired any one else; but my vanity was wonderfully delighted with it though I was conscious that not a tenth part of the wisdom was my own which he ascribed to me; but rather the gleamings that I had made of the sense of all ages and nations. However, I resolved to be the better for the echo of a new coat, I went away resolved to wear my old one a little longer. Reader, if thou wilt do the same thy profit will be as great as mine. I am as ever thine to serve thee.

RICHARD SAUNDERS.

ON FUNEAL ELEGIES.

IT was formerly the custom, when men of distinction died for their surviving acquaintance to throw each a slight present into the grave. Several things of little value were made use of for that purpose: perfumes, reliques spices, bitter herbs, cammomile, wormwood' and verses. This custom, however, is almost discontinued; and nothing but verses alone are now lavished on such occasions, an oblation which they suppose may be interred with the dead, without any injury to the living.

Upon the death of the great, therefore the poets and undertakers are sure of employment. While one provides the long cloak, black staff and mourning coach, the other produces the pastoral or elegy the monod yor apotheosis. The nobility need be under no apprehensions, but die as fast as they thing proper the poet and undertaker are ready to supply them; those can find metaphorical tears and family escutcheons at half an hour's warning; and when the one has soberly laid the body in the grave the other is ready to fix it figuratively among the stars.

There are several ways of being poetically sorrowful on sch occasions. The bard is now some pensive youth of science who sits deploring among the tombs; again he is Thyrsis, complaining in a circle of harmless sheep. Now Britannia sits upon her own shore, and gives loose to maternal tenderness; at another time, Parnassus, even, the mountain Parnassus gives way to sorrow and is bathed in tears of distress,.

But the most useful manner is this: Damon meets Menalcas who has got a most gloomy countenance. The shepherd asks his friend whence that look of distress? to which the other replies that Pollio is no more. If that be the case, then, cries Damon let us retire to yonder bower at some distance off, where the cypress and the jessamine add fragrance to the breeze; and let us weep alternately for Pollio the friend of shepherds and the patron of every muse. Ah, returns his fellow-shepherd, what think you rather of that grotto by the fountain side; the murmuring stream will help to assist our complaints; and a nightingale on a neighbouring tree will join her voice to the concert. When the place is thus settled, they begin; the brook stands still to hear their lamentations; the cows forget to graze; and the very tygers start from the forest with sympathetic concern. By the tombs of our ancestors, my dear friend, I am quite unaffected in all this distress; the whole is liquid laudanum to my spirits; and a tyger of common sensibility has twenty times more tenderness than I.

But though I could never weep with the complaining shepherd, yet I am sometimes induced to pity the poet, whose trade is thus to make demigods and heroes for a dinner. There is not in nature a more dismal figure than a man who sits down to premeditated flattery; every stanza he writes tacitly reproaches the meanness of his occupation till at last his stupidity becomes more stupid, and his dullness more diminutive.

I am amazed therefore that none have yet found out the secret of flattering the worthless, and yet of preserving a safe conscience. I have often wished for some method by which a man might do himself and his deceased patron justice without being under the hateful reproach of self-conviction. After long lucubration I have hit upon such an expedient, and send you the specimen of a poem upon the decease of a great man in which the flattery is perfectly sine and yet the poet perfectly innocent.

Whatever your advancement in the work of religion or your services in the church, may have been you have as great need as ever to dwell in an humble state of watchfulness; for some whom the Lord hath favoured when low and humble by giving way to the subtle temptations of the enemy under the specious pretence of enlargement and freedom of spirit become exalted in their minds declined from their first love and by an unguarded conduct lost their esteem and service in the church and brought dishonour on the blessed Truth.—Advices, 1743

Be not morose or conceited; one is rude, the other troublesome and nauseons.—Penn.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

The Subscriber by the assistance of friends having been enabled to commence business again, takes this opportunity to solicit a share of public patronage. As it is with him a fixed and unalterable purpose to pay off all his just debts—and not to avail himself of the lenity of the "Insolvent Act" and withhold from his creditors their just dues when it may be in his power to pay them, he especially asks commission business of them: as every cent of commission arising to him shall go to his credit. The subscriber has opened on Broad Street just opposite his residence. He will sell at a small profit—and his terms will be cash both in selling and in buying.

M. TEAGE.

Monrovia
Dec. 18*th* 1846.

NOTICE.

NEW GOODS, Flour, Pork, Beef, Tobacco and Blue Baffs, for sale. American and foreign dry goods, both staple and fancy, varied by and with every modern improvement, in price, quality and fashion. The same may be said of lots of bonnets and shoes, &c, &c, &c, too tedious to mention. The above named assortment was purchased for cash and therfore will be only sold for cash or produce down on the nail on the fairest terms.

EDWARD J. ROYE.

Monrovia June 10*th* 1846.

WANTED, by the subscriber 1000 bushels of peanuts very dry and in good order for shiping for which goods will be given at the lowest price.

E. J. ROYE.

ALSO Products of the soil that will bear shiping hitherto not exported together with every species of, rare animals, birds, shells, or phenomena, of this portion of the Globe.

E. J. ROYE

NEW SUPPLIES, Flour, sugar, pork, beef, fish & dry goods &c. recently bought & for sale at my usual low prices.

E. J. ROYE.

Monrovia Nov. 5 th 1846

Beware of common illusion of forming your estimate of yourselves, from the favourable opinions of those around you They cannot know the secret principles from which you act; and flattery may have much influence in leading them to speak in your praise.

Beware of jealosy, except it be godly, for it devours love and friendship; it breaks fellowship, and destroys the peace of the mind. It is a groudless and evil surmise.—Penn.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon.	Lb.	none
Beads, pound,	"	10 00	12 00
Beef, cargo No.	Bb	3 75
Blue Baffs,	Ps.	12 00
Bricks,	100	30
Butter,	Firkin	none
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	20
Cheese,	"
Corn meal,	Bbl	none
Checks domestic,	Ps	none
Cotton white,	Bale	15	12 12
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00
Guns,	Box	30 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	5 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	20
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00
Nails	100*lb*	8 00
Oil paint	Gallon	1 50
Oil palm	"	— 34
Pork	Bbl	none
Pots iron	Cwt.	none
Powder	Bll.	15 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter.	"	3 00
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints assorted	various	10	20
Romauls	Ps.	1 00	1 50
Salt	Ton	14 00
Sugar loaf	Lb.	— 18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 75
Tobacco	100*lbs*	20 00
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wines		5 00	8 00

MARINELIST

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Dec. 16. French Ship Aristides, E. Bellatt master, from windward.

" 21. Col. sloop Star, Atkins master, from leeward: Passengers, Rev. J. B. Benham and lady, and James E. Brom.

" 22. British brig———Coatland master, from windward.

" 24. Col. sloop Economy, Chase master, from Junk.

" 30. U S. Brig Dolphin, Pope Esq. commander, from the leeward; Passenger, Gen. John N. Lewis.

DEPARTURES.

Dec. 27. British brig———Coatland master, for leeward.

" " Col. sloop Star, Atkins master, for leeward.

" 28. Col. Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, for Grand Cape Mount: Passengers, Rev. J. B. Benham, Rev. B. R. Wilson, Capt. J. B. Mc Gill, and Mrs F. Smith, and Mrs. C. Jones.

" 28. French ship Aristides, Bellatt master, for leeward.

" 29. Col. sloop Perseverance, Jones master, for windward.

" 30 Col. sloop Nathan Bangs, G. Ammons master, for the leeward.

POETRY.

From the Living Age.

PERSEVERANCE.

As one of the recent anniversaries in New York, a speaker concluded his exhortation to perseverance, by reciting the following verses:

A swallow in the Spring,
Came to our granary, and 'neath the eaves,
Essayed to make a nest, and there did bring
Wet earth and straw and leaves.

Day after day she toiled,
With patient art, but ere her work was crowned
Some sad mishap the tiny fabric spoiled,
And dashed it to the ground.

She found the ruin wrought,
But not cast down, forth from the place she flew,
And with her mate, fresh earth and grasses brought,
And built her nest anew.

But scarcely had she placed
The last soft feather on its ample floor,
When wicked hand, or chance, again laid waste,
And rought the ruin o'er.

But still her heart she kept,
And toiled again;—and last night, hearing calls,
I looked, and lo! three little swallows slept
Within the earth-made walls.

What truth is there, O Man!
Hath Hope been smitten in its early dawn?
Have clouds o'ercast thy purpose, trust or plan?
Have faith, and struggle on!

MISCELLANEOUS

From the Colonization Herald.

ENGLISH SURNAMES—AN ANTIQUARIAN RESEARCH.

Few persons are acquainted with the subject of surnames, yet it is believed that those who will take the trouble to investigate it, will not find the inquiry either uninteresting or unprofitable, whether applicable to the meaning of names, or the causes of their application to individuals and families. It is not sufficient for a person of inquisitive mind that he hears such and such a surname, because his father and his grandfather bore it; he will naturally feel desirous of knowing why, and when his ancestors acquired it. And should he be successful in arriving at some probable conclusion respecting his own, the same, or perhaps an increased degree of curiosity will be induced in his mind as to those of others. The subject is however, too extensive for a particular notice in all its details in a short essay, and our object now is merely to give a few facts which may amuse and perhaps instruct the readers of the New Mirror.

The following is Dr Johnson's definition of the word surname: "The name of the family; the name which one has over and above the christian name." Sirname differed originally from surnam. Mac Allan, Fitz Harding, Ap Tudor, and Stephenson, are properly sir or sire-names, and are equivalent to the son of Allen, of Harding, of Tudor, of Stephen. Of sir-names, Du Cange says they were at first written, "not in a direct line, after the christian name, but above it, between the lines;" and hence they were called in Latin, supranomia, in Italian, sopranome, and in French, surnoms, from which probably the English term is derived. A surname is, therefore, a name superadded to the first or christian name, to indicate the family to which the individual bearing it belongs, as Edmund Spencer, John Milton, Alexander Pope. Hence it is evident that, although every sir-name is a *sur*name, every *sur*name is not a *sir*name; a distinction which is now scarcely recognized, and the two words are used indiscriminately by the best English writers.

In the first ages of the world a single name was sufficient for each individual, and that name was generally invented for the person, in allusion to the circumstances attending his birth, or to some personal quality he possessed, or which his parents hoped he might possess. The writings of Moses, and other books of the Old Testament, furnish many proofs of this remark. This rule seems to have uniformly prevailed in all the nations of antiquity, concerning which we have any records, in the earliest periods of their history. In Egypt, we find persons of distinction using only one name; as, for example, Pharoah, Potiphar; in Canaan, Abraham, Isaac; in Greece, Diomedes, Ulysses; in Rome, Romulus, Remus; in Britain, Bran, Cerodoc, &c.

The first approach to the modern system of nomenclature, is found in the name of one's sire, in addition to his own proper name, as Caleb the son of Jephunneh, Joshua the son of Nun, Melchi ben Addi; (that is, Melchi the son of Addi,) Icarus the son of Dædalus. In ancient times, as is well known, it was common to bestow epithets on monarchs, as Alexander the Great, Dionysius the Tyrant, Tarquinius Superbus Ptolemy Philadelphus.

As society advanced in refinement, partly for euphony, and partly for the sake of distinction, other names came into common use. Thus, among the Romans, these names, and sometimes four or even five, were used by a single person. The first of these was called the prænomen, answering to our christian name. This name originally characterized the individual; thus, the first Faber (like the English Smith) was no doubt an artificer in iron or wood, while the primitive Agricola (like the English family of Farmer) was in like manner a cultivator of the soil. Their second name, called nomen had a close analogy to the term clan as used in Scotland, and was given to all the branches of a common stock. The cognomen, or third name, indicated that particular part of the race or tribe to which the person belonged. Thus, in Publius Cornelius Scipio Publius, corresponded to our John, Thomas, or William; Cornelius was the generic name or term of clanship; while Scipio conveyed the information that that particular Publius belonged to the family of one Scipio, who acquired his name from his piety in leading about his blind and crippled father, to whom he thus became figuratively, a scipio or staff. The names Africanus, Germanicus, &c., bestowed upon military chieftains for conquests in Africa, Germany &c., became, in like manner, second and honorary cognomina.

Modern nations have adopted various methods of distinguishing families. The Highlanders of Scotland employed the *sire*name with Mac and hence the Macdonalds and Macartys; meaning, respectively, the son of Donald and of Arthur. The Irish had the practice of prefixing Oy or O', signifying grandson, as O'Hara, O'Neil, a form still retained in many Hibernian names. The old Normans prefixed to their names the word Fitz, (a corruption of Fils, derived from the Latin, Filius) as Fitz Walter, Fitz Gilbert. The Poles employ sky in the same sense as James Petrowsky—James the son of Peter. The Arabians use their father's name without a forename, as Aven Pace, Aven Rois, that is the son of Pace, the son of Rois. At a latter period than the fifteenth century, no surnames were used in Wales, beyond Ap or son, as David ap Howell, Evan ap Rhys, Griffith ap Rogers, John ap Richard, now very naturally corrupted into Powell, Price, Prodger and Pritchard. Ancient Britons generally used one name only; sometimes they added another in the manner of a Roman cognomen. The Anglo Saxons had a peculiar kind of sirename, the terminating ing signifying offspring: as for instance, Athaling, Browning Dearing, Whiting, meaning respectively, dear, noble, dark or tawny, and white or fair offspring. More usually, this termination was added to the father's name. Many of the Anglo Saxon forenames are characterized by a beautiful significancy and simplicity, and many of these were afterwards adopted as family, or surnames. But it would be digressing from our subject to give a list and significations of these names of our ancestors, which have been transmitted to their posterity in England and America.

No precise date can be assigned to the introduction of hereditary surnames into England, as personal soubriquets were known from an early period of the Saxon heptarchy. The old termination ING, was gradually rejected from names, and that of SON substituted for it, in the tenth and eleventh centuries. It is generally supposed that the use of surnames was brought into England by the Normans, after the invasion by William the Conquerer, but Mr. Lower, an English antiquary, (to whose researches we are indebted for much of the above information) is of opinion that they were known and in use by the Anglo Saxons before that epoch. He also disproves the common opinion entertained by antiquaries, that surnames were assumed by the aristocracy long before the commonalty took them. It is shown that the Anglo Saxons bondmen or churls, used them before many of the landed proprietors had any other designation than a christian name. "It would be preposterous," says this writer, "to imagine that surnames universally prevailed so early as the eleventh century: we have overwhelming evidence that they did NOT; and must admit that, although the Norman conquest did much to introduce the practice of using them, it was long before they became very common. All that I am anxious to establish is, that occasional use of surnames in England, dates beyond the ingress of the Normans."

After the battle of Hastings, which gave the English crown to William the Conquerer, (in 1066) those Normans who had fought under the ducal banner, took every possible means to have their names well known and remembered by future generations. For this reason, the name of every person of any consideration among the Norman officers, was written upon a roll and hung up in "Battle Abbey," a monastery erected by William, on the very spot where he gained his decisive victory, from which circumstance it derived its name. The persons mentioned in this list, (about seven or eight hundred different names in all) were the patriarchs of most of the English nobility and gentry for many ages, and some of their descendants are still to be found among the same classes. The names also, have been transmitted to numerous families in England and America, of the present day; and as the list has been preserved, and will be interesting to many, we may notice it farther on a future occasion.

If English surnames are remarkable for their variety, they are no less so for their number. English antiquarians are of opinion, that the whole number at present is between thirty and forty thousand, and that the nomenclature is on the increase.

In the fullest New York City Directory, there are about 55,000 names, and the number of different surnames will be found to exceed 35,000. Of these, probably two-thirds of the whole are English surnames, or 23,000; so that the variety of English names, in this city alone, is equal to one-half of the whole number in use in England. It is to be observed, however, that, independent of foreign names, (such as the German, Dutch, French, &c.) America differs very essentially in its nomenclature, from England.

English surnames may be divided into the following classes:

1 Local surnames, as Winchester, Wood, Hill Green.

2 Names derived from occupations and pursuits, as Baker, Smith, Taylor.

3 Names derived from dignities and officers, as King, Bishop, Earl.

4 Names derived from personal and mental qualities, as Strong, Rich, Noble.

5 Names derived from Christian names, as Adam, Edward, Henry.

6 Names derived from natural objects, as Star, Lyon, Bird.

7 Names derived from social relations, as Child, Cousin, Friend.

8 Names derived from periods of time, as Spring, Summer, Winter, Day.

9 Names derived from virtues and other abstract ideas, as Love, Hope, Wisdom.

10 Names of contempt, as Trollope, Crookshanks, Hussey.

There are also other classifications, oddities, and changes, which we cannot notice at present.

TEA AND TOAST.

One day last week the London Dock Company, at the opening of their new range of tea-ware-houses, gave a party to the Tea division of the mercantile interest of London. The usual toasts" were given on the occasion; and though, no doubt, these toasts were, so to speak buttered, we believe that they were not exactly that description of toast which is "usually given" at tea. On the heath of Souchong being proposed—

Sir Astley (though his representatives) declared that he had never risen—in the market or anywhere else—on an occasion so flattering as the present. He had been often drunk; though he was never, either tipsy himself, nor the cause of intoxication in others; for his was the draught that cheered but not inebriated. Around him were the merchant princes of London; the tea he must regret the absence of one who was at once a merchant prince and a merchant tailor. He felt that he had now been on his legs long enough, and could only return his best thanks for the honor that had been done him.

Gunpowder felt himself ready to explode with gratitude for the distinction which had just been conferred upon him. He hoped to continue to give satisfaction—in a friendly way: he was not that gunpowder that feared to be superseded by steam: he respected steam for its connection with boiling water—which was his element. It was his boast to load the caddies, and not the cannons, of his country. Allied as he trusted ever to be, with the milk of human kindness and the sugar of free labor, it should ever be his aim to promote universal peace.

Green Hyson, in acknowledging the compliment that he had just received, would notice with pride an epithet which had been applied to him. He had been called evergreen: he felt thus associated with the laurel; and if the laurel bound the poet's temples, he had often to boast of stimulating the poet's brain: he was aware that it had been insinuated that he was hostile to the nervous system; this was a calumny, and he took that public opportunity of making the assertion.

Young Hyson, after the eloquent speech just made by his brother, would merely express his thanks. He was unaccustomed to public speaking; his experience being limited to the silent spouting of the kettle.

"The Green Leaf" having been proposed—

A stranger rose to respond. He claimed the appellation which had just been mentioned: he was the British Leaf. (Indignant cries of "turn him out!")

A scene of indescribable confusion here ensued, amid which the pretender was expelled from the room. Order having at length been restored, harmony resumed her sway, and several sentimental and comic songs having been sung, the company separated at an advanced hour.—Living Age.

DISEASES OF THE TONGUE.

These are very numerous. We have time and space at present to mention only a few of them.

1. The tongue of falsehood. Very young children are very liable to this disease. "The wicked go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies." Many among whom this disorder prevails, greatly need a skillful physician to inform them of the nature of the disease by which they are afflicted.

2. The tongue of covetousness. Who does not know that where a man's interest is at stake, his tongue is not always to be trusted? If the buyer says, "It is naught, it is naught," the seller as readily says, "It is excellent, first rate;" and when each "is gone his way, then he boasteth."

3. The tongue of Envy. "I considered all travail, and every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbor." "The spirit that dwelleth in us," instead of looking out with fraternal joy on the green fields, rich pastures, excellent horses houses, furniture, carriages and clothing of our neighbor, "lusteth to envy," and out of the abundance of such a heart the mouth speaketh.

4. The tongue of suspicion. The "evil surmisings" of an agitated bosom have no other limits than the utmost range of a disordered imagination. If jealousy, to its object, is "cruel as the grave;" to its object, it is like "coals of fire which hath a most vehement flame."

5. The tongue of obscenity. It may begin with remote insinuations, and a great show of delicacy. But it "setteth on fire the course of nature," and is itself "set on fire of hell."

6. The tongue of flattery. His words were softer than oil, yet were they "drawn swords."

THE STREAM OF LIFE.

The following beautiful and impressive illustration of life is from the celebated Bishop Heber's farewell sermon, delivered many years since upon the eve of his departure for India to his parishioners at Hadnet, in England.

"Life bears us on like the stream of a mighty river. Our boat, at first glides swiftly down the narrow channel through the playful murmurings of the little brook and winding along its grassy borders. The trees shed their blossoms over our young heads: and the flowers on the brink seem to offer themselves to our young hands, we are in hope, and we grasp eagerly at the beauties around us; but the stream hurries us on, and still our hands are empty.

"Our course in youth and manhood is along a wider and deeper flood, and amid objects more striking and magnificent. We are on matured by the moving picture of enjoyment and industry passing before us, we are excited by short lived success or depressed and rendered miserable by some short-lived disappointment. But our energy and our dependence are both in vain. The stream bears us on and our joys and griefs are left behind us; we may be shipwrecked but we cannot anchor, our voyage may be hastened, but cannot be delayed; whether rough or smooth, the river hastens its course to the—the roaring of the waves is beneath our keel, and the land lessens from our eyes, the floods are lifted up around us; and we take our last leave of earth and its inhabitants and of our further voyage there is no witness but the Infinite and Eternal.

"And do we still take so much thought for the future days, when the days which have gone by have so strangely and uniformly deceived us? Can we still set our hearts upon the creatures of God when we find by a sad experience that the Creator only is permanent? Or shall we not rather lay aside every sin which does most easily beset us and think of ourselves henceforth as wayfaring persons only who have no abiding inheritance but in the hope of a better world, and to whom even the world would be worse than hopeless if it were not for our Lord Jesus Christ and the interest which we have obtained in his mercies."

THE GOSPEL.

There is nothing wherein God doth so much put himself, wherein he may be so fully known, communicated with depended upon and praised as in the Gospel.—In the creature, he is God above us; in the Law, he is God against us; only in the Gospel, he is "Emmanual, God with us,"—a God like us a God for us.—Reynolds.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.)

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) JANUARY 15 1847. NO. 7

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr. R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr. S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. FINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	W. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. WM. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

TO THE HONORABLE,
THE MEMBERS OF THE LEGESLATURE.

GENTLEMEN:—Another year has come around; and it is with peculiar satisfaction that I meet the 9th, Session of the Legislature of Liberia. Coming from all parts of the Commonwealth, at this critical and interesting period, it is presumed Gentlemen, that you are fully possessed of the sentiments and wishes of your constituents; and are prepared to act promptly in all questions which may be submitted to your consideration; and I, no doubt, will be enabled to give such a direction to public affairs, as the wisdom and patriotism of your constituents will approve and support.

In our present meeting, it is my first duty to invite your attention to the providential favors which these Colonies have experienced during the past year—in the unusual degree of health dispensed to their inhabitants—in the rich abundance with which the earth has rewarded the labors of the husbandman—and in the success which has attended the efforts of our merchants and traders.

In the successful cultivation of other branches of industry—and in the progress of general improvement—every where manifest—favorable to the national prosperity—shall we not also for our increased congratulations and thankfulness.

I have the satisfaction of informing you that the Market House in this Town has been completed: and in conformity with the 6th Section of an Act entitled: "An Act providing money for building a Market House in the Town of Monrovia"—which provides, "that when said Market House shall have been completed it shall be leased to the Corporation of Monrovia, for an annual rent, to be agreed upon by persons appointed by the Governor, and the corporation, for that purpose"—Messrs James Brown, and H. Teage, were appointed on the part of the Commonwealth, and Messrs D. B. Brown and James B. Mc. Gill on the part of the corporation. I lay before you the award of those Gentlemen, and the agreement of the corporation authorities. By the latter you will perceive that the corporation authorities bind themselves to pay into the Treasury of the Commonwealth annually, certain sums, until the amount so paid in shall equal the amount expended in erecting the building.

The report of the Canal Commissioners has not yet been received. I understand however it is in a forward state of preparation, and will be laid before you at an early day.

Accounts of the receipts and expenditures of the last year, will, as usual, be laid before you. I am happy to be able to inform you that the state of our finances continues to fulfil our expectations. Full returns of officers in the counties of Grand Bassa, and Sinoe, have not yet been received. It is ascertained, however, that the Revenue received during the last year, exceeds—by a small amount—that of the preceding: and it may reasonably be expected that the receipts of the ensuing year—with the sum now in the Treasury will be sufficient to defray the current demands of the year, and meet any expense which may be incured—should the Legislature adopt measures to that effect—in carrying out the wishes of the people in regard to the framing of a new government.

With respect to the subject of independence, I have the honor to inform you, that in compliance with the desire of the Legislature as expressed in their resolution of the 15th of July last—requesting the Executive to call the attention of the people of these colonies to certain recommendations expressed in a set of resolutions adopted by the Board of Directors of the American Colonization Society, at their annual meeting in January last, touching the independence of Liberia—I issued a proclamation, expressive of the desire of the Legislature, and calling on the people of the Commonwealth to determine—through the means of the ballot box—what disposition should be made of the resolutions, or whether the recommendations therein submitted should be adopted or not. I lay before you the result of the vote taken on the question, in all the towns and villages of the Commonwealth, on the 7th day of November last.

You will perceive that the people, by a small majority however,—have decided in favor of adopting the suggestions of the Board of Directors, in regard to a change of our relations with the Society; and have expressed a desire that a convention be called to draft a constitution for the new government; and that measures be adopted to carry the same into effect as soon as practicable.

I regret exceedingly, to find by official returns that not more than two thirds of the legal voters of the Commonwealth attended the poles to record their opinion respecting this highly important question.

Why so many of our fellow citizens absented themselves, and declined giving a public expression of their sentiments respecting the question submitted to their consideration, is unknown to me. It is nevertheless, a question of vital importance to the people of Liberia. One that should interest—deeply interest—every citizen of the Commonwealth.

Since this question was first mooted, I have been watching with much concern the progress of public opinion in regard to it; and have frequently been astonished at the instability of the public mind, and the manifest inconsistency of some of the leading men of our community.

In tracing out the causes of this fickleness, I have been pained to find, that many of our less informed fellow citizens have been egregiously deceived in regard to the purport of a communication addressed to the Board of Directors of the American Colonization Society, by a committee of the Legislature of 1845—respecting the light in which the sovereignty of these colonies is held by the government of Great Britain.

It is asserted, I understand, that the Legislature of 1845—not having the authority of the people for that purpose, of course—communicated with the Board of Directors of the American Colonization Society, informing them "that it was the wish of the people of these colonies, that their political relations with the Society should be immediately changed; and that Liberia be declared an independent state. And that the Legislature contemplated forming a new government without asking the consent of the people."

As preposterous and foolish, to say the least of them—as these accusations are; they have nevertheless, had a baneful effect upon the minds of some of our people, and, I have no doubt, in a great degree prevented that unanimity of action so desirable on the adoption of any great and important measure.

I believe it was not the intention of the members of that Legislature to convey the idea, by their communication to the Board of Directors, that a vote of the people had been taken on the question of independence, and that they were recommending the measure on their authority. And how any rational man could entertain the idea that the Legislature contemplated changing the relations of these colonies, and forming a new government—without the authority of the people, I cannot conceive. I venture to assert that not a single member of that Legislature would tolerate the doctrine, that the inhabitants at large should not exercise that right—a right which God has given them in common with all men, to judge whether it be consistent with their interest or no change their political relations, or to accept reject a constitution framed for the state which they are members.

This is the birthright of every citizen to whatever state he may belong. There he is or ought to be, by indefeasible right, a Co-Legislator with all the other members that community: and while it is acknowledged every individual in a community is not qualified for assisting in the framing of a constitution, it is equally evident that, that share of common sense which the Almighty has so bountifully attributed among mankind in general, is sufficient to quicken every one's feelings and enable him to judge rightly what degree of safety, and what advantages he is likely to enjoy, or be deprived of under any constitution proposed to him.

The diversity opinions and judgments which always takes place on a new measure—the unaccountable propensity of some men to censure every thing not their own, and the fretfulness of others at not being consulted on all public matters, are every day occurrences in long established, intelligent, and well regulated communities, therefore are not to be wonderful in Liberia.

I presume, Gentlemen, that you will dispose of this question of dependence according to the wishes of the people as expressed by their vote of the 27th of November last. If so, you will, of course, determine upon the number of which the convention for framing a new constitution shall be composed, the manner in which they shall be elected, the time of their meeting &c. &c. &c.

I am aware that objections are urged against this course. It is insisted, on the grounds that not more than two thirds of the male inhabitants attended the polls to signify their wishes with respect to the question, and that the majority in favor of the measure being so small, that the Legislature should decline calling a convention, or adopting further measures in the premises.

For my own part, I can see but one course for me to pursue. With respect to those of our fellow Citizens who declined attending the polls, I have only to remind you: that no person was excluded from voting but those who chose to exclude themselves; and in that case, I hold, that they either show theselves unworthy of the privileges of a citizen, or confiding in the judgment of others signified their consent to the measures proposed. And while it is deeply to be regretted that greater unanimity does not exist with respect to this important question, we can but remember the indisputable maxim, "that the will of the people is the law of the land;" and that government is, or ought to be, instituted for their benefit; and of all the various modes and forms of Government, that is best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety: and that when any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes, the majority of the community, however small that majority may be, has an undubitable, unalienable and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such a manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal. Such changes, however, are always dangerous, and should never be made except under the firm conviction that they are necessary for the benefit, protection, and security of the people in general.

Now, Gentlemen, this perplexing question is in your hands; and, as the representatives and guardians of the rights and interests of the people of these colonies, I beg to remind you of the great responsibility which rests upon you. It is your duty to watch cautiously over every occurrence that can possibly tend to obstruct the fair channel of our happiness. And, I am fully persuaded that the prosperity and happiness of the people of these colonies depend, under God, on the firm union of their inhabitants. Generations yet to come may owe their freedom and happiness to the result of your deliberation on the important subject now submitted to your consideration. A single false step at this critical crises, may ruin—irreparably ruin, our hopes of future success. Upon you then depends the political happiness or wretchedness of the people of Liberia: may I therefore entreat you to weigh and consider well the part you are called to act in this important matter; and that you will not suffer yourselves to be betrayed into any feelings unbecoming the dignity of your station, and the present critical situation of our affairs. Let us substitute calmness for passion, confidence for suspicions, and, no doubt, we shall soon agree as to the course proper to be pursued on this occasion of your meeting.

In assuming the whole responsibility of conducting the affairs of this government it is impossible to conceal from ourselves or the world the many disadvantages and embarrassments, we must necessarily labor under for some years. The numerical strength of the colony is comparatively small, nor can we boast of great intelligence, experience or wealth. Indeed, when these are considered, it is not matter of surprise that so many of our fellow citizens are exceedingly fearful as to the result of this new organization. The question: "Has the time arrived for this important change?" naturally forces itself on the mind of every reflecting citizen.

A majority of the people, however, has decided in the affirmative; which opinion is sustained by a unanimous vote of the Board of Directors of the American Colonization Society. In their opinion it is the only course that will, or can, relieve us from the embarrassments we labor under with respect to the encroachments of foreigners; and the objections urged by Great Britain in regard to our sovereignty.

I sincerely hope, and believe, Gentlemen that you will be sustained by your fellow citizens in whatever measures you may adopt respecting this question, and that the reputation of the people of Liberia, for order and good government, will not be diminished by our future conduct—that there will be no discord among us—that all differences of small moment will be entirely laid aside, and that the only strife among citizens will be who shall do most to serve and to save an oppressed and injured race.

I feel particular satisfaction in being able to announce to you that nothing has occured during the past year to disturb the friendly relations subsisting between this government and the surrounding native tribes. Indeed our amity with them appears to have become more firmly established. I am also happy to state that the continued efforts to introduce among them the christian religion, and habits of civiliz tion, have not been without success. They are unquestionably becoming, every year, more and more sensible of the superiority of civilized life, over the barbarous customs of their fathers; and many of them are beginning to engage pretty extensively in the pursuits of agriculture, and household manufacture. They are becoming convinced of the precarious resources of the slave trade and of the sufferings to which many of them are frequently reduced by the wars and wants of savage life: and find it their interest to dispose of their territories to this government—ceding to it the political control and jurisdiction over all persons and property therein; incorporating themselves with us, forming an integral part of this Commonwealth.

Since the last annual meeting of the Legislature another important acquisition of territory has been made. In February last the natives occupying the lands lying between Blue Barra and Grand Cess—the territory of Settra Kroo, comprising about six miles of sea coast, excepted—ceeded to this government—including the right of sovereignty—their entire territories:—also two tribes further north, occupying the territories known as Tassoo, and Baffoo Bay:—reserving for their members only what is sufficient to maintain them in an agricultural way. A few days ago, General Lewis, commissioned on the part of this Government, succeeded in purchasing about fifteen miles of sea coast, comprising portions of the territories of Manna, Curroo, and Timboo.

It is understood, in each case, that we shall extend to them our patronage and protection, that we will establish trading factories among them, furnishing them necessaries, at moderate prices, in exchange for their commodities: and protect them against the incursions of their marauding neighbors.

Other tribes occupying intermediate points have agreed to transfer their territories to this Government; and we are only awaiting the arrival of funds—daily expected—to perfect our negotiations. If not interrupted by foreigners, and means are placed at our command, I have but little doubt, that during the present year we shall succeed in extinguishing the native title to all the lands lying between the extreme points of colonial jurisdiction.

Gentlemen, I lay before you a communication, dated December 8th 1846, addressed to me by Captain Murray of Her Majesty's Sloop "Favorite," in which he asks permission "to construct a chart of the line of coast occupied by the Liberians, in which to mark the territories now in their possession,"—and that I would attach my signature to the same: and allow him to examine the title deeds by which are held the territories in question.

He has, also, been pleased to say "that England recognizes our right to these territories, if legally purchased from the rightful owners of the soil,"—regarding the Liberians however," only in the light of a Society or private company of traders; and in no case can she admit the exercise of sovereign rights in which may be included the payment of custom dues. And that code of international law does not allow the claim to territory which may have been only partially purchased, and occupied in detached portions: and that in the event of this government purchasing the lands surrounding sites of factories in which British subjects have acquired rites of property, it will be his duty to disallow the legality of such a purchase, if made over the heads of such British subjects, or obtained without their concurrence."

Of course, no objections were interposed in regard to the construction of a chart. I did however,—as Captain Murray could not inform me for what purpose it was required—decline placing my signature to such a chart.

The light, in which England regards the sovereignty of these colonies, is not new to you: Captain Murray is only reiterating what has been said by British naval officers, on that subject, for several years.

We are told that England regards the Liberians only "in the light of a Society, or private company of traders, or settlers" without any national rights or privileges. Then fellow citizens—if the principle advanced by British officers, with respect to the sovereignty of Liberia, be correct—after all our toil, we are still without a country or a home;—outcasts upon the world, and persecuted in every clime.

I, however, doubt the correctness of the position assumed by British Officers in regard to this subject.

The frailty of human nature, the wants of individuals, and the numerous circumstances which surround them through the course of life;—have in all, ages, and in every country impelled men to form societies and establish governments.

The people of these colonies, impelled by circumstances over which they had no control, left their native land to seek on these shores a residence for civil and political freedom. At the expense of their blood, at the hazard of their lives, without the least charge to the country from which they removed, by unceasing labor, and an unconquerable spirit they have effected settlements and established a government, with executive, legislative and judicial powers, in the distant and inhospitable wilds of Africa. After all this, will Great Britain with all her magnanimity and philanthropy towards the African race, deny to us the right to exercise these powers? I know not. Generous minds contemplate with pleasure the increasing happiness of human Society—therefore must feel delight in beholding the increasing prosperity of these colonies.

While it is obvious that we should, and will respect the prior rights of property, such as sites of factories, acquired by British subjects, within our jurisdiction; we cannot concede the point that it is at all necessary for us to obtain the concurrence of British subjects in purchasing the lands owned by the natives, surrounding sites of factories owned by such British subjects.

In no instance, to my knowledge, have such factors set up any claim to the sovereignty of the country. On the contrary they conform to the rules and usages of the country, as established by the natives, and in no case would they attempt to abrogate any one of them.

I maintain that the natives have the same right to those lands, and their kings to the sovereignty of them as any nation or king in Europe can have to the lands or sovereignty of each respective country; and if the kings with the consent and concurrence of their subjects, are disposed, and will cede to this government their territories, with the sovereignty of them:—incorporating themselves with us, as the Texians have done with the people of the United States, I ask what has any British subject, or any other person, or nation to do with it.

In our case, it appears that, "even in international law does not allow the claim to territory which may have been only partially purchased, and occupied in detached portions:" but in the case of British subjects, their claim must be allowed and their rights respected. Rather one sided this, and not easily reconciled.

Gentlemen, be not discouraged, Liberia is destined by the Almighty for the free and quiet habitations of thousands, perhaps millions, in future time, and a land for the oppressed to flee to and be happy.

Innumerable apparent causes—all doubtless innumerable which are unseen to us—are at work to hasten great events, and every day seems pregnant with something new and important. And may we not hope, as in time past, so in time to come these colonies will make swifter progress in their advances to maturity than any which have heretofore existed.

Hitherto their growth has astonished their enemies, and has surpassed the sanguine predictions even of their enthusiastic friends. Their advances continue with an increasing rapidity, and according to the course of human affairs—if not retarded by foreign interference—they will soon be the subject of admiration and applause among the nations of the world; and will wipe from our race the foul imputation, "that colored men are incapable of self government."

Gentlemen, notwithstanding the many embarrassments and difficulties we have to encounter, consequent upon settling any new country: we have much to encourage us. Possessed of a continent so rich and extensive that the enterprising genius of Europe or America has not been able to explore its boundaries, nor fathom the depths of its fertility, nor penetrate the treasures of its exhaustless mines.

Every circumstance favorable to mankind concur to facilitate the independence and happiness of these colonies. Here the human mind untrammelled by unequal laws, and unawed by unjust prejudices will expand with new wings, and gathering strength with its flight will feel its native force, and reach the summit of human perfection. I believe that the Almighty intends through the instrumentality of these colonies, to restore to Africa her long lost glory. Here, it is probable, science and true will attain their highest perfection: society be in the most beautiful and lovely form, and pro the highest felicity. As virtue alone, however can ensure real happiness and solid glory, this must a prevailing principle, before society can attain em. The history of mankind testifies through ages and periods the inseperable connection been virtue and happiness. And in proportion to prevalence or decline has been the prosperity every state or nation.

Such circumstances call with pliar importunity, not less for a disposition to in all those measures, in which the honor, safe and prosperity of our country depend, than for all exertions of wisdom and firmness.

In all such measures, Gentlemen you may rely on my hearty concurrence and co-ation.

J ROBERTS.

Government House,
Monrovia, Liberia, January 4 7.

(Continued from the Fourth Page.)

This character bad as it is Lord North is one of the least defamatory on the whole-work but even this "paltry eulogium"—the positive merit of good humor and the negative one of not meaning the mischief he did, he probably owed to a small fact which we have already quoted in another place. "In the payments of office bill," says Walpole, "I always received justice and civility from Lord North." Works, vol. ii, p. 369.

The Chancellor Bathurst—

"was too poor a creature to have any weight."—vol. iv., p 84.

Lord Rochford, secretary of state,

"lass employed and still less known to sense and none at all to knowledge—ib.

Lord Suffolk—secretary of state—

his soul was harrowed by ambition and as he had no parts to gratify it he sought the despotism of the crown as means of gratifying his own pride. He was totally unpractised in business, pompus ignorant and of no parts but affecting to be the head of Grenville's late party"—ib.

Lord George Germaine, secretary of state,

"was proud haughty and desperate." vol. iv, p 84.

Lord Halifax, privy seal,

"a proud empty man"—v. iv., p. 208.

Lord Hillsborough, secretary of state,

"was a pompous composition of ignorance and want of judgment"—vol. iv, p. 193.

[Continued from the Last.]

As individuals are actuated by a like special spirit so nations claim to themselves the prerogative of reducing to slavery others inhabiting a different clime or distinguished by a different colour of countenance. Aristotle, in that very book where he establishes the grand principles of a free government, is not ashamed to assert, that the Greeks were destined by nature, to rule the other nations of the earth; and found our right on their superiority in virtue and civilization. Had that philosopher foreseen the present state of his own country, and that of the nations which he considered as appointed to continue barbarians to the end of time, he would have acknowledged the futility of his argument. But the nations of Europe who have exchanged barbarism for refinement, have adopted the same principle, and suppose that such effects of art and policy carries along with it the right of oppressing those whose state is still rude and uncultivated. The principles established in this Essay sufficiently evince that no pre-eminence of sagacity, wisdom ingenuity, or strength can entitle any human being or any society of men to deprive others of the inherent and unalienable rights of human nature.

But since principles directly contrary to these influence the generality of mankind, the present state of society is perfectly conformable. As few men have the courage to sacrifice their interest, their pleasure, or their fame, to their regard for truth and justice the great concern is to speak and act not as reason and virtue dictate, but as interested views in conforming to the opinions, humours, and manners of others, may require. For how is the favor of the greater part of men to be caught, but by adulation and servile respect; and what so efficacious for incurring their displeasure, as that manly and generous conduct and conversation, which indicate less solicitude to secure favor than to enjoy self-esteem, greater love mankind than respect for individuals? Hence, most men have an opinion for every company they frequent, and change their sentiments sooner than their dress. The art of pleasing, reduced to a system, and practised by every one who affects the character of politeness, has given the same shape and coloring to the manners of all; and those prominent features, which characterize and distinguish are rubbed off by the file of civility and fashion. Politeness is making content demands—propriety imposing new laws—men are always the slaves of customs, and seldom follow the bent of their own genius and temper. Society is a species of stage, on which the actors appear in their turns, and play their parts. The real character remains behind the scenes. The great contest is, who shall act with the most powerful effect on the spectators, and produce the completest illusion. He is, therefore most applauded, and bears the highest price, who appears least himself, and personates most successfully the assumed character. Should an uncivilized son of nature be introduced into our European circles, he would, at first conclude that humanity and benevolence had there fixed their abode. But as soon as he was informed that all this was but scenery and stage effect, he would be uncertain whether most to admire the skill with which the representation was conducted, or to detest the duplicity which could so completely assume the appearance of qualities, of which the reality was wanting.

By these different infractions of the original rights of man above mentioned, society is reduced to its present unhappy condition, in which the Mobbesian state of nature appears in the midst of civilization and refinement. The interests, the pursuits, and the passions of men constantly acting in opposition inspire, in the midst of unceasing competition, unremitting caution and solicitous jealousy. The specious mask of civility and complaisance is often assumed to conceal the most hostile designs. The language of nature is unknown, and the warm expressions of affection either fall to the ground destitute of all meaning, or are perverted to convey an ironical conception of contempt and dislike.

How different would be the face of society, if the just equality of mankind were duly considered, and the inherent rights of human nature respected as they ought! But this consummation devoutly to be wished will only take place when men shall believe and practise Christianity, and do the will of their Heavenly Father on earth, as it is done in Heaven.

DEATH OF A PATRIARH OF FREEDOM

The friends of liberty throughout the world will mourn when they learn that the beloved and honored Thomas Clarkson is no more an inhabitant of earth. The slave in his lowly hut will weep that he has one friend less to plead his cause against his oppressor, and the philanthropist will deplore the loss of one most faithful of coadjutors. But for the toil-worn servant of God who has finished work, and gone to his rest who will not rejoice! His long life has been one of self denying labor in behalf of oppressed humanity and though dead he yet speaks to the living through the memory of his noble and truly Christian example. O, whom will his mantle fall?

DEATH OF THOMAS CLARKSON.

The Caledonia steamer is arrived just as our paper is going to press bringing very interesting letters from our valued friends James Robertson William Knell and Andrew Paton of Scotland and from Edward Search of London. The Scottish letters are full of enthusiasm on the subject of Mr. Garrison's visit, and of glowing accounts of his reception and successful progress through Scotland. His engagements were so overwhelming that he had no time to write even to his family. He was to proceed immediately to Ireland. After a fortnight's visit to that island, he was to sail on Tuesday for home in the Britannia. We shall give the Scottish letters in full in our next number.

The news of the greatest interest to the abolitionists of this country, and of the world is that of the death of the illustrious THOMAS CLARKSON, which took place at his seat, Playford Hall on Saturday, September 26th, in the 87th, year of his age. Full of years and full of honors, he rests from the labors of near a century devoted to the highest interests of freedom and humanity.

The first of the generous band that commenced sixty year ago, the movement which was crowned success only with the abolition of the slave-trade and with West Indian Emancipation, he was the last to be removed from the scene of his toils and his triumphs. He survived by many years the obloquy and persecution, which is ever the living witness of fidelity to odious truth, and lived to receive the homage of the unanimous admiration of his Age. His name will be forever held in the highest reverence and honor, for he was identified it with a movement, the effects of which will be felt to the end time.

He is gone to his last rest in the Abbey where England has garnered up her illustrious dead, and sleeps in the spot long since reserved for his ashes by the side of Sharp, of Macaulay and of Wilberforce. And of all the mighty host of kings, statesmen, heroes, philosophers and lords that people that sanctuary of departed greatness, who has fame more pure and more truly illustrious, and gained by deeds more worthy of reason and blessing, than THOMAS CLARKSON?

Ne'er to the mansions where the mighty rest,
Since their foundations came a nobler guest;
Nor e'er was to the bowers of bliss conveyed,
A fairer spirit, a more welcome shade!

It is a sad satisfaction to know from a letter to the London Patriot from Mr. Thompson, that Mr. Garrison visited the aged philanthropist, but a short time before his death: a visit which Mr. Clarkson had anticipated with the warmest pleasure. And still more to know that at this interview he placed in Mr. Garrisen's hands as his Legacy to the American people his views as to the DISSOLUTION OF THE AMERICAN UNION! This most interesting and valuable document, the last work probably, of the dying patriarch, before he took his flight from earth, we shall lay before our readers at the earliest practicable moment. His last hours therefore were devoted to the great cause for which he had lived. Age could not chill nor the fast gathering shadows of death darken the enthusiasm of his soul in the great behalf of human right. His dying words were words of counsel and encouragement. His dying thoughts could not be limited by the country which gave him birth but flew across the ocean to the land which is now the arena of the conflict between Liberty and Slavery. His example in death as in life is a precious legacy to those engaged in that glorious strife. It will strengthen and encourage them in the difficult warfare they are waging, and help to make them faithful and patient even unto the end.—Q.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. JANUARY 15. 1847

ARRIVALS.

It is an old saying in Yankee land, that "it never rains but it pours" We have been for some time very hungry for every thing. We had no butter until a short time ago a Frenchman supplied us with a little to the tune of fifty cents a pound—no tobacco—no powder—no flour—no pork, no every thing. On the 7th inst. the long-looked for Liberia Packet arrived with immigrants and other passengers; among whom we recognise Doctor Lugenbeel and Miss Johnson. She also brought for different persons the usual supply of epistles and papers. The latter are chiefly filled with accounts of marches and counter-marches plots and counter-plots of the army of invasion in Mexico—reaping unspeakable glory in fields, out of which some of the papers say the Mexicans run so soon as an American shows his face!! Cheap glory this, and bloodless, if the papers speak truth; but we doubt their veracity, at least on this score. The Packet also brought a supply of provisions and other merchandize which we regret to say are not quite so cheap as we can desire them.

On the 8th the Margarett Ann arrived. Passengers Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Seymour and Mr. Tytler. She also brought out merchandize so that with the supply of the two we will be able to weather the season. We are however looking for another—and expect ere this goes to press to see the flag flying on signal hill.

Weather.—If one were choleric and disposed to find fault he would have an excellent subject in the present state of the weather. Heretofore the present month has been one of almost scorching and exhausting heat, only occasionally tempered by the fitful gusts of the cool quivering and drying Harmattan. But in the present month we have had, thus far, winds variable and cool drenching rain almost every night with an accompaniment of loud thunder and glaring lightning. If this weather continue long, it will blast the hopes of the farmer.

The Colonial Legislature assembled pursuant to law on Monday the 4th inst. The first business in the order of proceeding was the swearing of the members to do faithfully and conscientiously the work of legislation and to discharge such other duties as the time and circumstances might demand. It occurs to us that it will not be out of place to ask, while on this subject, whether by [illegible] a representative a man disfranchises himself—and assumes de facto the obligation to pocket his conscience, to close his eyes against evidence and his mind against argument, and to vote only as bidden by those who honored him with their suffrage. If this be the duty which the honor imposed [illegible] save us from both. If we can serve [illegible] that we resign the dignity [illegible] shall never aspire to the high honor of [illegible] To demand such a surrender [illegible] sovereign people as it is absurd [illegible] submit to it. It is in effect to say, here is a [illegible] to arrive at truth than argument and [illegible] and that he who has heard only one side of a question is as well prepared to decide upon it as he who has weighed carefully the arguments on both. These things have been suggested by the very frequent use by members of our legislature of such phrases as "the people want [illegible] think that and your constituents wish the [illegible] and therefore we must oppose the measure and support the [illegible]."

Directly after the members were qualified by swearing to do their duty, the Governor's Message was read. This document we have spread before our readers in this number of our paper. It is an interesting paper and contains a correct and succinct statement of the state of the question of Liberia Independence. The Legislature then adjourned to meet the following day.

The question of independence was the all absorbing theme. The members of the lower counties at once threw themselves to their old position supported by an auxiliary from Sinoe and in their manoeuvres kept the enemy without their intrenchment displayed considerable skill in parliamentary tactics. They were however opposed by formidable battalions of truth and reason.

On the fourth day of the session the house went into a committe of the whole—Mr. Weaver in the chair. After a little half-in-earnest and half in-play skirmishing, in which the parties were evidently rousing their energies for a desperate struggle, Governor Roberts advanced to close quarters, in the introduction of a resolution to determine whether the wishes of the people as expressed in the late vote should be complied with. This more than corsican maneuver brought the opponents of a new organization to a dead stand. A more effectual and better timed resolution could not possibly have been brought forward. It was better than whole tomes of argument, inasmuch as a vote in the negative would have arrayed the voter in direct opposition to the wishes of a majority of the whole people solemnly and decidly expressed, upon a question long and anxiously agitated from one end to the other of the colony. Having mentioned this our readers will not require to be told that the matter is settled. A resolution was passed ordering an election on the 17th proximo for delegates to meet in convention in July next for the purpose of framing a constitution. These resolutions, or rather this act, we insert below.

There was very little other business done. The independence question had absorbed all attention and kept the minds of all within and without the house wound up to their highest tension; so that matter accomplished, all other affairs appeared unimportant. In our humble opinion there were other matters growing out of the independence act which were eminently entitled to the immediate attention of the legislature, but which they, for some reason which has not transpired omitted, to attend to. These may be the subject of future remark.

AN ACT MAKING PROVISIONS FOR A CONVENTION.

Whereas the people of this Commonwealth did on the 27th day of October 1845, solemnly determine by vote that there shall be a convention held for the purpose of forming a constitution for the government of the Commonwealth of Liberia.

Sec. 1. There Be it Enacted by the Governor and Council in Legislature Assembled, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same,—That there be a convention held conformably with the wishes of the people, as expressed by their votes taken October 27th 1846.

Sec. 2. Be it further Enacted,—That the convention shall consist of eleven delegates, and shall be appointed in the following manner: for the county of Monrovia, six delegates shall be appointed, for the county of Grand Bassa four delegates shall be appointed, and for the county of Sinoe there shall be one delegate appointed.

Sec. 3. Be it further Enacted,—That the third Tuesday in February next shall be set apart for the purpose of electing delegates to said convention, and the Polls shall be opened in the different settlements in the counties of Montserrado, Grand Bassa, and Sinoe, and be conducted in the same manner and form as annual elections for Councilors are conducted, and the Judges of the Courts of Quarter Sessions and Common Pleas, at the February term of 1847 shall appoint Judges and clerks for the said election, and said judges and clerks shall be entitled to the same pay as judges and clerks of the annual election of Councilors, and the returns of said election shall be made to the Colonial Secretary and the delegates elected shall be notified in the same manner as the members of the Legislative Council.

Sec. 4. Be it further Enacted—That the persons who may be elected to said convention, shall meet in the Town of Monrovia on the first Monday in July 1847, and shall be entitled to the same pay per day including traveling expenses as members of the House of the Commonwealth, as is paid the members of the Legislative Council.

Sec. 5. Be it further Enacted,—That the convention be authorized to appoint its own officers and fix their pay to be drawn by an order from the Commonwealth Treasury in the usual manner of drawing Commonwealth monies, but in no case shall said pay exceed the amount paid such officers belonging to the Legislature.

Sec. 6. Be it further Enacted,—That they shall lay the same before the Governor as early after their adjournment as possible, and the Governor shall cause five hundred copies of the draft of the Constitution to be printed and the same be laid before the people as early as possible; and the people in their respective towns shall decide by solemn vote on the last Monday of September 1847 whether the draft of the constitution so submitted shall be adopted or not: those voting in the affirmative shall express on their tickets yea, those voting in the negative shall express on their tickets nay. The Polls shall be conducted as aforesaid, and the Sheriffs of the different counties, shall immediately transmit the result of said election to the Governor, and should there be a majority of votes in favour of adopting the constitution, the Governor shall immediately on ascertaining the fact declare the same by proclamation to be the law of the land.

Sec. 7. And be it further Enacted,—That in case there be a majority for rejecting the constitution, the Governor as soon as he is assured of the fact shall order the Colonial Secretary—to give immediate notice to the delegates to meet again in convention, who shall proceed to prepare another draft or make such amendments as will best suit the wishes of the people: and the convention shall be entitled to the rights as is provided by law. The new draft shall be laid before the people as aforesaid for their adoption or rejection, and should it be rejected the second time the Governor shall pursue the same course, to have it amended and laid before the people as above, and so on until it shall be accepted.

The modified tariff of the United States has by Act of Congress gone into operation. This new regulation imposing a duty of ten per cent on camwood and palm-oil cannot fail to affect very extensively our trade with American vessels. Our exports consist almost wholly of these commodities, and American merchants will of course meet the change by a correspondent advance on their prices. The effect will be to throw our trade into the hands of Europeans. Will not American Philanthropists look to this?

To a superficial observer the coast of Africa, and the Africans too, are destined to the melancholy condition of America and its aboriginal inhabitants. But we are bold to declare we are not the subject of any such gloomy forebodings—but on the contrary exult in a firm conviction that the coast of Africa can never be carried to Europe nor America, and that white people can never be strong nor numerous in these torrid regions. This is the sheet anchor of our hope. Another comfortable ingredient in our conviction, is a radical difference in in the constitution of the African and Indian races. The latter appears to have been formed and preserved by an inscrutable Providence as a check on the ascendency of wild and ferocious beasts in the western hemisphere until the arrival of the European. Having fulfilled his destiny, the Indian was then to disappear. Not so with the African. Ripened under the blaze of his own sun and hardened upon his own burning plains he acquires a firmness of stamen equaling any thing enjoyed by the white man in his foggy clime, and which no foreigner can hope ever to possess here. When therefore we hear that purchases of different points along the coast have been made by Europeans, while we admit the probability, when these purchases are near us, of temporary annoyance we yet feel assured that in the grand result the benefit will be Africa's. To support a respectable establishment of white people on any part of this western coast would require a sacrifice of money and life that no nation could be induced to make—to yield the direction of affairs to the hands of intelligent colored men would be to convert it at once from a European dependency into an African government.

These thoughts have been suggested by rumours rife in the colony, of the efforts which certain foreign traders are now making to possess themselves of certain parts of the coast in our vicinity. We wish them success, and hope they will purchase and improve all that is offered for sale. We or some of our brethren will surely, possess them, and if ready improved to our hand so much the better.

A few days ago a Spaniard on his way to the leeward in a large canoe manned by a number of Africans of a tribe strange to us, put ashore under the Cape. She was hauled ashore and turned bottom upwards, apparently for the purpose of safety and shelter of the baggage.

The Spaniard came up in town—his canoe remained at a small clearing near the canoe. The day after his arrival and just as he was about leaving, a rumor got afloat that the Africans, the number of whom being greatly magnified, were slaves. Immediately on hearing the rumor the Governor summoned the Spaniard in order to have the matter investigated. After a careful examination nothing could be elicited to criminate him [illegible] and where he was bound we have not learned.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

PLAIN TALK—The Baltimore Saturday Visiter, a speaking of the Church, uses the following language. We call it pretty plain talk for the wrong side of Mason and Dixon's line. We have some neighbours here in Nassau street—pious, Christian prints, too, they call themselves,—who have n't reached this point yet in Anti-Slavery grace;

Now it is time this mask was tripped off. The pro-slavery churches of the land have placed themselves in a false attitude. They have consented to be taught by, instead of teaching the civil power, in matters of right. Did they speak out in their ecclesiastical assemblies and church sessions, as they ought to do, taking care individually to "suit the action to the world"—did they do as the quakers did (for they too it should be remembered, were once allowed to hold slaves,) soon would there be an end to the system in this land. They are the chief props of Slavery. While so many church members and clergymen hold slaves (some of the latter large numbers) to work their cotton plantations—witness that great pro-slavery clerical champion, Dr. Fuller, and such a large proportion of the residue are found to only apologizing for the system, how can public sentiment be expected to right itself speedily, and embody itself in laws of freedom! As it is, our legislators learn their distorted lessons of justice in the ecclesiastical meeting, only to apply them in the legislative hall; and then, returning again to the Church councils, they there exemplify the force of laws which they themselves have helped to make! We ask our brother of the "Methodist Protestant" if this is not so!

Let the truth be driven home: Jesus had no slaves—nay, not even a home wherein to lay his head; and yet his ministering followers seek to have costly houses (not to say farms) served by abject slaves! Oh! that the Christianity of Christ did only more widely prevail among the followers of Christ—especially those who assume to be teachers of the people!

We know that we shall, for the above, and previous "faithful sayings," incur the charge of being inimical to the clergy. Be it so! Yet we are not their enemy, but their friend—desiring their highest usefulness, with which consists their chiefest good. At any rate, we must be faithful to our own mission—therefore speak we as unto wise men: hear ye what we say! It is within the power of the churches of this land, led on by their clergy, to put an end to Slavery, with all its untold evils, if they will only be faithful to God.

CHANGES IN PURSUITS AND CONDITIONS IN LIFE.—The old proverd, "Ne sutor ultra crepidam," dose not hold good in all cases. Herschel, the great astron was a fiddler; Stephenson, the projector of rail, employed in a coal mine; James Watt, a wanker; Macadam, a linen-draper; the Master of Rolls, Langdale a physician; and Lough, the ptor, a plough-boy. The present Attorney Gal commenced life in the navy; Mr. O. Anderton C. and Mr. Watson, Q. C, were in the army; Sthard late chief magistrate at Bow street was a cheyman 'saddler; as also were the present Lord chief Baron's father, and Alderman Sir Peter L. who was once, as we have heard, brought up police office for joining a "strike." Alderman Sir Pirie was a common proter; Alderman Sir man Marshall, a shopman; Nelson's friend, Lady milton, a nursery-maid; the Countess of Blessington Irish peasant girl; and the Baroness Fencher who deid lately leaving a million of money about which so much litigation has taken place was l in a workhouse. Franklin was a journeyman ler; Faraday, laboratory servant to Sir Humph Davy; Arkwright, a barber; Sir Edward Sugde father was also a barber; Bernadotte, King of Swe was a common soldier; Theodore, King of Cor died in the King's Bench prison: Marshal Ler, the Duke of Dantzic rose from the ranks and his nephew is now, or was lately, an assistant fishmon in Hungerford market London. Coleridge wonce a private in the dragoons; Charles Lamb a clk in the India House; the great Lord Clive, a wr in the Company's service; and Winsor, the prator of gas, kept a lodging-house of no very requtal character.

There is "pleasant" story, "too good" not "be ln, "that has been circulated very widely for some years. It is to this effect. In a certa town lived two men the one a clergyman, the other a dissenting minister both of wom happened to bear exactly the same name. This circumstance naturally occasioned inconveniences, letters and parcels beg often delivered and sometimes open wrong. Once upon a time an epistle, intended for the schismatic teacher the regularly ordained priest, who on discovering the mistake forwarded it to its lawful proprietor with the wrathful message, "Sir, if you had not assumed a title Reverend, to which you have not right his mistake would not have occurred.") Nothing more took place we believe, on that occasion, but sometime after a parcel was delivered at the house of the Dissenter which on being opened was found to contain MS. sermons. There was no room for doubt. There must of necessity be meant for the other Mr——, to whom accordingly they were despatched, with the laconic [illegible] office to which you are utterly incompetent this mistake would not have occurred." The contrast thus pithily noted between official regularity and personal power is forced upon us every day in the year and is naturally suggested by the example of those who like Mr. Fry achieve the highest good of their fellow-creatures, in violation not merely of ceremonial rules of right but of conventional notions of social propriety—Nonconformist.

Laziness grows on people; it begins in cobwebs and ends in iron chains. The more business a man has to do the more he is able to accomplish; for he learns to economize his time.—Hale.

INTERNAL EVIDENCE.

A man of subtile reasoning asked
A peasant if he knew
Where was the internal evidence
That proved the Bible true?
The terms of disputative art
Had never reached his ear—
He laid his hand upon his heart,
And only answered—"HERE."

NOTICE.

The Subscriber by the assistance of friends having been enabled to commence business again, takes this opportunity to solicit a share of public patronage. As it is with him a fixed and unalterable purpose to pay off all his just debts—and not to avail himself of the lenity of the "Insolvent Act" and withhold from his creditors their just dues when it may be in his power to pay them, he especially asks commission business of them: as every cent of commission arising to him shall go to his credit. The subscriber has opened on Broad Street just opposite his residence. He will sell at a small profit—and his terms will be cash both in selling and in buying.

M. TEAGE.

Monrovia
Dec. 18*th* 1846.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30*th*, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

NOTICE.

NEW GOODS, Flour, Pork, Beef, Tobacco and Blue Baffs, for sale. American and foreign dry goods, both staple and fancy, varied by and with every modern improvement, in price, quality and fashion. The same may be said of lots of bonnets and shoes, &c, &c, &c, &c, too tedious to mention. The above named assortment was purchased for cash and therfore will be only sold for cash or produce down on the nail on the fairest terms.

EDWARD J. ROYE.

Monrovia June 10*th* 1846.

WANTED, by the subscriber 1000 bushels of peanuts very dry and in good order for shiping for which goods will be given at the lowest price.

E. J. Roye

ALSO Products of the soil that will bear shipping hitherto not exported together with every species of rare animals, birds, shells, or phenomena, of this portion of the Globe.

E. J. Roye

NEW SUPPLIES, Flour, sugar, pork, beef, fish & dry goods &c. recently bought & for sale at my usual low prices.

E. J. Roye.

Monrovia Nov. 5 th 1846

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon.	Lb.	none
Beads, pound,	"	none	12 00
Beef, cargo No.	Bb	10 00
Blue Baffs,	Ps.	3 75
Bricks,	100	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	30
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	none
Cheese,	"	20
Corn meal,	Bbl	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	none
Cotton white,	Bale	16	12 12
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00
Guns,	Box	30 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	5 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	20
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00
Nails	100lb	8 00
Oil palm	Gallon	1 50
Oil palm	"	34
Pork	Bbl	16 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	none
Powder	Bll.	15 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter.	"	3 00
Pipes gumbo	Box	none	20
Prints assorted	various	10	1 50
Romauls	Ps.	1 00
Salt	Ton	11 00
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 75
Tobacco	100lbs	20 00
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wines		5 00	8 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Jan. 2. Col. sloop Star, Atkins master, from leeward.

" 4. Col. Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, from Grand Cape Mount: Passengers, Rev. J. B. Benham, Rev. B. R, Wilson, and Capt, J. B. Mc Gill.

" " Col schooner Pedler, G. E. Carroll, master from Sinoe; Passengers Mr. James S. Payne and R. E. Murary.

" 7 British Brig——master, from windward.

" " American Barque Liberia Packet from Baltimore Passengers, Dr. Lugenbeel, Fletcher, and Miss. Johnson and emmigrants.

" 8. Am, Brig Margarett Ann,——from New York; Passengers Rev. A. D. williams and Lady Mr. Seymour and Lady and Mr. E. Tytler.

DEPARTURES.

Jan. 2. Col. sloop Economy, Chase master, for Junk.

" 8. United States Brig Dolphin, Pope Esq. commander for windward.

" " H. M. C. M. Brig Comette——commanding for leeward.

" 13. Am. Barque Liberia Packet.——master for leeward; passengers, for Grand Bassa, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Herring, Hon. S. A. Benson, and Hanson, and Dr. James Moore, and Mrs. E. Johnson: for Cape Palmas, Rev. Mr. Eden, Dr. Fletcher, and Miss Johnson.

" 15. Am. brig Margarett Ann,——master, for leeward; passengers, for Grand Bassa, Rev. A. D. Williams, Mr. Tytler, Mr. and Mrs. Seymour.

POETRY

BREAD FROM BRAIN.

WHERE the iron of our lives
Is wrought out in fire and smoke;
There the mighty Vulcan strives:
Hot the furnace, hard the stroke,
There the whizzy bellows blow,
There the sparks in millions glow,
There on anvil of the world,
Loudly clanging hammers wield,
Hard the labor! small the gain,
Is in making bread from brain!

Where that nameless stone is raised,
Where the purple bones were placed,
Loved not—little loved and praised;
Died he little mourned and graced:
There he sleeps who knew no rest,
There unblest by those he blessed;
There he starved while sowing seed,
Where he starved the worms now feed.
Hard the labor! small the gain,
Is in making bread from brain.

In that chamber lone and drear,
Sits a poet writing flowers,
Bringing Heaven to earth more near,
Raining troughs in dewy showers.
While he sings of nectar rare,
Only is the inkbowl there;
Of feasts of gods he chants—high trust,
As he eats the mouldy crust.
Hard the labor! small the gain,
Is in making bread from brain.

When the prophet's warning voice
Shouts the sermon of the world,
Sackcloth robes must be his choice,
Ashes on his head be hurled.
Where tyrants live at ease,
Where false priests do as they please,
He is scorned and pierced inside,
Reviled, stoned and crucified.
Hard the labor! small the gain,
Is in making bread from brain.

Partial! Poet! Prophet! fool,
Obey the motley crust
Tyrants, fools, and false priest need
Are the crumb, and scorn the just.
Loud! now sing! now ring, oh Lyre!
Rise, oh God, mind's enfranchised sword;
Let the pen become a sabre,
Let thy conflict cut who labor;
Bless the labor! bless the gain,
In the making bread from brain.

MISCELLANEOUS

WALPOLE'S CHARACTERS OF HIS CONTEMPORARIES.

"Mr. GRENVILLE had hitherto been known but as a fatiguing orator and indefatigable drudge, more likely to disgust than to offend. Beneath this useful, unpromising outside lay lurking great abilities courage so confounded with obstinacy that there was no drawing a line between them—good intentions to the public without one great view—much economy for that public which in truth, was the whole amount of his good intentions—excessive rapaciousness and parsimony in himself—infinite self-conceit implacability of temper, and a total want of principle. * * * * His ingratitude to his benefactor, Bute, and his reproaching Mr. Pitt * * * were but too often paralleled by the crimes of other men: but scarce any man ever wore in his face such outward and visible marks of the hollow, cruel, and rotten heart within."—vol., iv., p. 271.

"The reversion of Lord Temple's estate could make even the indexorable Grenville stoop; and if his acrimonious heart was obliged to pardon his brother [Lord Temple,] it was indemnified by revenge on his sisters husband [Mr. Pitt.]"—vol. ii., p. 174.

Lord Egremont—secretary of state—
"was a composition of pride, ill-nature avarice, and strict good breeding, with such infirmity of frame that he could not speak truth on the most trivial occasion. He had humor, and did not want sense; but he had neither knowledge of business nor the smallest share of parliamentary abilities."—p. 272.

Lord Halifax—secretary of state—
"was the weakest, but at the same time most amiable of the three. His pride, like Lord Egremont's, taught him much civility: he spoke readily and agreeably; and only wanted matter and argument. His profusion in building, planting, and on a favorite mistress, had brought him great straits, from which he sought extricate himself by discreditable means.

Then came the first Rockingham administration

The nomination of LORD ROCKINGHAM for minister at any season would have sounded preposterous—in the past sufficient alone to defeat the system—vol. ii., p. 100.

"He had so weak a frame of person and nerves that no exigences could surmount his timidity of speaking in public and having been only known to the public for his passion for race horses, men cannot be cured of their surprise in seeing him first minister',—ii., 19.

"He was more childish in his deportment than in his age. He was totally void of all information. Ambitious with excessive indolence; fond of talking of business but dilatory in the execution; his single talent lay in attracting dependents; yet, though proud and self-sufficient, he had almost as many governors as dependents."—vol. ii., p. 197.

"Lord Rockingham's childish arrogance and indiscretion',—vol. ii., p. 298.

"Rockingham, a weak, childish, and ignorant man"—vol. iii, p. 334.

Then we have some additional snubs at his nearest and dearest friend; Conway—secretary of state in that administration—

"The disgusting coldness of Conway's manner would revolt those he met at court, and I foresaw (though not to the degree I found it afterwards) how little he was made to ingratiate himself with strangers and consequently to conduct the house of commons. To talk to Conway against public opinion was preaching to the winds. His heart was so cold that it wanted all the beams of popular applause to kindle it into action.',—vol. ii., pp. 195, 213.

Mr. Dowdeswell—chancellor of the exchequer:—

"The office of chancellor of the exchequer was bestowed on Dowdeswell who was so suited to the drudgery of the office, as far as depends on arithmetic, that he was fit for nothing else. Heavy, slow, methodical, unversed in every graceful art, and a stranger to men and courts he was only esteemed by the few to whom he was personally known."—vol. ii., p. 196.

Lord Dartmouth—president of the Bord of Trade—
"only stayed long enough to prostitute his character and authenticate his hypocrisy."—vol, iv., p. 84.

Then came what is called LORD CHATHAM'S second administation in which General Conway continued the leader of the house of commons.

So great a name as Lord Chatham's and his most extraordinary conduct at this period deserve more copious extracts, which we give the rather because they confirm the view which we formerly took of the eccentricity of this period of his career, and because he is of all other the statesman towards whom Walpole seems to have felt impartially—or at least, with only a favoring partiality. In fact he almost worshipped him till the official connexion, & we may add, something of official conflict, between Conway and Lord Chatham brought, Walpole into a nearer view and more accurate judgement of that extraordinary man. Walpole seems to have had little or no doubt—nor indeed had Lord Chatham's colleagues—that he was during his second administration under the influence of insanity.

Walpole opens by the following general observations on his ministerial character:—

"Peace was not his element; nor did his talent lie in those details that restore a nation by slow and wholesome progress. Of the finances he was utterly ignorant. If struck with some great idea, he neither knew how nor had patience to conduct it. He expected implicit assent—and he expected more—that other men should methodize and superintend, and bear the fatigue of carrying his measures in execution and what was worse, encounter the odium and danger of them while he reposed and was to enjoy the honor, if successful. * * * * His conduct in the late war had been the same. He drew the plans, but left it to the treasury to find the means, nor would listen to their difficulties nor hold any rein over their ill management."—vol. ii., p. 365.

He then proceeds to particulars. Mr. Pitt—even before his administration was completed—

"had already commenced that extraordinary scene of seclusion of himself which he afterwards carried to an excess that passed and no wonder, for a long access of phrensy."—p. 342

"The mad situation to which Lord Chatham had reduced himself."—ib., p. 402.

"The pride and folly of Lord Chathan."—, p. 402.

"The wildness of Lord Chatham baffled all policy."—ib., p. 416.

"The madness or mad conduct of Lord Chatham."—ib. vol. iii., p. 67.

"Lord Chatham's wild actions of passion and scorn"—ib. p. 435.

"The Chancellor Camden had given many hints of his friend's frenzy."—vol., iii. p. 251

"As if there were dignity in folly, and magic in perverseness—as if the way to govern mankind was to insult their understandings—the conduct of lord Chatham was the very reverse of common sense, and made up of such undissembled scorn of all the world that his friends could not palliate it nor his enemies be blamed for resolving it into madness. He was scarce lame and even paraded through the town in a morning to take the air; yet he neither went to the king nor suffered any of the ministers [his colleagues] to come to him."—vol. ii., p. 426.

And again—

"Lord Chatham might have given firmness and almost tranquillity to the country might have gone farther towards recruiting our finances than any reasonable man could have expected; but' alas! his talents were not adequate to that task. The multiplication-table did not admit of being treated as epic and Lord Chatham had but that one style. Whether really out of his senses, or conscious how much the mountebank had concurred to make the great man he plunged deeper and deeper into retreat and left the nation a prey to favorites and to insufficient persons that he [illegible] for his conditions" vol. ii. p. [illegible]

We then have, at a length too great for an extract a very curious account of what certainly looks like phrensy in Lord Chatham's morbid anxiety to re-purchase the villa at Hayes which he had not long before disposed of to Mr. Thomas Walpole from whom Horace had the details, which as little exaggerated perhaps, as any of Horace's anecdotes, are a curious and melancholy picture of Lord Chatham's interior life at this critical time.

We have also the still less suspicious evidence of the Duke of Grafton's account—in an autobiography, with a few extracts from which the editor had been allowed to enrich this work—of an interview which with great difficulty and after long delays he the first lord of the treasury had obtained from his mysterious colleague: the duke says—

"Though I expected to find Lord Chatham very ill indeed his situation was different from what I had imagined; his nerves and spirits were affected to a dreadful degree and the sight of his great mind, bowed down and thus weakened by disorder, would have filled me with grief and concern even if I had not long borne a sincere attachment to his person and character"—vol ii, p. 51.

With all this evidence, and recollecting that both his sisters were indisputably mad and that one of them, Anne Pitt, who, as Walpole once wittily said to a French acquaintance respecting her "comme deux gouttes de—l'eau," died after a long exhibition of talent and eccentricity quite insane we can hardly doubt that he was laboring under a strong nervous disturbance. So certainly, thought the Duke of Grafton—when subsequently exasperated by some of Lord Chatham's wild and unfounded assertions in the house of lords he told him to his face that "they were the effect of a distempered mind brooding over its own disappointments;" but we doubt whether it was not a disturbance of the same nature (though of greater intensity) as that under which Walpole himself appears to have habitually labored—the result, namely of allowing his clear and powerful intellect to be overclouded and subdued by a proud passionate and feverish temper. And on the whole, we adhere to the opinion expressed in our article on Lord Chatham, (vol" lxvi., p. 253,) that seeing how sudden and complete his recovery was on going out of office, and with what more than juvenile vigor spirit and ability he threw himself again into the stormy torrent of faction we cannot excuse, on the plea of mere physical and involuntary infirmity, a long course of conduct so perverse, ungrateful and unprincipled at the time and in its consequences so degrading, and calamitous to his neglected country and his insulted sovereign. We may admire Lord Chatham's great oratorical talents and soaring spirit, but we can neither esteem nor respect him. His was we believe, the most disastrous glory that ever intoxicate—and when the intoxication was over—enervated our country, and planted the first germs of revolutionary disease in the constitution.

Lord Chatham's lord chancellor was.

"Lord Camden, whose character did not clear up as he proceeded, but was clouded with shades of interest and irresolution, and when it veered most to public spirit was subject to squalls of time-serving as by the court it was taxed with treacherous ambiguity."—vol iii., p. 251.

His chancellor of the exchequer was "that meteor" Charles Townshend, who died unexpectedly in 1767.

"Though cut off so immaturely, it is a question whether he had not lived long enough for his character. His genius could have received no accession of brightness, his faults only promised multiplication. He had almost every great talent, and every little quality: his vanity exceeded even his abilities. With such a capacity he must have been the greatest man of this age, and perhaps inferior to no man in any age, had his faults been only in a moderate proportion—in short, if he had had but common truth, common sincerity, common honesty, common modesty, common steadiness, common courage, and common sense."

The DUKE OF GRAFTON was left by the resignation of Lord Chatham at the head of the adminstrations of which indeed by Lord Chathm's seclusion he had all along been the effective chief—but Walpole (at one time in much friendship with him) gives the following very unfavorable estimate of his fitness for the post:—

"The negligence and disgusting coldness of the Duke of Grafton."—vol. iii., p. 105

"The moody and capricious temper of Grafton."—vol iii., p. 267

"His unfitness for the first post of the state"—vol iv., p. 66.

"The king was worn out with Grafton's negligence and impracticability."—p. 67.

"His fall was universally ascribed to his pusillanimity; but whether betrayed by his fears or his friends he had certainly been the chief author of his own disgrace. His naughtiness, indolence, reserve, and improvidence had conjured up the storm, but his obstinacy and feebleness—always relaying each other and always mal-apropos—were the radical cause of all the numerous absurdities that discoloured his conduct and exposed him to deserved reproaches; nor had he depth of understanding to counterbalance the defects of his temper, (p. 69) "the details of his conduct were as weak and preposterous as the great lines of it." (p. 70.)

Lord North had become chancellor of the exchequer on Mr. Townshend's death and on the Duke of Grafton's secession became first lord of the treasury; but there was little other change in the ministry.

"Lord North had neither system nor principle, nor shame, but enjoyed the good luck of fortune with a gluttonish epicurism that was equally careless of glory or disgrace. As a minister he had no foresight no consistence, no firmness, no spirit. He miscarried in all he undertook in America—was more improvident than unfortunate, and less unfortunate than he deserved to be If he was free from vices; he was as void of virtues; and it is a paltry eulogium of a prime minister of a great country, yet the best that can be allotted to Lord North, that though his country was ruined under his admintstation he preserved his good humor and neither felt for his country nor for himself."—vol iv pp 80 88.

(Concluded on the Second Page.)

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) FEBRUARY 5 1847. NO. 3

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Basha Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

(Ctinued from No. 6th,)

ORATION.

Delivered December 1st. 1846, in the Baptist Church Monrovia, by Hon. H. Teage.

Another argument for order and subordination lies in the fact, that the laws are in the hands of the people. Legislators are not elevated to office for their private emolument and honor, but for the nobler purpose of advancing and securing the happiness of their constituents; and they are bound—by the most solemn considerations they are bound, to enact such laws and such laws only as are suited to the genios and circumstances of the people. If they betray the high trust committed to them, and enact laws either oppressive or partial, the corrective is equally in the hands of the people. They have only to apply the constitutional remedy. Here then is no apology for disorder. Order then must be our rule; for without subordination, and prompt and constant and conscientious obedience to wholesome law there can be no security for person nor property. The bands of society would be untwisted and the whole fabric exposed to ruin on the first popular outbreak. Be it then fellow citizens our first concern to sustain our officers in the proper discharge of their constitutional duties; to secure obedience to the laws, and to preserve them from violation with the same jealousy with which we will watch the first encroachment of powor.

I observe in the second place that union amongst ourselves is absolutely necessary to prosperity. The idea of prosperity and stability where disunion reigns—where the elements of discord are actively at work—the idea of prosperity and stability in such circumstances can only serve to mislead. Can that army, in which faction triumphs among the soldiers—and disunion and jealousy distract the counsels of the officers hope to succeed in a campaign? Where each is afraid of the other—where no one has confidence in any—where every one regards every other one with feelings not only of jealousy but of positive hostility, how can there be any hope to bring an unbroken front to bear with undivided force upon any single point? I would observe also that the complexion of the soldiers mind will sure to be tinged by that of their officers. In every community there will be found some few to whom the mass will look up with unenquiring deference. Mankind generally are averse to the labor of thinking. This circumstance seperates those who should be very friends, and men file off under different leaders as fancy or caprice may dictate. Each party ranges itself under the banner of a leader whom it invests with all the perfection of political sagacity and political integrity. To his semibrutal followers his word is law—his decisions an oracle. Finding in him every attribute of perfection they abandon the reins to his hand; yield up the glorious privileges of thinking and examining, and prepare to follow with a blind and implicit obedience. This unworthy abandonment of the public interests—this surrender of a privilege to which every man is born and which every man should exercise is the capital of intriguing politicians and unprincipled political demogogues. And let me ask you fellow citizens, what scheme however mad and absurd which has been set on foot by these unprincipled leaders that has not had among the masses its advocates and adherents? Bad however as human nature is—alluring and fascinating as are the glitter and privilege of place and power this confidence has not been always abused. We could easily point out instances in which the influence which this disposition we have been adverting to has given men, has been exerted wholly and exclusively for the public good. But we must take human nature as we find it: and as we find this disposition every where prevalent the duty becomes imperitive on all who have influence to exert it for the public good. The root of the jealousies and divisions amongst public men, will generally speaking, be found planted in the soil of selfishness and ambition: not in any real and sincere disagreement as to the proper measures for the public good. This I admit is always the avowed, the ostensible, but I am bold to say, not the real cause.

It is envy of place and emolument—it is ambition of power that array public men in hostile attitude, and range their infatuated followers under their opposing banners In the infancy of our political existence let those amongst us who have credit with the people and influence over them beware of so great infatuation. Let us recollect that all cannot govern: that from the division and order in which society naturally resolves itself, all even of those who are worthy, cannot stand in the foremost ranks. Let us remember that we equally serve our country whether we sit in the gubernatorial or presidential chair—whether we deliberate in the Hall of the Legislature or preside in the sanctuary of Justice—that we equally serve our country whether from the shades of cloistered retirement we send forth wholesome maxims for public instruction, or in the intercourse of our daily life we set an attracting example of obedience to the laws. That we equally serve our country whether from the sacred desk we inculcate lessons of celestial wisdom, exibit the sanctions of a heaven descended religion—hurl the thunders of an incensed Jehovah, or in the nursery of learning unfold the mysteries and display the glories of science, re-call and re-enact the deeds and achievements of the past, and call back upon the stage the heroes, the patriots and the sages of antiquity, to kindle the ardor nerve the virtue, awaken the patriotism, elevate and purify the sentiment and expand the mind of the generous and aspiring youth. Humble as many of those offices of which I have spoken are esteemed to be,—obscure and concealed from vulgar gaze and destitute of the trappings of office and the glitter of fame as most of them actually are, it is, nevertheless fellow citizens, not within the reach of our judgment to determine which one of them exerts the greatest influence on the destinies of our race. True dignity, and I may add, true usefulness depend not so much upon the circumstance of office as upon the faithful discharge of appropriate duties.

> "Honor and fame from no condition rise > Act well your part there all true honor lies."
>
> "He who does the best his circumstance allows > Does well, acts nobly: Angels could no more."

It is the false notion of honor which has unhappily possessed the minds of men, placing all dignity in the pageantry of state and the tinsel of office which produces those collisions, justlings and acrimony of contending factions which sometimes shake the fabric of society to its very foundations: it is by the maddening influence of this false notion that men, whose claim to respectful notoriety is inversely as their desire to be conspicuous, are sometimes urged, to abandon their obscure but appropriate position in the line, and rush into the foremost ranks. When men shall have learned wherein true honor lies—when men shall have formed correct ideas of true and sober dignity, then we shall see all the ranks of society united as by a golden chain—then Ephriam shall not envy Judah nor Judah vex Ephriam—Then the occupant of the palace and he of the cottage—then the man in lawn and the man in rags will, like the parts of a well adjusted machine act in perfect unison. Considering then the influence which in every community a few men are found to possess—considering also that each one of these influential men is sure to be followed by a party, we can hardly appreciate the obligation which rests upon them to abandon all jealousies and suspicions—to merge every private and personal consideration in thoughts for the public good and to bring a mind free from envy and untrammelled by party predilection to a solemn deliberation on the great objects of public utility.

The education of our youth is the next subject to which I would direct your attention. "Knowledge is power"—is an old proverb—but not the less true because it is old. This is the spring that regulates the movements of society—this is at once the lever and the safety valve of human institutions. Without it society will either not move at all, or like an unbalanced, unhelmed ship move in a direction and at a rate that must eventually destroy it. Education corrects vice—cures disorders—abates jealousies—adorns virtue—commands the winds—triumphs over the waves—scales the heavens. In a word education lays all nature under tribute and forces her to administer to the comfort and happiness of man. Nor is this all that education does. It enobles and elevates the mind and urges the soul upward and animates it to deeds of high and lasting renown. Education opens sources of pure refined and exquisite enjoyment—it unlocks the temple of nature and admits the awe stricken soul to behold and admire the wondrous works of God. An ignorant vicious idle community has the elements of destruction already in its bosom. On the very first application of a torch they will explode and lay the whole fabric in ruins. A virtuous, orderly, educated people have all the elements of national greatness and national perpetuity. Would we be happy at home and repected abroad we must educate our youth.

In professing to notice those things which are necessary to our prosperity--to the advancement of our prospeaity and to the perpetuity of our prosperity it is natural that you should expect that agricultural industry will be brought prominently into view. I think it may be safely affirmed that the virtue and indepdence of a people will be inversely as their attention is wholly given to commerce—that their virtue and independence is evermore to be measured by their pursuits, of the wholesome and pleasing and primitive employment of agriculture and husbandry. Go into the countries of Europe—examine their large manufacturing and commercial towns and cities. Then visit the rural agricultural districts—compare the quiet—tranquility, order, virtue pienty of the latter with the bustle, confusion, vice and general dependence and poverty of the other and you cannot fail to be struck and deeply affected by the frightful contrast. And wherefore? Is not commerce called the great civilizer of the world? Is it not the means by which nations become acquainted and hold communion with each other? Is it not by this means that the great and master-minds of one nation commune with kindred minds of other nations. Is it not the channel through which improvements in art—in science—in literature—in all that adorns, dignifies and enobles human nature flow as on the wings of the wind from country to country? Grant it. It is not my purpose to pronounce a wholesale anathema upon commerce. I appreciate its high importance in improving our race. It is excess I would discourage—it is the wretched deteriorating influence it will exert upon a people, when by absorbing their whole attention it keeps them looking constantly abroad to the neglect of the improvement of their own country. It is to this I would call your attention. Again. Let it not be forgotten that if commerce imports improvements it imports vices also. It offers the same facility for the transmission of both. The same vessel that brings us the book of God brings us also the age of reason—and in one and the same ship we not unfrequently find the devoted self sacrificing missionary, and that accursed thing, which a celebrated orator with characteristic energy has styled; Liquid fire and distilled damnation!!

In the natural, or more properly vegetable world we have sometimes seen exotics outstrping in rapidity of growth the natural sponta neous productions of the soil. In this we have not a very unhappy illustration of the rank growth of imported vices. These baneful exotics grafted on the tree of indigenous corruption seem to receive and impart unwonted vigor from the contact: and the result is a fruit of the most disorganizing potency. An examination into the moral state of towns and districts wholly given to commerce and manufactures will fully sustain this remark. How let me ask you can there be order, where the very nature of the pursuits which engross all minds demand ceaseless hurry bustle and confusion? where to stop to breathe is to be at once outdone, and where he who can move the most swiftly amid the greatest confusion is thought to be smartest man? In respect of virtue. Is it to be thought of except for the purpose of holding it up to ridicule in a place where the vicious of all countries meet; and where females of every class and character far from the watchful eye of parental solitude are huddled together in one promiscuous throng, and dependent for their daily bread upon the freaks and fancies of unprincipled employers? Lowell in America, is, I believe, the only large manufacturing town where virtue is held in the least esteem. What shall I say of honesty and integrity? Where the lowest, bassests arts are practiced for gain. Where all its intrigue and circumvention—where the maxim prevails—all is fair in trade—where each regards the other as lawful game—where one can gain only by the loss of the other—where, in a word, rascality is fair play and will any systematic—where fellow citizens let me ask you, where in such a community is there room for honesty? Can the heart fail in such circumstances to become deadened to every feeling of humanity—steeled against every kindly, genrous and ennobling impulse? I will not venture to affirm that the result we have just now noticed is universal. I admit with pleasure there are honorable exceptions—but I do affirm that what I have said forms the general rule.

But let us turn from these scenes of noise, and smoke and deep depravity and visit the quiet abode of the farmer and the husbandman. What tranquility reigns here and ordor, and peace, and virtue!! Behold the farmer as he goes forth in the morning to his daily task. How firm and elastic his step—how cheerful his sun burnt countenance, how active his stalwart arm!! Behold how cheerfully he labors—how the fat valleys around him laugh with corn—how the spacious plains teem with grain and the ancient forests fall beneath his resounding axe!! Follow him, when the labor of the day is over, follow him to his humble home. See him surrounded by an affectionate industrious frugal wife, unsophisticated by the vices and dissipations of the fashionable world, and by prattling progeny blooming in health and big with promise of future usefulness. No cankering cares gnaw his peaceful bosom—no uncertain speculation disturbs his quiet slumbers, no revolutions in foreign lands damming up the channels of trade cloud the calm serenity of his brow. Oh! if there be a spot on earth where true happiness is to be found, here is that spot.

But we take a higher and a more extended view of this subject and regard it in its bearing on political economy. And my first remark is that no nation can be independent which subsists wholly by commerce. And here let it be observed once for all, that I use the word independent in a sense altogher distinct from sovereignity. I admit that there may be a temporary prosperity—that so long as peace prevails amongst nations connected by commercial and diplomatic relations—so long as each acts in perfect faith and maintains in all their entireness and in all their integrity his treaty stipulations there may not be felt a want of the necessaries nor even of the luxuries of life. There may perhaps be a large influx of the precious metals. Nothing however could be more fallacious than to regard this activity as an indication of Independence or of permanent prosperity. For I remark in the second place, that so uncertain are the operations of trade, so suddenly are its channels and outlets closed by misunderstandings and ruptures between rival nations—so liable is it to paralyzing shocks from intriguing cabinets and wily politicians the operations of one year scarcely afford any ground for conjecture in regard to the operations of the next. Let us illustrate our position by a humble supposition.

Suppose the surrounding country should suddenly relent throw wide its doors and shake its teeming wealth of gold, and ivory, and wood, and dys, into our lap—and the native African patient of labor and of travel should supply us at the most accomodating rates with all the coarser food for our consumption: Suppose vessels should flock, as under such circumstances vessel would most assuredly flock, to our shores, offering us in exchange for the produce thus liberally poured in upon us, the conveniences elegances and luxuries of foreign countries. Suppose every man desert his farm and betake himself to trading as the more easy and the more speedy road to wealth. There would certainly be great activity and great prosperity But would we be independent. One more supposition and the important and interesting problem is solved. Suppose the paths to the interior are suddenly blocked up by feuds among the tribes—all ingress cut off and trade suspended? Where then are our supplies? Would we be able to return to our farms and draw thence articles of exchange with foreign nations? By no means! In the mania for trade our farms have been deserted, and like the land on which an curse rests have long laid fallow. Think you fellow citizens that our trade once gone we would again behold the French, the Bremen, the American and English flag floating to the breeze in our harbor. From that hour you might bid a long adieu to every white face but that of a missionary. Fellow Citizens! our prosperity and independence are to be drawn from the soil. That is the high way to honor, to wealth, to private and national prosperity.

Liberians! do not disdain the humble occupation! It commends itself to our attention ennobled and sanctified by the example of our Creator. "And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man he had formed. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food. And the Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it, and to keep it." Never, never, until this degenerate age has this simple primitive patriarchal occupation been despised.

"In ancient times, the sacred plough employed
The kings and awful fathers of mankind:
And some, with whom compared your insect tribes
Are but the beings of a summer's day,
Have held the scale of empire, rul'd the storm
Of mighty war; then, with unwearied hand,
Disdaining little delicacies, seized
The plough, and greatly independent lived,"

Thus sings the author of the seasons, one of Briton's sweetest bards.

The last remark the time will allow me to make under this head, is, that "Righteousness exalteth a nation but sin is a reproach to any people." All attempts to correct the depravity of man, to stay the head-long propensity to vice—to abate the madness of ambition, will be found deplorably inefficient unless we apply the restrictions and the tremendous sanctions of religion. A profound regard and deference for religion—a constant recognition of our dependence upon God, and of our obligation and accountability to Him—an ever-present and ever-pressing sense of his universal and all controlling providence—this, and only this, can give energy to the arm of law, cool the raging fever of the passions and abate the lofty pretensions of mad ambition. In prosperity let us bring out our thank offering and present it with cheerful hearts in orderly, virtuous and religious conduct. In adversity let us consider—confess our sins, and abase ourselves before the throne of God. In danger let us go to Him, with the humility and confidence, which a deep conviction that the battle is not to the strong nor the race to the swift, is calculated to inspire,

Fellow Citizens! we stand now on ground never occupied by a people before—However insignificant we may regard ourselves, the eyes of Europe and America are upon us, as a germ destined to burst from its enclosure in the earth, unfold its petals to the genial air, rise to the height and swell to the dimensions of the fullgrown tree, or, (inglorious fate!) to shrivel, to die and be buried in oblivion. Rise fellow citizens! rise to a clear and full perception of your tremendous responsibilities!! Upon you, rely upon it, depends in a measure you can hardly conceive, the future desitny of your race. You, you are to give the answer, whether the African race is doomed to interminable degradation—a hidious blot upon the fair face of Creation, a libel upon the dignity of human nature, or capable to take an honorable rank amongst the great family of nations! The friends of the Colony are trembling—the enemies of the coloured man are hoping. Say fellow citizens! will you palsy the hands of your friends and sicken their hearts, and gladden the souls of your enemies by a base refusal to enter upon the career of glory which is now opening so propitiously before you? The genius of universal emancipation bending from her lofty seat invites you to accept the wreath of national independence. The voice of your friends swelling upon the breeze cries to you from afar: Raise your standard! assert your independence!! throw out your banners to the wind!! And will the descendants of the mighty Pharaohs that awed the world—Will the sons of him who drove back the serried legions of Rome and laid seige to the eternal city—Will they, the achievements of whose fathers are yet the wonder and admiration of the world—Will they refuse the proffered boon, and basely cling to the chains of slavery and dependence. Never! never!! never!!! Shades of the mighty dead!—spirits of departed great ones! inspire us; animate us to the task—nerve us for the battle! Pour into our bosom a portion of that ardor and patriotism which bore you on to battle to victory and to conquest.

Shall Liberia live. Yes; in the generous emotions now swelling in your bosoms—in the high and noble purpose now fixing itself in your mind, and ripening into the unyieldingness of indomitable principle we hear the inspiring response—Liberia shall live, before God, and before nations of the Earth.

The night is passing away—the dusky shades are fleeing, and even now

Jocund day stands tiptoe
On the misty mountain top."

SLAVES IN ANCIENT TIMES.

It is difficult for a modern to conceive the number of slaves that existed in the most populous Greek and Italian cities in former times. The city of Corinth, the most commercial and opulent of Greece' possessed within her walls forty-six myriads or four hundred and sixty thousand. When Demetrius Phalereus took a census of the population of Athens' free servile, and foreigners there were found twenty-one thousand citizens, ten thousand domicild foreigners, and no less than four hundred thonsoud slaves. Nicias had one thousand slaves whom he hired to work in the silver mines of Thrace at an obulous, or 1-2d.a day. Æginatæ, a trading people possessibg many ships but a very small territorial limit possessed according to Aristotle four hundred and seventy thousand. Some of the citizens of Dardanus possessed more than one thousaod slaves. Many Roman families had ten thousand or twenty thousand or even more and these were kept and maintained by them not always for gain but sometimes for mere show and attendance. Smindyridas, a native of Syberis a town celebrated for its voluptuousness and accomplished luxury took along with him when he went to his marriage, one thousand slaves as ministrants to him: some of them cooks, some poulterers, some fishers; &c. An immense number of slaves were maintained by the free inhabitants of Sicily; they frequently mutinied against heir masters, and threw the whole island into bloodshed and confusion; upwards of one hundred myriads are calculated to have there perished in these dreadful conflicts of emancipation. The servile warin Italy was equally destructive.

At one time one hundred and twenty thousand slaves were marching upon Rome' who were headed and directed by one Spartacus.' ar Thracian slave, who avenged the injured rihgts of nature upon his enslavers, and made the supremacy of Rome herself to totter under the force of his infuriated attacks. At the close of the servile war, no less than six thousand slaves were hanged up all the way from Rome to Capua. In Attica the slaves wrought at the mines with their feet shackled. The ancient Greeks were not served in their houses by bought slaves, the younger served the older. The city of Ephesus was founder by one thousand slaves who ran away from Samos. It is said that Julius Cæsar crossed into Britain with but three slaves officiating as servants, and it is a strange coincidence that his body was carried home by three servants from the Senate house where he was murdered. Cato was wont to ride from Rome to the country, in the most simple manner with but one slave sometimes no attendant at all—riding generally, with his valise under him for a saddle some what in the style of a modern decent Antiburgher minister.

SELE-GOVERNMENT

"He that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a cith."

It has been wisely ordered by the great Disposer of all things that man should possess certain appetites, which if properly restrained would give him energy of character, and greatly conduce to the happiness of the possessor. While, on the other hand if these are indulged and fostered, beyond their original disign' they will rise up like so many tormentors, to degrade and ruin those faculties which distinguish him from the brute.

It has been well said by the great heathen moralist, (Seneca') that "the sensual are dead while alive and their houses are so much their tombs; that one might write their epitaphs upon their doors."

Each one has power to exercise authority over his passions if he will. All desire happiness, but who can enjoy this great and desirable treasure when he writhes in vain under the iron grasp and stern cotrol of perverted passions.

Happiness may be gained' if reason judgment and conscience govern the passions, appetites and the soul. It would be easy indeed to be happy, if all within and about us was in accordance with our feelings and wishes.

But the ills of life are many. Misfortunes and disappointments are numerous and there is much to irritate and perplex us. Yet by proper self-control, the most unever temperaments may gain the ascendency over themselves and never yield to unhappiness and gloom. Self-control implies that we can govern our tongues.

What can be used for doing good or for perfecting mischief with more facility than the tongue? Nothing sounds more sweetly than the human voice when employed in giving instruction, in consoling grief or in persuading others to love virtue and be happy. On the other hand no sound falls more discordantly upon the ear than the voice of slander and abuse, of profanity and harsh invective. The tongue should never be used for evil speaking although it may deprive us of an opportunity to display fiine abilities and great sagacity in digesting human chatacter.

To have weight of character and influence among men, peace at home, and tranquility in our own breasts we must govern our actions thoughts and feeling. To make advancement in cultivating the mind—to be useful to those around us—to perform the great object of life and answer the great end of living, we must govern ourselves.

CONGREGATIONAL VIEWS OF ORDINATION.

We see by the Christian Secretary, that the address before the Clergy at Yale Commencement, was delivered on the 18th ult., by the Rev. James W. Woodward, of Columbia Ct. The theme, which had been assigned to him by the Congregational General Association of the State, was, "What is Ordination?" His text was Acts xiv. 23: "And when they had ordained them elders in every church," &c.

The correspondent of the Secretary gives the following account of the sermon, form which we may see the Congregationalist views of Ordination. At least we infer that Mr. Woodward's sentiments are to be taken as an exponent of the views of the body who assigned the theme. "The views of the preacher on the subject of Ordination were decidedly democratic and anti-prelatical. Ordination he contended consisted essentially, in an election by any particular church to the work of the ministry, Ordination technically and commonly so called, by the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery, was nothing more than a public induction to an office already conferred—same as in the case of induction to civil office—same for instance as in the inauguration of a President of the United States to an office already conferred upon him by the election of the people. The public induction ("Ordination commonly termed,) of the minister, was not essential to the validity of his office—without it he was validly a minister, and could with propriety perform ministerial functions—his election by the suffrages of the brotherhood, constituted his ordination. His induction to his office even ("Ordination" in common parlance by laying on of the hands of the Presbytery was to be considered an act of the church' or churches concerned in the act—they did it by their delegates chosen for the purpose—they (the church,) might with propriety do it by their own undelegated, act if they chose. The preasher quoted pretty largely from the New Testament, in support of his positions; even the vacancy in the Apostolate occasioned by the defection of Judas narrated in Acts 1st, was filled by popular election. Various other passages were referred to' Early Ecclesiastical History was also quoted as sustaining the views of the preacher."

These views correspond essentially with those held by very many of the Baptists of Great Britian. Robert Hall we see by John Foster's Correspondence was not ordained by imposition of hands.

From the Carolina Baptist.

DO YOU ATTEND THE PRAYER MEETING?

It has been said by one let me attend your social prayer meeting and I will tell you the state of religion in your church—tis true and he might have added in your heart also, Christians do ask how! Go to your prayer meeting in time of a revival; you will find the house filled you see all the members in attendance. If you get thereb*e*fore the services commence, do you find the brethren standing about the door talking *a*bout their farms or their merchandise or every thing else but religion? No!—Is the weather inclement? Do you hear them say I am fearful it will rain or the ground is damp cannot go to prayer meeting to-night! No! Does one say I can't go I am not gifted in prayer and brother A. will call on me to pry; or another, 'tis but a prayer meeting," and besides I have some little matters to attend to at home? No! Well what do you hear why before you get to the house you hear a song of praise sung by persons as though they felt what they were singing and perhaps you may distinguish the words—

'Tis religion that can give Sweetest pleasures while we live,
"Tis religion must supply
Solid comfort when we die."

Well now why do you find them "all with one accord in one place? There are several reasons one is they "love one another," "not in word neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth;" and they feel that they are brothers and sisters that they are children of the same Father—and another is that they go there expecting to meet their Father—another is that they go there expecting to meet their Father God and their elder brother Jesus Christ. He has told them He would be there where two or three are gathered together in my name there am I in the midst of them." Well, then God is there. We have many favors to ask Him there are many of our friends and neighbors and relatives who are exposed to His wrath, the community in which we live are raising their puny arms of rebellion against Him: the poor benighted heathen are to be converted; a world that lieth in iniquity is to be evangelised, and where O where is there a better place to ask these favors than to go where he has promised to be, but where are all these Christians when religion is in a less prosperous state? Is the house of prayer filled no no. You meet some few and all the rest make excuse. There appears to be no attraction there. But why is it that we are not always revived? Is God not the same yesterday, to-day and forever?" Is his ear heavy that He cannot hear, or His arm shortened that He cannot save?" Has He not said ask and ye shall receive? Are there no sinners to be converted? man of God have you nothing to do? O wake up to a sense of your duty, "be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." You may feel your unwosthiness your weakness. I trust we do feel that of ourselves we can do nothing but recollect, "God chose the weak things of this world to confound the wise. Paul says, "in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but of wood and of earth;" and all these vessels are useful in their place. It may be tha you and I cannot preach, but perhap we can exhort sinners to repentance, or not that we can pray in our closets and i the prayer meeting. God made us to d something, let us enquire, "Lord what wil thou have me to do? and do what your hand find to do with yourmight.

H

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. FEBRUARY 5. 1847

We are of the opinion that the Legislature at i late session committed an oversight in not providing fo an immediate more enlarged increase of the revenu We are disposed to make all due allowance for the d licate position in which the members were placed They were deliberating upon a subject on which a minds were anxious. And the opposers of independen found their chief argument in the burdensome taxatio which they alleged the sustenation of the measure woul require. In apparent forgetfulness that nothing gre or noble was ever accomplished without difficulty an sacrifice they satisfied themselves with this argument and with this argument frightened others. Anxious t defeat his argument, or to deprive it of all force, th independent party indulged a caution which we ar inclined to think excessive—and paused when they shou'd have proceeded steadily onward. That they saw the necessity of a more liberal provision for th wants of the government, is inferable from the additiona one per cent which they have levied on imports. If th trade of the current year be equal to that of the pas this will of course make an increase, but an increase n disproportional to the increase of the government's de mands for money that it is not to be named. We ar no advocate for a heavy and burdensome tariff Unde any circumstances its effect is demoralizing, and esp cially in our case would it be impolitic, because it woul be impossible with our limited commerce to devise tariff which would meet the necessary expenditures o the government. Still money must be provided, an what better time can be selected to provide the mean than the present?

That we cannot raise the necessary funds by any the ordinary means of import and excise all are agree still we cannot sustain a government without mone Extraordinary exigencies require extraordinary me sures—and as our condition is one wholly without paralel we cannot be regarded extravagant if we res to corresponding measures. As expedients are not y wholly exhausted, a measure should not be condemn because it is new. Novelty is no more a test of chara ter than antiquity—and every measure should be tri by its own merits and adaptation to the end for whi it was instituted. We do not therefore hesitate to su gest as the most feasible plan to raise a revenue th this government monopolize the sale of tobacco, pow and———. We will possibly subject ourself to t imputation of vanity if we put down here somethi like the outlines of a plan which our amor patriae h drawn in our heads; but we cann't help it and so he it is:

Let this government order from America one hu dred and fifty hogsheads of tobacco and a sufficie quantity of the other articles. Let these importatio be placed in proper receptacles in the different por in the charge of responsible persons appointed to rece them. Let them be sold in covenient quantities at advance of fifty per cent on the original cost. As so as this importation arrives, impose a duty of thirty th per cent on these articles imported for any other acco than for the government. We need not tell those our readers who have made themselves acquainted w the nature of our trade, that this measure would rea at once an amount sufficient for all the purpose government. It would do more. It would be trebly vantageous. First it would supply our traders with th articles at an average decrease in price of at least th three per cent. Secondly by furnishing them with a c stant supply and enabling them to make a larger pr it would also enable them to extend the range of th operations: Thirdly the revenue thus accruing to government would in a short time exceed the expe tures and would enable it to reduce the tariff on o articles.

The present is a most auspicious moment. The beria Packet is here and asking for purchasers. the government act, and take up at least one half of vessel and provide at once against the future.

No oil this season. Wherefore?

We ask our paying subscribers pardon for the p city of editorial in this number. There have been many good things brought here by the vessels, and have been so anxious to get some of them, and so l money to get them with, that we have been in a of constant wonderment. If any of our friends will so considerate as to give us a lift, in anyway, bating foot we will either write more or not none at all just as they may dictate. A full stomach and a warm back is the true secret of the currente calamo. Friends think of it.

Messrs. Brown and Roberts commissioners for the purchase of territory left this on the 25th inst. for the leeward.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

BETWEEN THE PRINCE AND THE POST."

THE Post speaks of a rumour that PRINCE ALBERT is desirous of the office of Commander in-Chief: the principal claim of his Royal Highness being, we presume, on his number of portraits as Field-Marshal. Certainly, no man has oftener had his sword drawn for the benefit of his country. The Post, however will not believe in this as we think, laudable ambition of the PRINCE CONSORT. No: the Post has a most intimate acquaintance with the Royal ALBERT'S thoughts and opinions:

"The Prince is not an ambitious man. He is satisfied—and he has good reason to be so—with domestic endearments."

Good reason to be satisfied! Of this pleasing fact the Post is, of course, well assured. Its habits of intimacy with the illustrious couple renders it an undoubted authority. The Prince, according to the same source is also satisfied—

"With the position he so deservedly holds as the liberal Mœcenas of the Fine Arts!"

If this be really true then is his Royal Highness the most easily satisfied Prince we ever heard or read of. He is moreover satisfied—

With the pleasure he must derive from giving a laudable example to English country gentlemen as a master of hounds and to English agriculturists as a successful breeder!!

And therefore it is likely that the Prince blessed as he is with placens uxor; with the profound gratitude and high admiration of all professors of the arts; with the treasures of his kennel; and his prizes at the cattle-show—is it likely that he would forego the true glory associated with these things for the noisy, vapid honours of the Horse Guards? The DUKE OF WELLINGTON has a hundred orders and medals commemorative of victories bought with human blood: but what are they to the medals distributed at the Bazaar, significant of the triumphs of oil-cake mangel-wurzel, and good swedes.

RALLWAY SCALE OF MANNERS.

WE have often been struck with the difference of manner assumed by rail way officials towards different people. Shut your eyes and you can tell from the tone of their voices whom they are addressing. The following examples will best illustrate our meaning. The Railway Potentate is calling upon the passengers to get their tickets ready. —He calls:—

To the Third Class.—Fortissime.—"Tickets, tickets, come get your tickets ready."

To the Second Class.—Forte.—"Tickets Gents.; get your tickets ready, Gents."

To the First Class.—Piano.—"Get your tickets ready, Gentlemen if you please, tickets ready if you please, Gentlemen, Shame!

A LETTER from Naples says," the Emperor of Russia is expected here. The beggars and pickpockets are all in prison to be carefully kept there till his visit is over." Perhaps it is well enough to imprison the beggars, but we do not see why the thieves should be denied a sight of their Imperial brother,—the Pickpocket of Poland.

A Capital Spec.

A GREAT deal of money might be made by taking extensive premises in the City as soup-rooms and selling nothing but the Norfolk soup at twopence a basin. A pinch of curry costs about a farthing and as hot water may be had for almost nothing the profit on every basin of the Norfolk Soup would be at least 150 per cent. This seems a more promising undertaking just now than even the Railways.

SOMETHING ABOUT LAW.

UNCERTAINTY OF THE LAW.—A man falls into a dispute with his neighbor runs to his counsel, tells his story in his own way, forgets those facts which are against him—relates the rest with that sort of exaggeration which is natural to a party —undertakes to prove the whole case just as he has stated it and asks for legal redress. After such an examination, a suit is instituted, the trial comes on, the plaintiff's witnesses are heard, they reduce in a great degree, the coloring which the party himself had given; the defendant's witnesses prove many new facts, which totally change the complexion of the case,—it is decided in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff ever after complains of—uncertainty of law.

ADVICE.—In law, as in physic, it may be observed that prevention is better than the risk of cure. The preceding remarks of the "Uncertainty of the law," are full of instruction, and point out the risk, beside the certain expense, delay, loss of time, vexation, ill feeling and trouble of law-suits which in every shape or form should be avoided. "Agree with thine adversary quickly;" do so even at a sacrifice, being assured that the intricacies of the law, with its twistings and turnings; of its precedents innumerable; decisions contradictory; its nice technicalities, forms, and mysteries, are all inexhaustible and incomprehensible, and combine, too frequently, to render law an overmatch for plain honesty and simple justice.

If differences arise, and a reference must be made to others, let it be to mutual friends—to disinterested persons selected by both parties, and make up your minds to abide the result.

THE POWER OF THE PRESS.—In the year 1272, the wages of a laboring man were just three half pence per day; and at the same period, the price of a Bible fairly written out was £30 sterling. Of course a common laborer in those days, could not have procured a Bible with less than the entire earnings of thirteen years! Now, a beautiful printed copy of the same book can be purchased with the earnings of one day.

Take another view of the subject. An ordinary clerk cannot make a fair manuscript copy of the Bible in less than three months. With a common printing press, work equivalent to printing a copy of the whole Bible, can be done in ten minutes; and with a steam press of the most improved construction, the same work can be done in three minutes.

PHILOSOPHICAL SPIRIT.—And thus have I declared my private and probable conceptions in the inquiry of this truth; but the certainty hereof let the arithmetic of the last day determine, and therefore expect no further belief than probability and reason induse; only desire that men would not swallow dubiosities for certainties, and receive as principles points mainly controvertible, for we are to adhere to things doubtful in a dubious and opinionative way; it being reasonable for every man to vary his opinion according to the variance of his reason, and to affirm one day what he denied another, wherein, although at last we miss of truth, we die notwithstanding in harmless and inoffensive errors, because we adhere unto that whereunto the examinings of our reasons and honest inquiries induce us—Sir T. Browne.

MOUNTAINS OF LEBENON.—The country at that point is of the most picturesque description, alternately covered with the mulberry, the fig and the vine, and in greater luxuriance than is to be met with in the lower tract. Although now on the height of the first range, you are, to all appearance, walled in with other hills, whilst around you extend undulating valleys, broken here and there with minor eminences. The lofty irradd, or locust tree, and the olive, with its deep dark tint, were both seen diversifying the picture. Far above all, in the eastern horizon, is the wedge-shaped mountain of the Scinneen—lofty, bold and rugged—a sterile contrast to the beautiful vegetation which surrounds it—Hunter's Expedition in Syria.

POWER OF INDUSTRY.—It was a beautiful expression of a Chinese sage, that by time and industry, a mulberry leaf becomes a silk shawl. If the following statement be correct, it affords a still more striking proof of what human ingenuity can accomplish. In the manufacture of steel, and article may be raised from one half penny to 35,000 geineas! A pound of crude iron costs one half penny; it is converted into steel, that steel into watch springs, every one of which is sold for half a guinea, and weighs only the 10th of a grain; after deducting for waste, there are in a pound weight 7,000 grains. It therefore affords steel for 70,000 watch springs, the value of which, at a half guinea each, is 35,000 guineas.

ALLEGORY.—Every flie, and every pebble and and every flower, are tutors in the great school of nature to instruct the mind and improve the heart. The four elements are the four volumes, in which all her works are written.

Every man has, in his own life, follies enough—in his own mind, troubles enough—in the performance of his duties, deficiences enough—in his own fortune, evils enough—without being curious after the affairs of others.

ADVANTAGES OF INDUSTRY.—I heard the hammer of a mechanic that owes me at four o'clock this morning. I'll trust him till April.

I saw another, yesterday afternoon, who has plenty of work on hand, lounging at the corner. I'll have him before the squire next week.

A HINT.—It is not the money earned that makes a man wealthy so much as what he saves from his earnings. A good and prudent husband makes a deposite of the fruits of his labor with his best friend, and if that friend be not true to him what has he to hope? If he dare not place confidence in the companion of his bosom where is he to place it! A wife acts not for herself only, but she is the agent of many she loves, and she is bound to act for their good not for her own gratification. Her husband's good is the end to which she should aim—his approbation and love is her reward.

A young woman never looks so interesting, as when at her devotion, a mother never so well as when nursing and admiring her first born, a son never so well as when in the discharge of an act of filial kindness; and a father never better than when he gives proof of his love for the wife of his bosom. So says the N. O. Picayune.

THE SUBLIME.—Lopez de Vega, describing an afflicted shepherdess in one of his pastorals, who is represented weeping near; the sea side says—"The sea joyfully advanced to meet her tears and that basing enclosed them in shells, it converts them into pearls."

MURDER.—A New Plea.—A person charged with murder was tried and acquitted at the late term of the Macoupin Circuit Court. The circumstances attending the killing as related to us, should have left no doubt but that it was murder. The counsel for the prisoner assumed however on the trial, that there were some individuals in every community, who ought to be killed, and that the unfortunate man who had been murdered belonged to that class. If this new doctrine, in regard to murder is to prevail, (and it seems to have had the sanction of a Macoupin jury,) it will entirely eclipse the fashionable plea of insanity which prevails so extensively down east." [Griggsville (Ill.) Free Press.

ORIGIN OF THE CAP OF LIBERTY.—In former ages old age was honorable caps become emblems of honors. By degrees it became the badge of freedom for none were deemed honorable who were not free, and when a slave was made a freeman he had a cap given to him which he was permitted to wear in public. The Pilus or Cap of Liberty, was simple in its form in the shape of a sugar loaf bread at the base and ending in a cove. This prefigures that freedom stands on the broad basis of humanity, and runs up to a pyramid the emblem of eternity to show that it ought to last forever. It was simple for liberty is in itself the most shining ornament of man. It has none of the gilded trappings that make the livery of despotism. The Cap of liberty was white, the native color of the undying, showing that it should be untainted by faction or tyranny.

A GOOD RULE.—Lord Erskine was distinguished through life for independence of principle for his scrupulous abhorence to the truth. He once explained the rules of his conduct which ought to be deeply engraven on every heart. He said, "it was a first command and counsel of my early youth, always to do what my conscience told me to be a duty and leave the consepuence with God. I shall carry with me the memory, and I trust the practise, of this paternal lesson to the grave. I have hitherto followed it and have no reason to complain that my obedience to it has been a temporal sacrifice. I have found it on the contrary, the road to prosperity and wealth and shall point out the same path to my children for their support."

INTOLERANCE.—Being irreligious for the sake of religion and hating our fellow-creatures out of a pretended love of their Creator. Intolerance has more lives than a cat; you cannot even starve it to death. Deprive its right hand of its cunning by taking away the sword wherewith it smote infidels; its nostrils of the soul rejoicing odour of a roasting heretic; its ears of the delightful groans of imprisoned or tormented non-conformists its heart of what it best loved in Corporation and Test Acts and Catholic disabities it will still pick up its crumbs of comfort and contrive to subsist upon the remaining modicum of religious pains and penalties or of legal punishments for the freedom of obinion. And while thus employed the fiend Intolerance boasts of her godlike qualities and especially of her marvellous liberality. Supported by jails and judges she employs the sword of law (not justice) to clip the wings of thought and then complacently exclaims to her mutilated victim—Behold! you are free as the air—you may fly whithersoever you please who so liberal so generous so tolerant as I?"

IVY.—A vegetable corruptionist which for the purpose of its own support attaches itself with the greatest tenacity to that which is the most antiquated and untenable and the fullest of holes flaws and imperfections.

INQUISITIVENESS.—An itch for prying into other people's affairs to the neglect of our own:—an ignorant hankering after all such knowledge as is not worth knowing;—a curiosity to learn things that are not at all curious. People of this stamp would rather be put to the question than not ask questions! silence is torture to them. A genuine quidnune prefers false news to none he piques himself upon having the very first information of things that never happened. It is supposed that the Americians have attanined the greatest art in parrying inquisitiveness because they are more exposed to it; but a well-known civic wag, at a late period of political excitement maintained a defensive colloquy with a restic inquisitive which could hardly have been excelled by any Transatlantic performer. In travelling post he was obliged to stop at a village to replace a horse's shoe when the Paul Pry of the place bustled up to the carriage window and without waiting for the ceremony of introduction exclaimed—"Good morning Sir!—horse cast a shoe, I see—I suppose, Sir you be going to—" Here he paused expecting the name of the place ot be supplied; but the citizen answered—"You are quite right, Sir; I generally go there at this season." "Ay—hum—do ye?—and no doubt you be come now from ..."—"Right again, Sir; I live there" "Oh, ay, do ye But I see it be a London shay? pray, Sir, is there any thing stirring in London?" "Yes; plenty of other chaises, and carriages of all sorts." "Ay, ay of course; but what do folks say?" "Their prayers every Sunday." "That, is not what I mean; I wish to know whether there is anything new and fesh?" "Yes bread and herirngs." "Anan you be a queer chap. Pray Muster, may I ask your name?" "Fools and clowns call me muster, but I am in reality one of the froge of Aristophanes and my genuine name is Brekekekex Koax. Drive on postil ion."

SYMPATHY.—Let no man despise the unfortunate poor and wretched. Earth has ills to which all are heir, and no man can tell how soon he may be put in possession of the common legacy. Rather let us symqathize with, then despise the unfortunate of out race Sustaining such relations and cherishing such sentiments gives an earnest of humility, benevolence and charity weich are at once ennobling to duman character. What man who has a brave and true heart cannot shed, for human ills, the sympathzing tear!

INSTINCTS, Human, Natual prejudices to reject the influence of which in the education of youth is itself one of the most unreasonable of prejudices. "Why should we scruple," asks Mrs Barbauld, "to lead a child to right opinions in the same way by which nature lead him to right practices; He may be left to find out that mustard will bite his tongue, but he must be prejudiced against tatebane."

JEALOUSY.—Tormenting yourself for fear should be tormented by another. "Why," asks Rochoucauld "does not jealousy which is born with love always die with it?" He would have found an answer to this question had he reflected that self-love ever dies. Jealousy is the greatest of misfortunes and excites the least pity.

Many children and youths spend the Sabbath in hunting fishing, or playing at marbles. Parents, God commands you Train up your children in the way they should go.

NOTICE.

The Subscriber by the assistance of friends having been enabled to commence business again, takes this opportunity to solicit a share of public patronage. As it is with him a fixed and unalterable purpose to pay off all his just debts—and not to avail himself of the lenity of the "Insolvent Act" and withhold from his creditors their just dues when it may be in his power to pay them, he especially asks commission business of them: as every cent of commission arising to him shall go to his credit. The subscriber has opened on Broad Street just opposite his residence. He will sell at a small profit—and his terms will be cash both in selling and in buying.

H. TRACE.

Monrovia }
Dec. 18*th* 1846. }

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30*th*, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	none
Beads, pound,	"	none
Beef, cargo No.	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Bafts,	Ps.	3 75
Bricks,	100	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	30
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	none
Cheese,	"	20
Corn meal,	Bbl	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	none
Cotton white,	Bale	16	18 18
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00
Guns,	Box	30 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	5 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	20
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00
Nails	100*lb*	8 00
Oil paint	Gallon	1 50
Oil palm	"	34
Pork	Bbl	16 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	none
Powder	Bll.	15 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter	"	3 00
Pipes gumbo	Box	none	20
Prints assorted	various	10	1 00
Romauls	Ps.	1 00
Salt	Ton	14 00
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 75
Tobacco	100*lbs*	0 00
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wines		5 00	8 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Jan. 26. Am. barque——Goldsmith master from windward.

" " Col. Sloop Perseverance, Jones master from leewad.

" 28. Col. Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, from leeward.

" 30. Col. sloop Nathan Bangs G. Ammons master, from leeward.

" " American Barque Liberia Packet Godmanson master, from Cape Palmas: Passengers, Dr. S. F. McGill, Rev. Mr. Burns, Mrs, Russwourm and

" 31. Am. Ship Modenna Lawlin master, from leeward.

Feb. 2. Am, Brig Margarett Ann,——from Grand Bassa: Passenger, Rev. A. D. williams.

DEPARTURES.

Jan. 25. Col. sloop Economy, Chase master, for leeward.

" " Col schooner Pedler, G. E. Carroll, master for leeward.

POETRY.

WE SHALL BE HAPPY YET.
BY MRS. JAMES GRAY.

FEAR not, beloved, though clouds may lower,
Whilst raninbow visions melt away,
Faith's holy star has still a power
That may the deepest midnight sway.
Fear not! I take a prophet's tone,
Our love can neither wane nor set;
My heart grows strong in trust—mine own,
We shall be happy yet!

What though long anxious years have passed,
Since this true heart was vowed to thine,
There comes, for us a light at last,
Whose beam upon our path shall shine.
We who have loved midst doubts and fears,
Yet never [with one hour's regret,
There comes a joy to gild our tears—
We shall be happy yet!

Ay, by the wandering birds, that find
A home beyond the mountain wave,
Though many a wave and storm combined
To bow them to an ocean grave—
By summer suns that brightly rise,
Though erst in mournful tears they set
By all love's hopeful prophecies,
We shall be happy yet!

N. Y. Tribune.

From the London Inquirer.

THE PRESS.

Written for the occasion of the opening of the Barker Steam Press.—By John Bowring, L L D. M. P.

Thoughts flit and flutter through the mind,
As o'er the waves the shifting wind;
Trackless and traceless is their flight.
As falling stars of yesternight,
Or the old tide-marks on the shore
Which other tides have rippled.
Yet art by genius train'd and taught
Arrests, records the fleeting thought,
Stamps on the minute or the hour
A lasting and eternal power,
And to mind's passing shadows gives
An influence that forever lives.

But mightiest of the mighty means
On which the arm of progress leans,
Man's noblest mission to advance,
His woes assuage his weal enhance,
His rights enforce, his wrongs redress,
MIGHTIEST OF MIGHTY IS THE PRESS

MISCELLANEOUS

From Punch

A LETTER FROM "JEAMES, OF BUCKLEY SQUARE."

SIR Albany, Letter X. August 10, 1845.

"HAS a regular suscriber to your emusing paper, I beg leaf to state that I should never have done so had I supposed that it was your abbit to igspose the mistaries of privit life, and to hinjer the delligit feelings of umble individyouals like myself who have no ideer of being made the subject of newspaper criticism.

"I elude, Sir, to the unjustafiable use which has been made of my name in your Journal, where both my muccantile speculations and the hinmost pashan of my art have been brot forrards in a ridicklus way for the public emusement.

"What call, Sir, has the public to inquire into the suckmstansies of my engagements with MISS MARY HANN OGGINS, or to meddle with their rupsher? Why am I to be maid the hobjick of your redicule in a doggril ballit impewted to her! I say impewted because in my time at least MARY HANN could only sign her † mark (has I've hoften witnist it for her when she paid his at the Savings Bank) and has for sacrificing to the Mewes and making poatry she was as hincapible as MR. WAKLEY himself.

"With respect to the ballit, my baleaf is that it is wrote by a footman in a low famly a pore retch who attempted to rivle me in my affections to MARY HANN—a feller not five foot six and with no more calves to his legs than a donkey—who was always a ritin (having been a doctors boy) and who I nockt down with a pint of porter (as he well recklex) at the 3 Tuns Jerming Street for daring to try to make a but of me. He has signed MISS H's name to his nonsince and lies: and you lay yourself hopen to a haction for libl for insutting them in your paper.

"It is false that I have treated MISS H. hiill in hany way. That I borrowed 20lb of her is trew. But she confeses I paid it back. Can hall people say as much of the money they've lent or borrowed? No. And I not only paid it back; but giv her the andsomest pres'nts which I never should have eluded to but for this attack. Fust, a silver thimble, (which I found in Missu's work-box) seckud, a vollom of BYROM'S poems: third I halways brought her a glas of Curasore when we ad a party of which she was remarkable foud. I treated her to HASHLEY'S twice; (and halways a srimp or a hoyster by the way,) and a thousnd deligit attentions which I sapose count for nothink. 'Has for marridge. Haltered suckmstancies rendered it himpossable. I was gone into a new spear of life—mingling with my native aristoxy. I breathe no sallible of blame aginst Miss H. but his a hilliterit cowkmaid fit to set at a fashnable table? Do young fellers of rank genrally marry out of the Kitching! If we cast our i's upon a low-born gal, I needn say its only a tempory distraction pore passy lo tong. So much for her claims upon mo. Has for that beest of a Doctor's boy, he's unwuthy the notas of a Gentleman.

"That I've one thirty thousand lb, and praps mors I dont deny. Ow much has the Kilossus of Railreods one I should like to know, and what was his cappitle? I hentered the market with 20lb specklated Jewdicious, and ham what I ham. So may you be (if you have 20lb, and praps you haven't)—So may you be: if you choose to go in & win.

"I for my part am jusly prowd of my suxess and could give you a hundred instances of my gratatude. For igsample, the fust pair of hosses I bought (and a better pare of steppers I dafy you to see in hany curracle,) I crisn'd Hull and Selby in grateful elusion to my transackshns in that railroad. My riding Cob I called very unhaptly my Dublin and Galway. He came down with me the other day and I've jest sold him at discount.

"At fust with prudence and modration I only kep two grooms for my stables one of whom lickwise waited on me at table. I have now a confidenshle servant, vally de shamber—He surls my air; inspex my accounts and hansers my hinvitations to dinner I call this Vally my Trent Vally for it was the prophit I got from that exlent line, which injuiced me to ingage him.

"Besides my North British plate and breakfast equipidge—I have two handson suvvices for dinner—the goold plate for Sundays, and the silver for common use. When I ave a great party, 'Trent,' I say to my man,' we will have the London and Bumminghan plate to day (the goold), or else the Manchester and Leeds (the silver) I bought them after realizing on the abuf liues and if people suppose that the companys made me a present of the plate, how can I help it?

"In the sam way I say, 'Trent, bring us a bottle of Bristol and Hexeter!, or 'Put some Heastern Counties in hice!' He knows what I mean: it's the wines I bought upon the hospicious tummination of my connexshn with those two railroads.

"So strong indeed as this abbit become that being asked to stand Godfather to the youngest MISS DIDDLE last weak, I had her christened (provisionaly) Rosamell—from the French line of which I am Director & only the other day, finding myself rayther unwell, 'Doctor,' says I to SIR JEAMES CLARK, 'I've sent to consult you because my Midlands are out of horder; and I want you to send them up to a premium. The Doctor lafd and I beleave told the story subsquintly at Buckinum P--ll—s

"But I will troubleyou no father. My sole objict in writing has been to clear my carrater—to show that I came by my money in a honrable way: that I'm not ashaymd of the manner in which I gayned it and ham indeed grateful for my good fortune.

"To conclude, I have ad my podigree maid out at the Erald Hoffis (I don't mean the Morning Erald,) and have took for my arms a Stagg. You are corrict in stating that I am of hancient Normin famly. This is more then peal can say, to whomb I applied for a barnetcy but the primmier being of low igstraction, natrally stickles for his herder. Consurvative though I be I may change my opinions before the next Election when I inted to hoffer myself as a Candydick for Parlymint.

"Meanwild, I have the honor to be Sir,
"Your most obeajnt Survnt,
"FITZ-JAMES DE LA PLUCHE."

THE MANDARIN AND THE ENGLISH LADY.—The degraded position of the females in China is well known. Nothing astonishes the Chinamen who visit our merchants at Hong-kong so much as the deference which is paid by our countrymen to their ladies, and the position which the latter are permitted to hold in society. The very servants express their disgust at seeing our ladies permitted to sit at table with their lords, and wonder how men can so far forget their dignity. A young English merchant recently took his youthful wife with him to Hong-kong where the couple were visited by a wealthy mandarin. The latter regarded the lady attentively and seemed to dwell with delight on her movements. When she at length left the apartment, he said to the husband in his imperfect English, "What you give for that wifey wife your?" "Oh," replied the husband, laughing at the singular error of his visitor "2,000 dollors. This our meechant thought would appear to the Chinese rather a high figure, but he was mistaken. "Well," said the mandarin taking out his book with an air of business, "spose you give her to me I give you 5,000 dollars." It is difficult to say whether the young merchant was more amaed or amused, but the grave air of the the Chinaman convinced him that he was in earnest and he was compelled thefore, to refuse the offer with as much placidity as he could assume. The mandarin was however, pressing and went as high as 7,000 dollars. The merchant who had no previous notion of the value of the commodity which he had taken out with him was compelled at length to declare that Englshmen never sold their wives after the once came into their possesion, and assertion which the Chinaman was slow to believe. The merchant afterwards had a hearty laugh with his young wife, when he told her that ha had just discovered her full value, as the mandarin had offered him 7,000 pollars for her.—Liverpool Albion.

From the Carolina Baptist.

THE INTERCESSION OF CHRIST.

There is nothing that affords the belle ever a more lively satisfaction than the glorious assurance that "if he sin he has an advocate with the Father, Jesus Chsist the righteous."—When led astray by some easily heseting sin," he losese all sense of the presence of his God nor longer sees through the dark intervenining cloud, the cheering light of that countenance, which flings into ecstacy the tenants of a brighter and a purer world: "who can minister to his mind diseased or pluck the rooted sorrow from his soul?" What charmer can charm so wisely and so sweetly as to will his troubled conscience to rest? What magic voice can speak back the black surges of despair which rising like mountains and fearfully setting in upon him seem about to engulf him forever in some horrible abyss? What power can gild the summits of those surges with the beams of hope and kindle again within his heart all-broken and sad from the gloomy realization the smallest expectation of a happy future? He lifts his eyes above, but the "heaven seems like molten brass." No soft breathing of the spirit awake his sorrowing soul to a consciousness of the presence of his "first love. His cry is "O that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away and be at rest.,' Panting for his highest, but forsaken good gladly would he "return from whence he has fallen,' but an impentrable darkness envelopes him and he knows not where to go. Above all he would escape from himself.

"Me miserable which way shall I fly!
Which way I fly is hell, myself am hell,
And in the lowest deep a lower deep
Still threatening to devour me opens wide,
To which the hell I suffer, seems a heaven."

The language of his spirit unceasingly is "Oh that I knew where I might find that I might come even to his seat! I would order my cause before him and fill my mouth with arguments." He goes "forward but he is not there and backward but he cannot perceive him." Something tells him of "a throne of grace," he falls upon his knees and prays "O thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth." But from "the clouds and darkness which are about that throne," not a single ray of light streams down upon his mind. No "still small voice', is heard "from the secret place of thunder" whispering in softest accents "Peace." "Unsatisfied and unjust" he ceases to pray, in fact, he "knows not what he should pray for as he ought." He longs to make his requests known unto God but he can find no language adequate to convey his feelings and his wants. His heart is overwhelmed with grief within him now comes the Spirit to help his infirmities and make intercessions for him with groanings which cannot be uttered. Sighs and tears are even the language of contrition. The woe of a wounded spirit, is unalterable. When the spirit is poured upon him as the spirit of grace and of supplications, "it takes of the things that are of Christ's and shows them unto him," then 'he looks upon him, whom he has peirced," as his only 'advocate with the Father." He hears that advocate saying "I am the way" "no man cometh to the Father but by me" and teeming in humble condence to him says "save lord or I perish."—This high Peiest pleads for him at his Father's throne and for the sake of his Son, the Father similes upon the wanderer returned.

The question might be asked for whom does Christ intercede? The answer is plain. Only for his disciples. He cannot or rather does not pray for those who will be lost because all for whom he pray must and will be saved. It is said, that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much;" but what mere man however righteous can pray as effectually and fervently as 'the man without sin," the well beloved Son of God?" If "Elias a man subject to like passions as we are could shut and open heaven by the energy of prayer, shall not "He that openeth and no man shutteth and shutteth and man openeth," prevail to fling open the gates of the heavenly Zion to all for whom he shows his wounded hand feet, and side? Most undoubtedly. Teen they alone will be refused admittance within those golden gates for whom no voice of intercession is heard in the celestial court.

In his epistle to the *He*brews, the *A*postle says "but this man because he continueth ever hath an unchangeable priesthood. Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost their come unto God by him seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." It is perfectly evident from the passage that he intercedes only for those who come unto God by him. i. e. his disciple—and that they are saved to the uttermost or their salvation is rendered sure and perfect by his intercession. But the finally lost do not come unto God by him therefore he does not intercede for the finally lost. In that prayer of prayers, uttered by himself he says; "I pray not for the world (those who will not be my disciples) but for them which thou hast given me." Le no one say then that he ploads for any who will finally perish— for this is to say that they will perish in spite of his prayers for their salvation. Besides the promulgation of such a doctrine would be fraught with the most terrible consequences. The uncouverted would rely upon the supposed intercession of Christ for them and fail to plead for themselves. *In*stead of this they must be told that if they would have the great "High Priest of our profession," interceding for them they must come unto God by him. If they fail to do this they will have no claim whatever to the prevailing intercession of the long desired days-man of Job, and then no voice of sweet earnest supplication will ever ascend like grateful incense before the throne of heaven's eternal King.

PAUL.

HUSBAND.—The etymology of this word may not be generally known. The head of a family is called husband from the fact that he is or ought to be the band which unites the house together, or the bond of union among the family. It is to be regretted that all husbands are not house bands in reality as well as in name.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) FEBRUARY 19 1847. NO. 9

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on he first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months TWO DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY,
Cape Palmas	Dr J. F. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. CORFINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

THE ROMANCE OF FACT.

BY CHARLES HOOTON

—"Such wonders magic art
Can work, when love conspires and plays his part."

That love is fiercer than death and deeper than the grave we have high authority for believing; and every good man's and woman's heart bears living testimony within its own recesses that the authority is to be relied on. So it was in the beginning, has ever been, and will continue to the end. Love has done more than hate, and affection achieved what malice never could have prompted.

Amongst the rest of Love's achievements, gentle reader, is one of which probably you never before have heard, although it is matter of local history, and in its affect has been at once the cause of wealth to thousands, of employment to millions, and of comfort and elegance amongst half the nations of the earth.

During the latter part of the sixteenth century—it might be about the year fifteen hundred and eighty—one Master William Lee, the son of a comfortable yeoman who resided upon his own small estate in a village named Woodborough, in the county of Nottingham chanced—as youngmen generally chance—to fall in love with an irresistible maiden of the same place, whose eye hitherto, had never rested on man with aught of heed and whose realm of pleasant dreams had yet preserved itself from the invasion of those conquering images which overclimb the parapets of the affections and, amidst tender tumult, struggle to take the grand citadel of the heart into their own possession, and to keep it for ever after.

Master Lee had been studyiug at Cambridge where he gained his degree of master of arts and with that honour still blooming freshly upon him, he returned to the leafy seclusion of woodborough—to hide his candle of knowledge under the great bushel of surrounding ignorance—to inherit his paternal estate whenever Providence so should will it, and in a word to bury himself, as it were alive during the remainder of his days.

This period he deemed highly favorable to the pursuit of his love for Maud Thoresby but Maud was very cold and very discreet and remarkably industrious—attentive almost to a miracle. It was matter for admiration to every body except Master William to see her fingers perform such rapid evolutions with the knittingneedles that their course could not be traced with the eye, while that appeared only a labyrinth and confusion of movements, which was in fact the perfection of regularity and order, obscured from sight by its own speed.

Then Maud had a small flock of younglings around her the children of the neighboring hinds whom she gratuitously instructed in the same useful art and these also; to Master William's additional annoyance, contributed not a little to keep Maud engaged otherwise than he would have had her. Between the two, her own devoted love of knitting and her supposed duty towards her voluntarily selected pupils Maud appeared to be absolutely separated from Master William even when in his presence. So far to detach her from her work as to obtain an hour's ramble in the fields and woods was the work of as much and as powerful oratory as in, earlier times, would have been considered needful to convince a Senate, and even when persuasion had effected its end, and Maud's pretty feet pressed down the elastic grass as she walked too listlessly beside Master Lee, her principal thought appeared to be, "How long by the clock would it take them to get back again?"

"By my word Dame Maud:" exclaimed William though thou'rt a lady born Time seemeth thy tyrant and the sun thy ruling necessity. Canst thou see nothing in these fields pleasanter to look on than that endless woollen thread?,'

"I grant thee it is much pleasanter, Master Lee," said Maud "but not so useful; an, sad prayers should I say at night if my day-work be not done and done bravely also."

"True and savoring of a good conscience rejoined William, "but thou sparest too little time for other things"

"What other things Master William? There are no other things that I wot of, worth an hour's expenditure and it is no task of mine to learn clerkeraft like thee."

"But thou art made beautiful, Maud and mete learn to show some favor to them that think so; or else thou'lt go on knitting and knitting till by'r lady! the time may come that thou'lt never thyself be knit to anybody!"

"An, thou talkest so wildly Master William, I shall hold my time worse than misspent and go back without more parley to my needles."

"Then I tell thee truly, Dame Maud that if thy needles are to swallow like leviathan all thy time and occupy all thy thoughts, and leave not sixty minutes change, by the dial for thyself—"

"What wilt thou do brave William? Wilt thou handle the wires thyself, my pretty coxcomb and make up for all the wasted time thou hast caused in idle prate and dilly-dally-ing foolishness? Wilt be here enough to earn me as much as thou hast lost me, or wilt make hose out of paper with a pair of scissors?

"I will spoil thy knitting" rejoined Master Lee, in a firm deep-meaning voice; I will bring down ruin upon all that follow thy handicraft!"

Maud started suddenly from his side and turned pale, as she heard those solemn words for she comprehended not their full and true intent, but seemed, in some undefined manner, some mysterious way, inexplicable to herself, to be impressed with the idea that her would be lover did meditate violence and mischief to all the practisers of the knitting art, who might ever come within his reach.

"Fear thee nothing Maud," said William, smiling, I threaten no laying on of hands or cudgels, but only to spoil thy knitting by making it not worth thy while to waste thy time so any longer."

"Waste time in knitting!—waste!-waste!" exclaimed Maud; "verily, Master Lee, either thy cobwebs in the college or this fond stuff thou call'st love, has loosened a tile of thy head, and laid thee open to be moonstruck."

"Not so good Maud Thoresby. I am sane, and calm, and sensible as thou art. But I fain would strike a bargain with thee, before we part this afternoon. Thou knowest I have loved thee long in honourable fashion, and have one of the prettiest homesteads in woodborough to mine inheritance. My father, alas! is not like to be immortal, and as yet, I am but in the green and pithy texture of my manhood. I would like to see thy slender fingers practising a more gentle craft than this rude iron and woollen work—touching a picture of flowers, or asking harmony from some lady's proper instrument. And besides, thou art too much devoted to this boor's work. The bargain I would make with thee is this. 'If, in two years to come, I can devise, out of my brain a cunning engine to weave more hose in one day than all thy dexterity can produce in a week, wilt thou have me to thy husband?"

"Oh pray you Master Lee, speak no more folly this day, for I fear me thou art going raging mad. Prithee divert thyself by whittling a walking stick out of the rough black-thorn in thy hand, or else go and gather birds nests, and teach ravens to cry Ralph, Ralph! But do not trouble me with thy fantastical fool dreams about husbands. I'll none of your husbands not I. Especially husbands that can devise such jugglerics as engines with more skill than men and women. They are devil's devices and I much dread that thou hast kept strange company in the gloom and mystery of college."

"Then thou refusest me Maud Thoresby?

"It were hard indeed, replied Maud archly, "when I am expected to [illegible] What I will, or what I will not do, two years is a long time, and even now I sometimes know not my own mind for a week together."

"Thank thee for that speech," said Williams; "half a pitcher full is better than a dry bottom, and there is hope in doubts if none in flat denials. I shall at once about my engine and trouble thee no more Maud, until it is done, than just to ask at the door how thy health is or perchance listen behind the orchard sometimes to hear if I can overhear thee singing."

These last words were spoken in a mournful tone that touched the daughter of Thoresby's heart more nearly than all else that Master Lee had said.

"Then thy project is to return to Cambridge to do it?" asked Maud with a sigh.

"Not so, sweet Maud," rejoined William "I have a workshop in my father's house where I often disport myself in the practice of mechanical inventions. They delight me more than the Latin of the Fathers or that species of wit called poesie in the which I am no adept."

"I bethought me that was thy meaning added, Maud referring to her half intentional misapprehension of his return to Cambridge inasmuch as thou seem'st to speak as though about to take thy leave for two years.

"Only to retire into my workshop and avoid future offence by wasting thy time and hindering the knitting of which thou art so fond."

"Fairly spoken Master Lee and a praiseworthy purpose. But not the most dexterous can ply the needles at all times; and knitting neither prevents us from using our eyes for other purposes, nor hinders other people from looking at us if they so please. Now I can work in the dark as well as in daylight; besides, dost purpose to quit thy devotions at church? I hope not, I would not omit going to church for all the engines that either thou or satan could devise."

"Nor I good Maud for our seats are in perfect view one of the other."

"Shame on thee Master Lee! So that is thy devotion is it? that is thy—"

And by'r lady! very sincere devotion too, May I pay it three times o'Sunday and as often in the week as Maud Thoresby goes to prayers!"

Oh fie, fie, Master William! If this looseness comes of going to college and devising engines better hadst thou stayed at Woodborough and hobbled behind a plough all the days of thy life! There, go now; take leave of me and let me never hear nor see thee again, untill thou art rightly sober minded and can'st talk with becoming propriety of holy things."

The two years wore away, but Master William Lee did not go to demand the hand of Maud Thoresby, for the device of the knitting engine still remained in a sore state of embryotic embarrassment although the yet distant light of its completion and birth was visible—if to no other eyes—at least to those of its far-seeing inventor. He knew if could be perfected although at present he did not know how But he thought of Maud and again devised, and tried and schemed and schemed again—only again and again to fail.

The worst of it was, that Maud had now arrived at the age of twenty; and become such a remarkably perfect rustic beauty that she was in a manner besieged by lovers of one grade or other, so that, though she had resigned herself to none, yet, all combined, they distracted her mind from the toiling and seldom seen Master William; and he and his knitting machine rapidly dimmed off together into the mists of the forgetting and forgotten past

"In sooth a brave conceit of Master Lee's" whispered a wealthy gallant to the fair Maud one day, as he gathered tempting apples for her in her father's orahard "fine as is Mistress Maud should wait for such a mechanical clerk as he; and deny all matches, how high soever because he has not finished his ridiculous engine! Thou mayst wait thy life long, fair lady and go to thy grave as thou came out of the cradle, if this unfinished dream and bauble of a scheming dolt is to stand between thee and marriage. I should scorn the arrogance of the knave if he had asked a sister of mine such a monstrous pledge. His devices will most likely bring himself to ruin: as such like cunning always does, and should the unnatural fools that rashly engage therein. And then, Mistress Maud, what wilt thou have gained by thy heartaches and thy hopes deferred, and thy waiting."

I protest thy speech is unpleasant to me, replied Maud "and not becoming a worthy gentleman. Master William is no dolt but a learned clerk, and one that carries more wit than all the gentles in woodborough were they kneaded together. No favour of mine can be won by speaking slightingly of Master Lee."

Nay I cry thee pardon! Speak frothily of Master Lee's ability? His asking of pledges and vows, his hanging thy happiness on the idle chance of his skill producing a knitting engine—a thing unheard of in the the world before—it is that, Mistress Thoresby with respect be it spoken, that I raise this protestation against."

Like many other beauties Maud Thoresby was almost all outside: she could see ability but could not appreciate it, and especially when as in the present case it happened apparently to stand somewhat in opposition to that first grand object which alone the shallow multitude can value—living and making a show in the little time world, of which their own existences from so small a divisible proportion.

So it is not to be marvelled at, that within three months from the occurrence of this little colloquy Master William Lee beheld one fine Sunday morning, as he was going to church to hear the sermon and see Mistress Maud Thoresby kneeling in her seat—it is no matter for wonder, be it again said, that instead, he should behold the said flighty young lady walking up the pathway before him, arm-in-arm with the gay gallamt his rival, Master Hugh Monks the richest yeoman in woodborough.

Master William just then felt as though he could have cast his half-formed knitting engine into the fire and then laid himself down upon one of the green graves that rose up invitingly above the common level before his eyes but enter into church he could not. So he hurried back home and into his workshop. He looked at the imperfect labor of almost three years he called to mind the very day and hour when it began the identical words which had first put the notion in his head the thought of Maud Thoresby and then he sat down and covered his face with his hands.

It was a bitter hour—or it might be two—that he then passed; for inconsistency is a sad heart breaker and long toil deceived of its reward makes life appear as though it had passed purposely and without an end the grand motive for producing the engine was now withdrawn for Maud would surely marry Master Monks—or if she did not William determined he would after this never have her himself. But was his invention therefore to be abandoned? He thought so at first for the very sight of it made him unhappy. Had it been a veritable portrait of Maud Thoresby herself it could not more strongly have recalled her to his mind. Time had rendered it familiar to him and his long continued solicitude to bring it to perfection had begotton in his heart a sort of love for it. Eventually it appeared as though all the affection which he had previously bestowed upon the damsel came to be transfered to this woodwork contrivance of his brain. Night and day he was wholly engrossed by it: of nothing else he thought and for little else he cared. And well for him it was so since much mortification was thereby spared him as within four years from the time of commencing his labors Maud Thoresby went to the altar of Woodborough church with Master Hugh Monks and William Lee remained plighted in truth only to his machine.

(To be Continued)

From the United Stacs Gazettee.

THE TWO STEW-PANS.

BY MRS. H. C. KNIGHT.

So my young friend Mary had again invited me joyfully, I desire so much to see her bright face again, and her husband too, and then to behold how becomingly she wears the honors of lady matron in her new house." In a few days matters were arranged to go; then a charming half-day's ride brought me before her door. "Surely, it is pretty here," I inwardly exclaimed; "this dear little front yard, and that white rose trained so lovingly over the window—Mary's sitting room, I suppose; and the house so white and well kept; and green blinds so cool and shady in summer; and the front entry with simple straw carpet—it looks so pretty here; so quiet, so truly home like;" and I ran after my baggage up the flagstones. Some one came down stairs—"Ah, Mary!" and we embraced each other. "Come directly into the sitting room" she said, opening the west door. True enough, it is the sitting room. Behold the green and graceful drapery of the white rose before the window. She took off my bonnet and sat me down in her own arm-chair, and then went away, but soon returned and placed her nice, fat baby in my arms. "Beautiful baby!" I exclaimed. "Ah, Mary, what a treasure!" It looked amazed at me, then smiled and kicked about its little fat feet right lustily. "Baby knows I am its mother's friend," I said, as I kissed his rosy cheeks with cordial good will. Then came Mary's husband. He is a favorite of mine—so kind and sensible; he is quite business like in his manners, with a heart brim full of friendliness. If you ever feel like asking a favor, go to him, Mary's husband. Supper followed, and a merrier three never sat over a cup of tea. These nice white cakes, and this delicious raspberry! These could only come from a skilful hand! Mary laughed, and her husband seemed to enjoy them anew through me. Then we went into the little garden and sat a while on the beautiful piazza; then explored the chambers, and looked at this prospect and that, the baby every where accompanying us in his father's arms. Every thing was in keeping; every thing pleasant and tasteful—every thing which I saw, at least. Then we walked out to take a bird's eye view of the village from a hill hard by. Every thing pleased me. "So then Mary does finely, after all," I reflected, after retiring to rest. "I knew she would; how beautiful it is to see two young people beginning life together. How fresh is every thing. Yes, and how easy and clean, and how easy to keep clean;" and my mind unceremoniously wandered from the romance of a young wedded couple to the difficulty of keeping an old house clean.

I had not been here many days before I began to suspect, then to fear, that Mary was not so happy as she ought to be, with so much about her to make happiness. "Why is this!" I anxiously asked.

"We are going to ride. The chaise arrived, and the husband jumped out, and as he came in said, "Mary, is my coat mended? I must wear that, I believe. You remember the one I spoke about a week ago, and then showed to you again yesterday.' "Oh, no! it is not done!" cried Mary, from up stairs. "I will do it now; but no, I am not dressed yet myself;" and she ran from this drawer to that quite hurriedly. "One finds so much to do in housekeeping," she said to me apologetically; and withal, pettishly.

One day Mary promised us an apple-pudding, made her new way, with potatoes in the flour. It was an especial favorite of ours, her husband and myself. "Your pudding, Mary," I suggested, taking advantage of our friendship, as we sat together in the forenoon. "Yes, I know, it; I am just going." Then she began to tell a story, then placed a plate of cake before me, then—she was doing nothing; there lay the baby frolicking on the floor. "The pudding, Mary," I said to myself; "it will not be done; then what will Mr. B——say?" Ah! I well knew what husbands sometimes thought and said at a half cooked dinner. "The pudding," I was nearly ejaculating a third time, when Mary concluded to go about it. Dinner came; the meat then pudding It looked plump and round. She cut it; a large slice laid on the plate; but alas! the crust inside was still dough! We took it in silence. "The apple, perhaps, will be nice;" but no, it was not, and uncooked! "This busines you ought to attend to," said the husband, in a tone which was not to be gainsayed. "I never could make puddings," declared mary, blushing and mortified.

By-and-by Mary became more confidential. "How I dread going into that hot kitchen to make pies! How I hate scalding my preserves, it is so troublesome! There are so many disagreeable things to do in housekeeping," she declared once and again.

"Some how or other I do not seem to get along very well in house-keeping," she said to me sadly one day. "I know James is not satisfied; you know his mother was an excellent house-keeper—there are so many disagreeables."

"Pray, what, Mary!" I asked kindly.

'Oh, so many! making bread, filling lamps, and washing potatoes; if one's alone; then one's hands—I don't think I am fit for it, at all." Tears came in her eyes. Poor Mary! "In what respects do you think you are not fit for it?" I asked. "Let us look into it, Mary. There is so much time for you to learn." "I don't know as there is," she replied. "I have no tact for house-keeping; nothing is ever done, James says;' and she seemed perplexed and sorrowful. "Can you give me a few ideas?" she asked, looking up with that childlike confidence so natural to her. "Perhaps I can Mary, will you listen and profit?" I asked, seriously, for I beheld breakers ahead.

"Mary, the time was when household duties were all new to me; nay, all distasteful. Unaccustomed to them and unskilled in them, I shrank from them, dreading and avoiding them. I wept over them, too in very bitterness of soul. My domestics left me as every New England house-keeper knows how unceremoniously they sometimes will, and I was sole mistress of my kitchen, pantry, sink, cooking stove, and all. What shall I do? was the pitiful cry. I contrived to get along easy, any way, sobeit I could get early released from active hesnaig, supervision, and wofully particular, so I then thought, did not at all relish the appearance of things under my care; it was too evident for me not to know it. "I hate," and "I dread," promised every kitchen day, until at length dishes, plates, pots and pans, in a most untoward state, began to accumulate frightfully upon my hands. My husband was silent and cold; I, fretful and fault-finding; a sad pass! "This will never, never do;" I ejaculated one cold, gray morning when every thing looked grayer and more cheerless than ever. My closets, drawers, and store room! Had the rats and the mice made such a strife, then were there somebody to blame. As it was, ah me! "but it wont do!" and I began to look about me. From beneath a little shelf under the sink, I drew out two stew-pans, first one and then the other with apple burned and baked and crusted on them. I had stowed them away without courage to enforce the scraping necessary to their restoration on the upper shelf. Every day for a week had they peeped out and every day had I tried to push them further under; but no, not they; and now they stood out as long as life with a dozen plates in a similar condition. How I loathed the sight of those stew pans with cold greasy water standing in their bottoms. What shall I do! At this point, a sense of my cowardly inefficiency flashed across my mind. There I was shrinking and shivering between the two stew pans! "No longer shall this be," I resolved instantly. Taking off my rings—and rings are wonderfully in the way of washing up dishes—and tying on a checked apron, I heroically seized a stew-pan by the brim. Scrape scrape, scrape washing rinsing and they were clean, invitingly clean. Two nice round agreeably favored stew pans stared me in the face! I turned them over not a speck or flaw could be detected. I had done it actually done it and not so bad work either. I smiled complacently upon the two and they reflected my smiles. From that moment I took courage; I resolved to do, and then inward strength rose up. From that moment, Mary, I never suffered myself to shrink from or dread; or put off anything. Whatever was to be done, I did it and in the right time and from that time too, difficulties began to vanish. I found I could do; nay and I would do. Depend upon it, Mary you must seize right hold of your domestic duties and discharge them promptly and efficiently if you would be faithful to yourself and your household. Shrinking, dreading, putting off cools the water without washing up. Long time after if ever I flagged, away I ran to the shelves to refresh my courage by a look at the two stew pans They encouraged and strengthened me. Those dear old stew-pans with faces so clean and round. From them I date all my housekeeping skill and efficiency. My husband does not know how much he owes then when he surveys my domain with so satisfied an air. Yes Mary the secret of it is, after long misdoing we must have a starting point, a something on which to begin in good earnest seriously. One thing well achieved and we take courage for the next. And now, Mary, what lesson do you learn from this?"

That I must instantly see if the salt is in the pot and boiling, too," cried Mary brightly, hastening away with more alacrity than I had yet seen her toward the kitchen.

Ah yes young house-keeper prompt achievement is the very soul of house-keeping! If you have been a busy idler during your maidenhood, in your mother's parlor you have little prospect of usefulness prosperity or enjoyment, as a wife, a mother, and a matron, unless you are willing to see with your own eyes to work with your own hands and become the ubiquitous mistress of your household.

Portsmouth N. H., Jan., 1846.

Curious Facts.

I am assured that when a sheep has two lambs at a time, she will not permit one to suck unless the other is present. But for this instinctive arrangement, one of her offspring would have an undue proportion of nourishment and the other would either starve or degenerate. It is well known that a pigeon usually lays but two eggs. If however, a third is laid, which is sometimes the case, it has never I believe, been known to come to maturity. If three young pigeons were to be fed none of them would, probably, be vigorous, and the race would degenerate. This is another instance of the interest which nature takes in the well-being of her creatures. The cow affords a simliar instance. If she has twins, the one a male and the other a female, the latter is always barren. If a doe produces a fawn with red eyes, its under jaw is always defective and it dies of starvation; a wise provision of nature in preventing what would probably be feeble from arriving at maturity. What we consider also, the way in which the Creator has provided for the clothing of animals, according to the climate of the places in which they are found, we shall have no loss cause to admire his goodness. In hot countries many animals have but little hair on their bodies, and some are almost entirely without it such as elephants, monkeys, &c. In very cold countries the fur as well as the hair of animals is very thick and even the feet of some birds are covered with feathers not only to protect them, but to enable them more readily to run upon the snow. Animals also, which have been brought from one country, and domesticated in a different and opposite climate, are not neglected by nature, but are provided with such a change of covering as is best suited to it. How different is the covering of a Shetland pony from that of an Arab or Persian horse! One has to endure the extremes of heat and the other of cold, and we see how kindly nature has provided for both.

Ducks which lay early in the year, strip more of their feathers off, and make their nest much warmer than those which lay later in the season. This instinctive propensity is very curious, and shows the foresight which has been implanted in animals. It is well known that, in hot countries, where the blood of horses is heated by the climate they are in the constant habit of bleeding each other, and sometimes of bleeding themselves. This is done by biting the neck or the shoulder. These, and a great variety of interesting facts in the economy of nature, prove that animals are in possession of faculties beyond mere instinct and which they use to their own advantage under peculiar circumstances. Thus, been incessantly teased by a small spaniel, take it up in his mouth, and drop it over the parapet of a terrace into the river which flowed beneath. The noble animal was unwilling to hurt his tormentor, and therefore, took this opportunity of freeing itself from its annoyance. The dog in this instance, did what mere instinct would not have taught him to do, and afforded another instance of the truth of the remark I have made above. I will give another instance of this:—A horse and a cat were great friends, and the latter generally slept in the manger. When the horse was going to have his oats he always took up the cat gently by the skin of the neck and dropped her into the next stall' that she might not be in the way when he was feeding. At other times he seemed pleased to have her near him.—Jesse's Gleanings in Nat. History.

Is there not truth in the following remarks which we take from the Christian Watchman?

"A minister may be important in one place; and he may be invited to another, because he seems to be of great importance to that vacant situation. But it is seldom that any one man is so very important that both places may not without great detriment, dispense with him. Why should we so flatter the pride of any mortal, by giving him occasion to think himself the corner stone of great interests? Why should we so depreciate those interests, as we certainly do by making them dependent on the presence and labors of an individual man?

I have been a careful observer of pudlic men, and especially ministers for many years; and though I have hundred of times heard it said, "if you remove such, or such a man the church, the society, or the institution will go to pieces," I never yet saw an instance where such prediction became fact. I admire in both theory and practice, the permanency of the ministry; but I never yet saw the minister who was essential to the life and prosperity of any good cause. Surely God does not regard any one in that light. If he did he would not so often disable his servants and lay them aside from their work or cut them down by death, and hide them in an early grave. God is the only essential being in the universe."—True American.

PROGRESSION—BEAUTIFUL SENTIMENT.

From the Anti-Slavery Bugle.

In all ages of the world great reforms have had to encounter great obstacles. "Comeouterism" is only another name for progression; and perpetual progression is the inevitable law of all things which have motion unless they lose their foothold in their upward tendency and then the greater their weight. and the more their strength the more rapid their downward or retrograde motion will be. The neat smooth little acorn has to burst the shell in which it grew and cast that shell behind no matter how neat and close it once fit—no matter how much of the sweetest juices of the parent tree had been absorbed or expended in the growing of tha shell. There can be no possible advancement in the acorn kingdom short of sundering those long cherished ties scattering the empty cups and rupturing the quiet rules of acornship, throwing one-half of a forsaken shell here, and a quarter there to lie in decaying fragments for a while and then be dissolved and turned into other forms of usefulness to once more promote progression. Nature does not require the first ripe acorn to "stay in," because all the others are not yet ripe; neither was it ever known that a young oak could begin to feel the expansion of the germinating principle within itself and remain wtih every living principle. "Come out" and live, or "stay in" and die—this is the universal law of everything that has life. There can be no progression short of coming out, or going beyond, (which is the same thing.) This rule is a law in the vegetable intellectual and the moral world.—Valentine Nicholson.

For the Liberia Herald.

OBITUARY.

The Rev. A. W. Anderson, of this place, aged 41 years, departed this life, on Tuesday November 10th 1846, by a sudden illness of ten of twelve hours.

He had for some time previous, seemed to be enjoying good health—but alas! how often it is, "that in life we are in death."

He was a native of the State of Georgia, in the United States, born in the year 1805, and emigrated to this colony in 1833. Of his early life we know but little. He became a subject of conversion when quite young and attached himself to a Baptist Church in the town of Savannah, where it seems he gave evidence of true piety, and a willingness to bear his cross and follow in the footsteps of his divine master. But he did not rest there: urged on by the spirit of the high and divine calling, and with an earnest desire for the salvation of souls: he obeyed the summons, and became one earnestly engaged in importuning, and warning sinners, of their dangerous course. He embarked for this country at Savanah, where on shipboard he found a large and respectable company of fellow passengers from Charleston S. Carolina, among whom he formed both there and after his arrival in Liberia: a large circle of acquaintances, and friends that were attacked to him through life.

In this country he found a large missionary field open, for propogating the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ,

After passing through the acclimating process, he bent his attempts to the Vey territory in the vicinity of the colony, where he established a school with success far above what his most sanguine friends anticipated; and no doubt would have been a great blessing to that country: had not the raging tide of war: which is so remarkable in the annals of savage life: rolled in amid them, and swept from its surface all that once bore so blooming a prospect.

He returned afterwards to the settlements, and bagan sundry opperations among the colonists: and from that time to his death, his field of labor was among us.

Possessed with a liberal education: he made himself useful, both in Church and State. At Millsburg on the 26th day of September 1835, he was ordained an evangelical preacher, by the Providence Baptist Association. He had from time to time filled some very important offices of responsibility and worth: and was up to the time of his death, holding those of trust and merit. In the Legislative Hall and before the courts of Justice he defended liberty—at other times, and in other places he exhibited in prominent, and bold relief, the abuses of his country.

Often from the sacred desk have we heard him plead more powerfully the cause of his Redeemer—of the unsearchable riches of Christ. Soliciting souls to flee for refuge to the Ark of safety, and incouraging those who have long since embarked, to renewed efforts in the divine service. Nor have his efforts been without success, for there remaineth evidence to testify, "Though he be dead yet he speaketh."

He was a friend and patron to the young. It was his delight to instruct the youth of this colony and rear them up for usefulness in society—to prepare them for filling stations in the government of their country.

Benevolence in him consisted not in ostentatious display of alms; for though not possessed with a very large share of this world's goods; still he gave when in his power; we may say, profusely to the wants of the needy. In his manners he was affible, courtious, and unassuming.

Being very communicative and easy of access: he was often sought after on points of importance, and though liable to error as all men are, still he did not commit wrong with a view to injure. In his house he was ever a good and ready provider for the wants of a family: as a husband, kind and obliging: as a parent, loving, and affectionate: and to those around him, he was looked up to as a friend.

The Baptist Church at Caldwell then in his pastoral charge; has sustained a loss by his death, that may not be repaired for a long time to come And others here of the same society will severely feel the loss of his helping hand. But his affectionate consort can more immediately appreciate the worth of him, whom she lived with so happy. To her we will say, do not mourn, for "there is hope in his death;" his work was done. He rest from his labors and his works do follow him. Yes, they, have no doubt shed an influence around which will be felt when he shall long have slept with his fathers—been forgotten by the living, and unknown to those who tread upon the dust that was once as animate as they.

Yes he rests, the statesman and the Patriot true
A loss to a country, who feels her tribute due,

A nation not only mourns for him 'neith the sod!
But a Church, 'fore whom he was the true man of God.
Here let friendship in sorrow drop the burning tear,
Here let all strife and cavil cease—and quake with fear,
Here great statesman wail; and proud chieftain bow thy head,
For know though art standing amid the mighty dead.

And as the biography of a good man's career, can but be a life well spent: so in suming up the subject of the present memoir: we would in justice say, that his was useful and great, as well as a good one.

S.

Monrovia Feb. 13*th* 1847.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. FEBRUARY 19. 1847

We have often invoked the people of these colonies to give some attention to the growing of such kinds of produce, as foreign merchants will take from them in exchange for their goods. Again and again, have we endeavored to convince them, that unless we possess within ourselves, the resources to keep up a commercial intercourse with other countries,—our hope of obtaining a respectable standing, rests upon a very precarious foundation. We have up to this time, looked to the natives for the means to carry on a small commerce, and tho' it is sufficiently known that there is no stability in their operations:—yet we continue to linger out a servile dependence upon them, for those articles of trade, we are accustomed to barter with to foreigners; and by which we support ourselves.

At the present time, our trade is lamentably deficient. There is scarcely a trading spot between Grand Bassa and Cape Palmas that is not inhabited by foreign traders; and it is impossible for us to compete with them. Their vessels must be loaded, and Palm oil they are determined to have, whavever its cost may be. Camwood is becoming quite scarce, and its price, in the United States, is less now than it has been for a number of years back. We have already informed our readers, that there is a duty of ten per cent on camwood in the United States, which will, unless it takes arise operate materially against us. We can see but one safe and profitable course to pursue. Our soil is rich and capable of yielding with very little labor, a variety of productions that will readily command a market in commercial countries—let us lay it under contribution. We have no time now to spare, in considering, whether we will take this course or search out for some other, that may present to our misguided minds, less difficulties.

The cultivation of ginger' arrow-root, pepper, ground-peas, and coffee ought to claim our immediate attention the latter article will require some three or four years growth, before the cultivator will be repaid for his trouble—but after that time he will be richly rewarded—the older the tree grows, the more abundantly it yields. The other articles, if planted in March will, in a year's time produce plentifully.

THE "LIBERIA PACKET."

This splendid barque left our port on the morning of the 9th inst. for Baltimore via Cape Deverla. Among her passengers, we noticed Mrs. Governor Russwurm, and her daughter Angeline of Cape Palmas, and S. F. Mc Gill M. D. chief Physician of that colony—Mr. S. B. Herring, of Basse Cove, Rev. Wm. Hoyt of the M. E. Mission, and E. J. Roye Esq: of this town. We sincerely wish, that they may have delightful breezes and a pleasant voyage.

The election of delegates for the convention took place on Tuesday last. It was a very spirited contest, and we were pleased to see the deep interest which all parties seemed to take in it. Friends exerted their utmost to secure the election of their candidates, and we hope that the selection of the people, will, when the result of the election is fully known, clearly prove, that they are not indifferent to their true interests.

We believe, that it is the common wish, that men of responsibility and trust should have the making of the constitution.

The supply of fresh beef is very abundant. We hope that its price will be considerably reduced.

KING BROMLEY.

It has been rumored that King Bromley was dead. We learn from good authority that such is not the case; but that his Majesty is rapidly recovering from a severe attack, brought on by the taking of poison, which it is supposed, was put into his drink by some of his political enemies. The proximity of his Majesty's town to our settlements, will prevent recourse being had to "sassa wood," to ascertain who it was that attempted the life of the King:—and in consequence the lives of a number of innocent persons are saved.

"It is no part of wisdom to make ourselves miserable to-day, because there is a possibility of our being so to-morrow."

NOTICE.

The second term of the School under the patronage of the N. Y. Ladies Society for the promotion of education in Africa, will commence the second week in March,

The patronage received from the friends of this Institution, during the past term, has been peculiarly gratifying to the Principal, for which he tenders them his sincere thanks, he would also improve this opportunity to acknowledge the sum of $20 contributed in cash, work and plank, by the parents and guardians of the scholars for fitting up the school room.

Course of studies, Spelling and Defining, Reading Writing, Geography 1st and 2nd, Book (Goodrich) Arithmetics, written and intellectual, (Smith and Colburns) Grammers, History, Composition and Declamation. Instruction in needle work twice a week by Mrs. James, Terms $ 1,00 per Quarter.

N. B. this very low charge is only to defray the expenses of the buildings.

The school is open at all times for inspection of those who feel disposed to give us a call.

B. V. R. JAMES.

Monrovia Feb. 9*th* 1847.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

LORD BROUGHAM.

As a barrister, Brougham enjoyed a place founded more upon his known abilities in other departments, than on any especial adaptation to that somewhat jealous and exclusive sphere where sits the stern goddess of the law. In all that concerned the minute and plodding details, the knowlehge of precedents the power of drawing subtle, and almost invisible distinctions he was surpassed by a large class with Lord Abinger at their head. Law, more than any other science, from the multiplicity of its details, and technicality of its terms the evasive nature of its distinctions, and the vast space which its records cover, demands the whole man. But, while Lord Brougham never narrowed down his wide mind to such an exclusive devotion as Themis would require; never yellowed himself among rolls and records never shone as a special pleader, "bristling up with small facts;" no barrister approached him in the rapid mastery with which he tore out the heart of a case the dexterous energy with which he managed it, the clever charlatanism by which he made his wit, or his eloquence or his ribaldry, or his abuse supply the lack of his information; the pincer-like power of the machinery by which he squeezed out truth, or fun or both from the witnesses; the lustre which his genius elicited from the dry wood and very rottenness of legal detail; or in his knowledge and application of the great leading principles of jurisprudence, whether gathered from the devout study of Bentham, the demigod of the science, or made his own by the workings of his restless understanding. A pleading in his hands, instead of being a cold and sapless document, full of quibbles small sophistries and other crooked things, becomes an animated and interesting production, crowded with information, passion, glancing lights, flung now back and now forward, and eloquence of the purest grain.

When chancellor, Brougham made up for the want of minute technical lore by prodigious exertions, both of mind and body. If in aught he was to blame it was in the extreme rapidity of his decisions—the haste in which he pushed the business before him. His exercise of his patronage (lay and clerical) of that high office itself, sufficed to prove that there was seated on the woolsack no cold cast-iron figure, but a man—a man of glorious impulses and quick warm beating heart. It was great in him in promoting one to whom he had done some wrong," and was politically opposed—George Croly. It was greater still, upon reading a small volume of poems to obey the instant impulse, and bestow a living upon the author of the "Village Poorhouse." "There are deeds which must not pass away." They blend a warm beam of love with out admiration. It needed this to cover his sins against the dignity of the English law personified in his office—the indiscreet personalities in which he indulged—the wild wit by which he shook the woolsack from its propriety, and the "strange fire which he now and then presented on that solemn altar where he ministered as high priest.

As a leader he has labored under a two fold disqualification. In the first place, he never served a regular training to the trade passing from under the banner of Pereny to those of Canning, and afterward of Grey he for a very short time led the opposition and like all men of impetuous impulse he is too rapid in his motions, too fiery in his blood too abrupt in his turns, too self-control in his conscious might, too capricious in his temper, and too progressive in his opinions to be a trustworthy guide. No man of exalted genius was ever a good leader or ever had a powerful train behind him. Chatham was a dictator not, a leader. Burke, during his life had no out and out followers save Windham, who was rather one of a constellation. Gemini. Fox could never lead but in a storm. Canning gained his richest trophies while Liverpool was at the helm. It is your acute, clear-headed cautious, common-sense men, like Sir Robert Walpole that weathers the storm.

In a town some fifty miles from Boston the members of a religious society were in the practice of holding conference meetings in the church at which they made a kind of audible confession, technically called, "recounting one,s experience.", A very pious member of the church, Mr. D. was in the habit of inviting his neighber L. who was not a member to attend their meetings! at one of which, Mr. D got up and stated to the congregation that he was a great sinner—that he sinned daily, and with his eyes open—that he wilfully, and knowingly sinned—that goodness dwelt not in him—that he was absolutely and totally depraved—that nothing but the boundless mercy, and infinite goodness of God could save him from eternal damnation. After this confession of Mr. D., Mr. L, who had by accident been placed on the "anxious seat was called upon to recount his experience. He arose, and with most inperturbable gravity stated that he had very little to say of himself but the brethren would remember that he had lived for five-and-twenty years the neighbor of Mr. D.; that he knew him well more intimately so than any other man, and it give him great pleasure, because he could do it with entire sincerity to confirm the truth of all brother D. had confessed of himself. When Mr. L. sat down under the visible and audible smile of the whole congregation, the parson not excepted, Mr. D. went up to him and said, "You are a rascal, and a liar, and I,ll lick you when you get out of the church."—N. A. Standard.

THE PRICE OF A SHOT.—The Paris Correspondent of the Courier des Etats Unis tells a good story of a duel in Paris beween an Englishman and a Prussian. They had quarrelled over a gambling table—a challenge followed and they went out to fight with pistols they drew lots for the first shot, the Englishman won, took good aim at this adversary, fired and missed. The other then raised his pistol deliberately and was about to pull trigger when the Englishman suddenly exclaimed stop, step—I'll buy your shot By this extraordinary proposition all were for a moment astounded but soon it was perceived the matter might be arranged to the advantage of both parties. The Prussian was a good shot, but poor the Englishman had shot badly, but very rich The Prussian therefore sold his shot for 25000 francs which the Englishman readily agreed to pay and both returned to Paris mutually satisfied and entirely reconciled.—U. S. Gazette.

FARMERS CREED.

We believe in small farms and thorough cultivation.

We believe that the soil loves to eat as well as its owner, and ought therefore, to be manured.

We believe in large crops which leave the land better than they found it making both the farmer and the farm rich at once. We believe in going to the bottom of things and therefore in deep ploughing and enough of it. All the better if with a subsoil plough.

We believe that every farm should own a good farmer.

We believe that the best fertiliser of any soil is a spirit of industry enterprise and intelligence—without this lime and gypsum, bones and green manure, marl and guano, will be of litte use,

We believe in good farm fences good barns, good farm houses good stock, good orchards, and children enough to gather the fruit.

We believe in a clean kitchen, a neat wife in it, a spinning piano a clean cupboard, a clean dairy, and a clear conscience.

We disbelieve in farmers that will not improve—in farms that grow poorer every year—starving cattle—farmer,s boys turned into clerks and merchants, and farmer's daughters unwilling to work, and in all farmers ashamed of their vocation or who drink whiskey till all honest men are ashamed of them.

Moreover we believe in taking a news paper—in paying for it and reading it.—Such hints as these are worth at least a year's pay,

Thus endeth this chapter of the articles of our creed.—Ind. From. and Gard.

BOLD AS A LION.

One of the best jokes of the season is told by the amiable Goins of tonsorial noteriety. A Southern Adonis no way celebrated for his personal attractions, on completing a somewhat protracted toilet one morning turned to his servant and inquired:

"How do I look, Cesar?"

"Plendid massa, plendid," was ebony's delightful answer.

"Do you think I'll do Cesar?" giving him a piece of silver,

"Golly massa, neder see you look so fierce in all my life; you look jest as bold as a big lion.',

"Why what do you know about a lion! you never saw one, Cesar."

"Nebber see a lion massa! Golly, I see mass Peyton's Jim ride one ober to de mill ebery day.

"No, you fool, that's a donkey."

"Can't help dat, mass—you look jes, like him."—M. Temperance Herald.

The white of an egg is said to be a specific for fish-bones sticking in the throat. It is to be swallowed raw and will carry down a bone easily and certainly. There is another fact touching egg which it will do well to remember. When as sometimes by accident corrosive sublimate is swallowed the white of one or two eggs taken immediately will neutralize the poison and change the effect to that of a dose of calomel Ex.

NATIONAL PREJUDICES.—In estimating the worth of nations justice requires that while their vices are put into one scale, their virtues should as conscientiously be poised in the other. Individuals and nations are equally stung with a sense of wrong when their crimes are acrimoniously recapitulated and their great and good actions are all forgotten. This fatal forgetfullness the origin of that rancour which has so long desolated the earth. It distracts private families confounds public principles and even turns patriotism itself into poison. Let those who have but the smallest love for the happiness of mankind beware how they indulge this pernicious propensity. He who in every man wishes to meet a brother will very rarely encounter an enemy.

TO MAKE SOAP WITHOUT BOILING.—Take one gallon of lye strong enough to bear up an egg, to every pound of grease. Put the lye into your barrel, and strain the grease hot through a seive or cullender. Stir this three or four times a day, or until it thickens. By this process you have soap clean and with much less trouble than in the old way.—American Agriculturist.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30*th*, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon.	l.b.	8	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	33 1.3
Beef, cargo No. 1.	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Baffs,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	25	30
Boards,	1000*ft*	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	12 1.2	18 3.4
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12 1.2	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 12
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	10 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	10 00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1.3	34
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2	25
Romauls	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 00	3 75
Tobacco	100*lbs*	9 00	10 00
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00	5 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	10 00
Wine champaigne	"	15 00	20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

" 13. Col. Schooner Perseverance, Jones master, from leewad.

" " Col. schooner——master from the windward.

Feb. 14. H. M. C. M. Brig Cometto,——commander, from windward.

" " H. M. C. M. Schooner Hirondelle——commander, from windward.

" 16. British schooner master, from the leeward.

" 17. British Steam brig——master from the leeward.

" 19. H. B. M. Brig——commander from Cape Mount

" " Am. barque —— master, from Cape Mount.

DEPARTURES.

Feb. 6. Am. barque——Goldsmith master, for leeward.

" 8. Am. Ship Modonna Lawlin master, for leeward.

" " American Barque Liberia Packet Gedmanson master, for Baltimore.

" 15. Am, Brig Margarett Ann,——for New York.

" 14. Col. sloop Nathan Bangs G. Ammons master, for leeward.

POETRY.

From the United States Gazette.

THE ART OF PAINTING.

BY MRS JAS A. BEVERIDGE.

Hail art sublime! that brings again to view
The treasured past, while every living hue
Breathes the enchantment pensive memory flings
O'er vanished years and unforgotten things;
Which but for thee, in Time's unceasing flight,
Hadlong been shrouded in the realms of night,

The great, the good, now resting in the tomb,
Triumphant Art, has rescued from the gloom;
The loved—the lost—the beautiful—the brave—
Stars of the Nations, gathered to the grave—
Touched by the magic of a master's hand
In primal life and grace before us stand.

Votaries of wisdom, to thy shrine repair,
For virtue speaks in lofty accents there—
Pointing to deeds of old heroinic days,
Bidding emulate them as we gaze,
'Till in the soul a kindred ardor flame
To win and wear with them immortal fame.

But more than all—religion pictures here,
To lead the raptur'd soul from earth's dark sphere,
In hallowed beauty to the Christian's eye
Martyrs and saints of ages long gone by;
And holier still the inmost soul to move,
In lineaments divine, a Saviour's love.

A Saviour's love!—oh! may it teach the way
We best can glorify—though ne'er repay
Th' infinite debt of love we owe to Him;
In whose birth presence suns and stars grew dim.
Still to His glory let the arts be given
To shadow forth on earths the truths of heaven,
'Till in the sphere of good we higher rise,
To love and serve with angels in the skies.

MISCELLANEOUS

JOKES—The cayenne of conversation, and the salt of life. "A joke's prosperity" says Shakspeare, "lies in the ear of the hearer;" and indeed it is sometimes exceedingly difficult to pronounce whether it be a good one or a bad one, risibly speaking, for a bon mot may be too witty to be pleasant, or at least to elicit laughter; while a poor pleasantry, by the help of some ridicrous turn, or expression, or association of ideas, may provoke cachinnation, a gorge deployee. Nay, there are cases, in which a joke becomes positively good from its being so intolerably bad, and is applauded, in the inverse ratio of its merit, as the greatest honour's are sometimes showered upon men who have the least honour. The admiration excited by the highest order of wit is generally serious, because it sets us thinking. It was said of a crafty Israelite, who deserted the Hebrew faith, without embracing that of the Christians, and yet endeavored to make both parties subservient to his selfish views, that he resembled the blank leaf between the Old and New Testament, belonging to neither, and making a cover of both. No one would laugh at this; it is exactly that description of wit which has been defined "an unexpected association of apparently dissimilar ideas exciting pleasure and surprise." Lord Byron was once asked by a friend, in the green room of Drury Lane Treatre, whether he did not think Miss Kelly's acting in the "Maid and the Magpie" exceedingly natural?—"I really cannot say,' replied his lordship; "I was never innocent of stealing a silver spoon." This is drollery rather than wit, and excites our laughter, without claiming any portion of our admiration.

One of our poets, a remarkably cadaverous-looking man, recited a poem, descriptive of a country walk, in which the following couplet occured:—

"The redbreast, with his furtive glance, Comes and looks at me askance;"

upon which a wag exclaimed—"Gad! if it had been a carion-crow, he would have stared you full in the face;" a remark so humourous and unexpected, that it was received with a unanimous shout of laughter. Here the absurdity of the idea, if it did not amount to wit, was something better, or, at all events, more stimulative of the risible faculties.—C. L.

"THERE is a fable among the Hindoos that a thief, having been detected and condemned to die, thought upon an expedient by which he might be rescued from death. He sent for the jailor, and told him he had a secret to disclose to the King, and when he had done so he would be ready to die. The King sent for him to know what the secret was. He told him he knew the art of producing trees that should bear gold. The King, accompanied by his prime ministers, courtiers, and priests, came with the thief to a certain spot, where they began their incantations. The thief then produced a piece of gold, declaring that if sown it would produce a tree, every branch of which should bear gold; "But,' added he, "this must be put into the ground by a person perfectly honest. I am not so, and therefore pass it to your Majesty." The King replied—"When I was a boy, I remember taking something from my father, which, although a trifle, prevents my being the proper person. I pass it, therefore, to my prime minister." The latter said—"I receive the taxes of the people, and, as I am exposed to many temptations, how can I be perfectly honest? I therefore give it to the priest." The priest pleaded the same as to his conduct in receiving the sacrifices. At length the thief exclaimed—"I know not why we should not all four be hanged, since not one of us is honest." The King was so pleased at the ingenuity of the thief that he granted him a pardon."

"What is the charge for inserting the death of a relation?" inquired a gentleman, entering the office of a London newspaper. "Ten shillings.' replied the clerk. "But I only paid seven shillings for the last," remonstrated the gentleman. "Oh!" said the clerk, "that was a common death but this is sincerely regretted!" "Well, my friend" returned the gentleman, laying down the ten shillings "your executors will never be put to that expense."—N. Press.

THE DOMESTIC RELATION.—We conceive of no more Heaven-like circle than is embraced within the limits of a virtuous and happy family. There is nothing beneath the skies more ennobling to human nature than such a household—where mildness and virtue kindness and love industry and peace go hand in hand together. Where a contented and cheerful spirit chases away the gloom of the world and Religion with her sweet lessons of philosophy softens and purifies the heart. Where the head of the family is recognised and respected as such—and the greatest happiness is derived from his approving smile. Where the low sweet voice of woman is seldom heard but in accents of gentleness and love, and the name of mother is never uttered unassociated with some endearing epithet. Such a family can only be collected together under the influence of a happy marriage—a union of hearts as well as hands—a tie consecrated by pure and chaste affection—an engagement formed on earth but sanctioned in Heaven. Of such an union the Angels who dwell in the bright abodes of the blest must downward turn their spiritual eyes and while they gaze with looks of interest and love delight in and rejoice over the same.—North American.

WHOM DO YOU LOVE BEST?

One afternoon, towards sunset, a young child was playing in the garden with his father and mother. The former on his hands and feet was galloping about on the grass with his boy on his back; at another time the mother, seated on a bench, would trot him on her knee; or else both parents would play hide-and seek with him; and when one found out the other's retreat, all would burst out laughing. After many leaps and much play, all sat down upon the grass, the mother gave the boy a beautiful peach and a piece of bread: the father told him a beautiful story, and the child was happy.

In the midst of this family scene, a friend passed by; he stopped, gazed a moment at this interesting scene, and approaching said to the child:

'My little friend whom do you love best, papa or mama?"

The question seemed to puzzle the child; for he stopped eating, and dropped the hand which was conveying the morsel to his mouth, but did not reply,

'Answer me my dear child,' said the friend, whom do you prefer, your father, or your mother?'

The child as much perplexed as ever, turned his eye towards his father and then towards his mother, as if to ask them to help him out of his difficulty. The thing was hard for them to decide, for though each wished to be well loved, each was too just to be willing to receive the preference. Then a struggle of generosity arose between them; the father enumerated to his son all the motives he had for loving his tender mother and she reminded him of all the kindness which his father had bestowed on him.

'Come answer the gentleman,' said the father smiling. 'Do you not love your mama, who every morning wakes you with a kiss, and prays to God to bless her little son, and teaches you to pray too?'

The child cast a look of gratitude towards his mother, and she replied:

Yes answer the gentleman; but first remember who teaches you how to read and tells you pretty stories you think of your dear father.'

The child stretched his hand to the other side; the father took it and said:

'Now answer my child do you prefer your mother, who nurses you when you are sick, feeds you when you are well, and is at this very moment kindly preparing for your fourth repast?'

The child glanced at his fresh bread and ripe peach; his mouth watered. He was going to answer, when his mother added:

'Mama often scolds you, and that you know you do not like.'

The father replied: Papa whips you when you are naughty, and more than once has made you cry.'

The child hung his head, and did not seem in such a hurry to answer.

'My dear,' said the stranger again, I am waiting for your answer; whom do you love best, your father or your mother?'

'Oh! it must be your dear father,' said the mother, 'who earns the bread I give you, by his labor.'

No! rather your kind mother,' interrupted the father; 'for she deprives herself of many things to please you. It was she that made the red ball for you."

'It was father that made your bat.'

'Yes, your mother plays every day with you.'

'True; your father takes you out walking.,

'Mother kisses you.'

'But answer!' said the stranger.

The child started, raised his head, opened his arms—

'Well, child, which do you love best, father or mother?'

The child's face brightened up with joy; the answer sprung from his heart; and scarce had the stranger finished his question when the child exclaimed 'both alike.'—U S Gazette.

THE APPRENTICE GIRL.

FROM THE FRENCH OF EUGENE FOA.

The warerooms of Madame Camille, one of our most fashionable Parisian milliners, had one day received an additional apprentice, Her name was Gabrielle. Her father was a mason, and, like too many of the working classes, drank on Sunday what he had earned during the week.—Her mother did the best she could to support her family, and found it a hard matter with the little she earned.

Gabrielle had suffered such misery from her cradle, that she had never known that youthful spring which usually makes to children the mere consciousness of existence a joy. "Mamma what a nice thing it is to be alive!" once said a child to her mother, as she bounded before her. Gabrielle was sixteen, and knew not what a smile was. Her fair but faded cheek bore an expression of suffering and quiet resignation, which was more affecting than any open demonstration of grief. The child contrasted the house of her mistress—the abode of order, economy and industry, and consequently of ease and comfort—with her own home, where reigned every kind of wretchedness that poverty and disorderly habits could produce, and where reproaches painful—gave rise to mutual recrimination between the husband and wife.

One evening, among others, the wife was complaining that the mason had not given her all he earned.

"I should have nothing to drink, if I did," replied the husband.

The dispute was beginning to get warm; Gabrielle whispered to her father,

"I give my mother half of what I earn, father, to buy clothes for my brothers and sisters; I will give you the other half for drink.',

"Thank you, my child" said the father, who accordingly took the money from his daughter and went out.

But this man, who could drink without any scruple the fruit of his own labor, felt a kind of remorse in expending at the tavern the money which had been earned by his daughter; and when he drew from his pocket the hard-earned pieces which the slight, delicate hand of his daughter had placed in his, the sound of them, as they jingled on the counter, went to his very heart, and that evening, for a wonder, he returned home sober. How much may be accomplished by kind looks and words, when all remonstrances fail! A trifling act of kindness, with a look of affection, had smote the feelings of the hitherto reckless father.

The following evening, after having, in a similar manner, received the half of Gabrielle's earnings, the mason went out; but he had hardly taken a few steps, when he came back. "Gabrielle," said he, "come, and we will take a walk in the country."

Gabrielle started up with alacrity. "You are not going to the tavern, father?" said she to him.

"Is it with a young girl like you? Do you think me a brute?" said the man. The heart, after all, is the best teacher of what is becoming.

Gabrielle knew how to read, and during their walk she related to her father a number of little stories, which amused him, and made him forget the tavern. The next week the mason's family had enough to eat; and the week after, from the united earnings of the father and daughter, the children were able to be sent to school; in short, at the end of a month, the aspect of this dwelling, formerly the abode of misery, tears and quarrels, was quite altered; and the companions of the mason, missing him from his old haunt, began jeering him; but he told them, what his daughter had done.

"So good a daughter ought to make a good wife," cried a rich miller who had been listening to him. "I have an only son, and right glad would I be if you would give her to him. Good sense, gentlemen, and modesty, are better in the poor man's house than riches." And immediately, without even inquiring whether Gabrielle were ugly or pretty, he demanded her in marriage for his son.

Gabrielle is now the wife of a rich miller.—She is the mother of children, and a blessing to her husband's family, as she had been to her own. Those lips which had never uttered but words of patient gentleness and sense beyond her age, are no longer strangers to smiles; and the rosy hue of health again tinges the cheek which had faded under early hardship and over-toil. Gabrielle is still living.—N American

A GOOD LIKENESS.

From the French.

There was a time when Alfred P———, now one of the most celebrated historical painters in the world, was a poor devil of a starving artist, dining only three times a week, walking upon the upper leather of his boots, and buttoning up hermitically his coat, to hide the absence of a collar, or, perhaps, to conceal the want of a shirt.

The poor fellow owed the baker ninety-eight francs and eighty centimes, for some little two cent rolls; the number of which, to produce the above amount, we leave to the professional calculators to work out.

The worthy baker dunned the poor artist a long time for the amount of his bill, but the painter found it every day more and more difficult to obtain the sum. The thing was impossible. At length they made an agreement.

It was agreed that Alfred P———should paint a portrait of the baker's wife, for which he should receive, besides an acquittal of his debt, six francs and twenty centimes worth of rolls, and if he succeeded well, he should have an extra roll to boot.

It was stipulated that the likeness should be a bust. underscore the word "burst," with good reason.

At the fourth sitting, the portrait was nearly completed. The baker's wife, decked out in her most showy dress, sat before the artist, with a small bag in her lap.

"Stop, sir," said she, all at once, to Alfred P———, "I have brought with me, in this bag my white satin shoes. Is it not very proper that I should be taken with my shoes on?"

Admirable naivette of the rich baker's wife! She desires to have white satin shoes for a portrait in bust.

The delivery of the portrait did not quite finish the artist's work. He had yet to undergo the proof of the infallibility of the likeness. The husband was quite satisfied with the physiognomy of his interesting and better half, but he did not like to trust to a single test, so, in presence of the artist, they called into the chamber, where the painting was hung up, one of the old women that carried out the bread, in order to get the opinion of the simple old creature.

"Just look here, Granny Gratuchet," said the baker, "and tell me what you think of it"

Granny Gratuchet stuck her elbows akimbo, and started at the picture.

"Beautiful thing, that," said she, "pretty frame pretty picture. That must be either master or mistress."

The result appeared highly satisfactory, and Alfred P———carried off the extra roll to boot.

An Anecdote. An able farmer about the time the temperance cause was beginning to exert a healthful influence in the country said, to his newly hired man, "Jonathan, I did not mention to you when I hired you, that I think of doing my work this year without rum. How much more must I give you to do without?"

"Oh," said Jonathan, "I don't care much about it; you may give me what you please."

"Well," said the farmer, "I will give you a sheep in the fall, if you will do without"

"Agreed!" said Jonathan.

The oldest son then said, "Father, will you give me a sheep, if I will do without rum?"

"Yes Marshall, you shall have a sheep if you will do without"

The youngest son, a stripling, then said "Father will you give me a sheep, if I will do without too?"

Yes, Chandler you shall have a sheep if you do without rum,"

Presently Chandler speaks again: "Father, hadn't you better take a sheep too?"

This was a poser. He hardly thought he could give it up yet; but the appeal was from a source not to be disregarded. The result was, the demon was henceforth banished from the premises, to the great joy and final happiness of all concerned

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) MARCH 5 1847. NO. 10

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN M. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED ST. &c.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DO LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

[Concluded from the Last.]

Ambition now took the place of love; for, that active, energetic man must cherish some one predominant passion above all others, seems an immutable law of human nature. William Lee devoted all the resources of his fertile mind to the perfecting of this mechanical offspring of his genius; and after incredible labors—though aided and supported by his brother—in the year 1589, he brought his knitting engine into a condition fitted for the performance of its office. It produced six times the quantity of work, in a given time more than could be effected by the hand alone.

And now he fancied the hour of his triumph had arrived; for the queen, Elizabeth, who had been informed of this new marvel commanded Mr. William Lee to remove his engine to London, and work it in her presence. Honors and rewards floated plentifully about the atmosphere of his warm imagination; and even the former Maud Thoresby inly felt something like compunction and regret, for not having waited long enough to marry the man who was considered worthy to be introduced into the presence of royalty.

It was a grand day in Woodborough, that on which the mighty engine was removed from the place of its birth: and a great man, indeed did Master William feel, as the boxes containing its several parts were lifted into the vehicle destined to remove them, amidst the anxious looks and almost involuntary shouts of those identical inhabitants whose jeers and scorn had been liberally bestowed upon him during many past years. But William was ill-fitted to receive the praise of such as they were, then, and a smile of undisguised contempt, which no one could mistake, played upon his features as he mounted his horse, and rode though the crowd beside his marvellous engine.

The mob is a strange beast. Just as William Lee and his brother, and the cart containing the precious box reached the outside of the village, a volley of sods and stones was fired after them from the hand of the offended rustics; and Master Hugh Monks, the husband of Maud, was heard loudly to declare, "That it was a happy thing for the village to have at last got rid of a wizzard who had brought the devil himself amongst them."

And such was the last instalment of the debt paid at Woodborough to untiring perseverance, and the most remarkable mechanical skill.

Perhaps Mr. Lee fared better at court—let us see.

In a world made up for the greater part, of the deplorably shallow and the still more deplorably ignorant, appearances count for every thing Neither Mr. Lee nor his engine were particularly charming to behold: for the former was singularly plain in person, and had besides a very uncouth, rustic air; while the latter might without much injustice, be considered as clumsy a piece of machinery as even that age of clumsiness ordinarily beheld. But the inventor thought of neither one nor the other he had made the engine, and the engine could make the work, that was enough.

*W*hen the great Elizabeth beheld the operation, she pronounced it very ingenious but smiled most at the idea of seeing a Master of Arts employed so earnestly and eagerly in making stockings.

"It is maids' work," said she; "but that frightful engine is only fit for a horse."

The people at court, and, the people of Woodborough, were closer akin than the unsophisticated Mr. Lee could possibly have supposed. He received no honor, no reward! This proved most acceptable news at his native village; and Mrs. Maud *M*onks again rejoiced that she had escaped the toils of the dreamer, Master William Lee.

Harassed by disappointment and vexation, the unfortunate inventor of the knitting engine in a fit of indignation at the treatment he had received—first from the mistress of his heart next from his "fellow townsmen," then from his sovereign, and last of all from the people at large, who offered him no encouragement resolved to quit, the country, and seek, patronage abroad.

He retired into Normandy; and under the protection of Henry the Fourth, of France, appeared at length about to receive the due reward of his skill and merit. But misfortune had marked him for her victim. The patron king was assassinated, and his successor cared nothing about curious machines or their contrivers.

In the interval, however, while the flash of glory yet shone upon his horizon Master Lee had married a portionless young lady of the country of his adoption, and but recently christened his first son "Henry," after his royal patron when, the violent death of the latter took place, and with that event all his own towering prospects were hurled to the dust.

Again to be humbled at the very threshold of honest pride, was one stroke more than he could bear. His grief, became excessive: the ingratitude of a blind and ignorant world, combined with mischances which seemed to occur merely to thwart him, had the effect of finally wearing out an otherwise unwearied spirit. He perceived that the world was about to close on him forever; so he made his will in favor of the infant Henry, requested his wife to go to England and bring the boy up at Woodborough, and having devised to her the sole property in five machines which he had then made, resignedly and peacefully gave up the ghost.

Mrs. Lee implicitly followed her husband's advice, and went to live on the very homestead where her husband was born. There she brought up her son Henry, but it was in the midst of opposition and dislike and neglect. She seemed to be avoided, even because of the memory of the departed. But between the children of the former Maud Thoresby and Henry Lee, a deadly dislike—a feud born in the blood always existed. As boys they fought—as young men they hated—as old ones they died, mutually unforgiving and unforgiven. Nor did this die with their deaths. It was born again with their children; and perpetuated generation after generation, even until the original cause of difference became matter for the apocrypha of domestic history.

In the meantime, however, a mighty trade was growing out of the produce of Master Lee's contemptuously-treated machine. It began to be appreciated as it deserved and finally hundreds of thousands became, and at this day still are dependent upon it for their daily bread.

From the United States Gazette.

A STAR IN THE DARK.

"There is a future to all who have the virtue to repent, and the energy to a tone"—Barwell Lytton.

"You may call it foolish and romantic, if you like, but I repeat it, that I could more easily forgive fault, committed, under, strong temptation, and foreign to the natural disposition, than a series of petty meannesses springing from and belonging to the character."

Thus spoke Helen *T*ravers to her sister Mrs. Cunningham, and the thread of their discourse is taken up when first it was overheard. It was a strange spot for anything like a 'confidential, or 'sentimental, conversation to have taken place but—every one must have observed that subjects of interest often arise in the most unexpected manner. The two ladies had mistaken the hour at which a morning concert was to commence, had arrived somewhat too early, and had consequently taken their seats before any others were occupied. Perhaps, warming with the subject under discussion they had not observed the few stragglers who from time to time dropped in, and certainly had not heard the footfall of a a gentleman who entered and seated himself immediately behind them, just at the moment when some of the attendants were making a prodigious din in their rearrangement of the benches near the orchestra.

I could not have married a man in whom I did not take pride," replied Mrs Cunningham; "I am very sorry for people who have ever been led away to do anything wrong, but they must take the consequences of their own conduct; certainly any thing like disgrace or the world's censure, falling upon my husband would crush me to the earth.'

"Not if his fault were the one fault of a life," resumed Helen;', not if you loved him very dearly.—Nay, I think its very suffering would draw you more together. I have a theory that the very happy do not love so deeply as those who have known sorrow."

"I call such ideas perfect nonsense."

"I know you do," replied her sister, with a faint smile and playing as she spoke with the fringe of her shawl.

"Any one would think to hear you talk. that you had fallen in love with some scape grace or another, and were seeking to excuse your folly.

"Susan! you know there is nothing of the kind—You know I have never felt any thing more lasting than a passing fancy which one shakes off just as waking breaks up a dream

"How should I know?"

"Then believe,—I would not deceive you though three and twenty, indeed I dread oldmaidism far less than an ill assorted union.

Helen *T*ravers turned her head as she spoke, and though she did not perceive the stranger, he caught the profile of her animated countenance. But the, audience were by this time arriving, and the sisters drew nearer together to make room for the new comers. There was an end to their conversation, of course

Notwithstanding a certain family likeness a look that was caught now and then; the sisters were very different. The elder Mrs. Cunningham, was far the most beautiful if exquisitely chisseled features and a brilliant complexion could make her so. But though quick and clever even witty and accomplished she was deficient in sentiment and the powers of imagination; was a lover of detail; and therefore despised because it was to her incomprehensible, the higher and generalising mind. A thoroughly wordly education had completed her character, and rendered her a cold hearted, selfish woman of the world; without enough of heart to feel the necessity of affection, and yet possessing an insatiable vanity that fed on universal admiration! With features less regular, her countenance was changeful as the sea; for it mirrored every thought and feeling as they welled up from her woman's heart. Early removed from the influence of worldly minded parents, she had been reared by a widowed aunt, a high minded being who had sought and found the sweetest solace for her own early bereavment, in the artless nature of her young relative. Although by no means a stranger to the Metropolis or to society the country had been Helen's home. Her young heart had expanded beneath the influence of nature; her taste had been refined, herfancy quickened by it; and though she had read much she had time and leisure to think more.

In short, she was a fine natural character as little warped as possible by the prejudices of the selfish and the conventionalities of society. Death had a year before deprived her of more than her mother and the independence which this beloved relative had bequeathed to her while it rendered her an object of envy to her unmarried sisters, seemed to her own heart no consolation for her irreparable loss.

But the stranger who had over heard those few sentences which, to a thoughtful mind, revealed a world of knowledge what of him? He had come to that morning concert simply to enjoy music, in which he delighted; yet so absorbed did he become in some, all engrossing thoughts, that the sweet sounds which he had sought to hear fell upon his soul only, from time to time, as chimes that harmonised with his reflection whatever they might be, and were only remembered afterwards by the power of association which linked some peculiar cadence with a thought, a dream, a memory: or with a moment where his attentions had been roused by some expression of pleasure or admiration in the sweetest voice of Helen Travers. He was not what boarding schools girls and youths in their teens call young, for he must have reached five or six and thirty: and according to such high authority he had passed the age of romance and the capability of a sudden love, and yet in those two hours he drank as deeply of the draught as ever did mortal man. A strange and awful Youth had checked and driven back the tide of emotions which belonged to its epoch, only that it might swell now with the concentrated might of a loftier sentiment, a chastened tenderness; and restrained passion. He would—ere half that time had expired—have periled life to have touched her ungloved hand, or to have caressed the light ringlet which floated from time to time beyond her bonnet?

It seemed too, that fortune was to favor him for friends came up and addressed Mrs. Cunningham; mutual introductions elicited that of Helen. He had but to follow them to their door and now he knew who she was and where she lived, This he did with wonderful calmness. People always are calm on really great occasions—except in deed, people who are themselves too small ever make or understand them.

Well—the pigmy of soul escapes through the entangling meshes which fate weaves for man kind, into the outer void of mere animal existence; they are the strong of heart and quick of sense who are retained to play great parts in the struggle of life and the war of passions. And yet—oh! mystery of humanity!—who that has suffered deeply has not felt that in the deepest depths of anguish there is a pulse which vibrates not with pain! Feebly and rather as the first faint promise of future joy, than the flicker of an expiring power but still to can-sole, still to whisper "Peace, peace; bettter thus than not to feel."

So felt William Johnson—for by that common name must the stranger be known—so he felt in the hour of endurance when that strong man writhed in silent agony on the floor of the gorgeous apartment of which he was master.

Life is either one long chapter of accident or there is no such thing as an accident in the world! Three days afterwards the stranger of the concert room was formally introduced to Helen Travors at the house of a mutual friend. Three months from that day let us listen to their words. They had been betrothed for weeks. The scene was a drawing room in an antique country house. Both were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham.

I have one care William one sorrow in the world," exclaimed Helen, pressing the hand which had fondly clasped hers between both her own. "Oh, why this mystery—why this concealment? You are free to do as you will and so am I; though good and generous and true and rich," she added with a smile, "as you are, my family you well know would receive you with open arms."

"The time is come, be seated," he replied in a tremulous voice and releasing his hand with gesture that might have been, but was not mistaken for coldness. And while Helen sank on a neighboring couch he leaned his arm for support on the opposite side of the mantel piece. His countennance was pale as ashes, but his voice grew more steady as he proceeded.

"The first time I saw you," he continued "I heard you say you could more readily forgive the one great fault of a life than habitual meanness of character. I have two sins to confess ere I wed you—as I might do and you never, never know them; you see if I am my own accuser I also make the most of my virtues: Therefore do I take some credit for enforcing secresy till I had summoned strength for the confession for if you reject me and sorrow in the act I believe you would rather not take the cold world into your confidence. And yet if there be solace in revealing what I tell you be free as air to do so if you will. I itemd to be harmless the betrayal of my secret would be but a feather weighed against the sweet thought of assuaging your sorrow."

You frighten me," murmured Helen, struggling with emotion.

"In mercy," he exclaimed, "not tears?—yet I will be brief. One of my sins has been wooing you with the dark knowledge in my breast that a crime of my early life. and its consequences might well be considered an insuperable obstacle to our union. Oh forgive me this—this at least." And he flung himself on his knees before her and buried his face in her garments.

(To be Continued)

From the National Press,

THE ORIGIN OF MUSIC.

THE origin of this art is entirely a matter of conjecture. It is involved in total obscurity. History, neither sacred nor profane, enlightens upon this point—nor does it furnish us with any clue by which we can trace its progress during the antedeluvian world. In the history of that period, a period of one thousand six hundred and fifty-six years, we find but one reference which indicates a knowledge of it, and that is to instruments. Three thousand eight hundred and seventy-five years before Christ, "Jubal" is spoken of as the father of all such as handle the harp and organ. From this circumstance, however, of instruments being mentioned, we may safely argue its existence, and a knowledge of the use of the instruments. But whatever progress it may have made during that period, is of little moment beyond showing its antiquity; for with the deluge all evidence of it must have perished, and a new era in its existence began.

For several hundred years succeeding the deluge a total blank occurs in its history. If it was cultivated during that time, we have no trace of it. Succeeding the deluge the earliest reference made to it is in 1491 before Christ: when Moses having crossed the Red Sea, he and the children of Israel sang in gratitude to the Lord, and to celebrate his triumph, Miriam, the Prophetess, "took a timbrel in her hand, and the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances."

Vocal music undoubtedly preceded the use of instruments. It is therefore probable that music arose among the first of the arts immediately after the deluge, and was a long time in use before mention is made of it, as at this period both vocal and instrumental music were understood. In the same year the Lord directed Moses to make two silver trumpets to call the assemblies together, to be used in war and blown in days of gladness and solemn days. In addition to the timbrels and silver trumpets, we find in use, among the priests, trumpets in the shape of rams horns and oxhorns. From this time forward frequent allusion is made in the Scriptures to songs and musical instruments. In the reign of Saul, David and all the house of Israel played on all manner of instruments, before the Lord, made of fir-wood, and on harps, psalteries, timbrels, cornets and cymbals.

Music was much in use among, and held in high estimation by the Hebrews; but of the character of their music, or how near it approximated to that of modern times, we have no means of forming an opinion. There is no satisfactory evidence, of their having had musical characters: still it is not unlikely that they had some system. There were thirty six different instruments in use among them, but their construction is as much a matter of conjecture as their theory. Nor is it known from whom they derived their improvements. Moses, who sang the first song of which we have any record, before being called "to be the law giver and judge of God's chosen people," resided at the court of Pharaoh, an Egyptian king. He there spent his early years in the midst of royalty and splendour; and imbibed that knowledge and wisdom which subsequently enabled him by the aid of divine inspiration, when in the humble occupation of a shepherd tending his flock in the land of Midian, to compare the only authentic history we have of the creation of the world; and as Egypt was then the seat of the arts, as well as learning, he probably there acquired his knowledge of music.

The antiquity and early civilization of the Egyptians, induces the belief that they were among the earliest people who were acquainted with music. From their isolated habits, holding but little intercourse with other nations, restricting commerce and navigation, and not being a warlike people, their attention appears early to have been directed to the cultivation of the arts and sciences. It is not unlikely that a nation so celebrated for the grandeur and magnificence of its architecture, and the source of so many of the sciences, possessed a lively sense of the beauty, harmony and influence of music.

From the circumstance of musical instruments being found in a Tomb near Thebes, it is supposed they were acquainted with the art two thousand years before Christ. The drawing of a Theban harp, said to have been of exquisite beauty, taken by Bonce from a picture, in fresco, found in the sepulchural chambers behind the ruins of Egyptian Thebes, certainly encourages the belief that this people were acquainted with music at a very early period. The lyre is said to have been invented by the Egyptian Hermes, and suggested by striking his foot against a tortise shell lying on the banks of the Nile, which, emiting a sonorous sound, led him to string it with the sinews of dead animals. Egyptian music, like her learning, was for a long time restricted in its sphere, from being confined solely to the priesthood; and it was only when she was approaching the acme of her power under a succession of her great men—as rendered the nation illustrious by the encouragement of all the elegant arts; and while her national greatness was gradually verging to its final extinction, under a succession of voluptuous princes, that music passed beyond its narrow bounds and became more generally cultivated, when prizes were contended for.

But the taste, refinement, and civilization of the arts ceased among them, and nothing remained of what had once been the most splendid nation of antiquity but her statutes, obelisks, and pyramids. Still the arts were destined to survive and be transplanted into other nations, where they kept steadily careering onward to renewed and still higher perfection.

Towards the decline of the Egyptian empire, that illiberal policy which had prohibited intercourse with the neighbouring nations, was partially abandoned. This enabled the Greeks to settle there, and acquire a knowledge of their arts, which they carried back to their own country, and thus aided the Grecian nation in emerging earlier from a state of rudeness than any other people of Europe.

The Greeks early had national music, but at what time they began to cultivate it, is uncertain. Their improvements were derived from Lydia, Arcadia, and especially Egypt. Most of the instruments used by them were like those in use among the Egyptians. As early as about fifteen hundred years before Christ, Marsyas, a celebrated flute player, flourished; he contested his flute with the lyre of Apollo, and, being vanquished, was flayed alive by the goods for his presumption. The Greeks were the first who used musical characters. They considered a long time requisite to acquire a knowledge of music, in consequence of the number and variety of notes. Plato, although unwilling a youth should bestow much time in the study, allowed three years to learn the elements. The Greeks used it in their religious ceremonies, their warlike expeditions, upon the stage, and in all their games and festivities.

From its introduction among them, it was cultivated almost constantly; and they appear to have possessed the highest degree of sensibility to its influence; for, throughout the whole nation,

> ——"Sweet music breathed, > Above, about, or underneath," saluting the delighted senses of the people.

The Romans, in their early history, were more devoted to war and conquest, and consequently gave less encouragement to this art than the Greeks. They, for a long time, cultivated chiefly martial music and military songs, and regarded any other style as effeminate. Their early music was rude; but after the Roman dominion had become greatly extended, and a love of splendour and ease had succeeded the warlike arts, it was considered a necessary companion, on all occasions, of joy and festivity. In the reign of Nero, (who was himself a musician) it was cultivated to an excess, and regarded as an object of luxury. After his decease, five hundred performers were dismissed. The Romans derived their music from Etruria, Sicily, and Greece. From the latter they borrowed freely, and are indebted to her for her greatest improvements. Some writers have supposed that, as they traded on the Arabian coast, they imported Arabic music, poetry, and musical instruments.

The Arabs had music before the time of Mahomet. There is a collection in manuscript, in the British Museum, of curious Arabic love songs and hymns, set to music.

The ancient musicians of Hindoostan excelled in their music. They retired from intercourse with the world. Great men courted their favour, and repaid them with honours, and kind treatment, for a display of their musical genius.

It appears that all the early nations, whether savage or civilized, were more or less acquainted with music—sensible, in the highest degree, to its influence; and used it on the most opposite occasions, such as joy, grief, and triumph. But the character of their music is involved in much obscurity.

Whatever may have been the peculiarity of ancient music, or however great its power, the introduction of those beauties and graces, which from the chief fascination of modern music, belongs to latter times. It is to Italy, so celebrated for the beauty of her natural scenery, her balmy skies and beautiful sunsets, that are mainly indebted to that of a higher order of refinement. She was destined, beneath the influence of her enervating climate, to give birth to the most splendid compositions and originate the most successful improvements, in this art. A new era begun in the fourteenth century, which kept it in a constant state of progression. A succession of eminent and brilliant composers arose, whose genius spread its influence, not only through Italy but also upon the surrounding nations. So great was the culture of music that Italy became, in the language of Schubart, "a loud sounding concert room, to which all Europe resorted to hear genuine music, particularly beautiful singing." The most boundless emulation existed, which led to an a most excessive cultivation of the voice, but nevertheless, rendered the Italian school unrivalled in the power, control, and modulation of the voice. Operas were here first introduced, and opened a field for the exertion of musical genius and so many availed themselves of it, that from forty to fifty, for some time, appeared annually.

For an almost uninterrupted succession of ages the poetic art, which had progressed, hand-in-hand, with the musical, held the preeminence; but it was here destined to lose that, and fall to a subordinate position. The Italians sought to please the ear rather than excite deep emotions—the voice must be heard, though poetic truth was destroyed, and rendered inferior; and hence the musical was elevated above the poetical art, and led, perhaps, to their first permanent separation.

The impulse which Italy had thus given to art was speedily felt in England France, and Germany, especially the latter; and they soon vied with her in the production of great composers and eminent musicians, the influence of whose genius will penetrate far into coming times, and those works will be regarded by future ages with the most exalted admiration, and held up as models of all that is great, sublime, and beautiful, in this most fascinating art.

"These arts," says Hazlitt, "which depend on individual genius and incommunicable power, have always leaped at once from infancy to manhood." This was especially the case with this art in Italy and Germany. Within seventy years arose a cluster of men whose names are the most brilliant in the annals of music—Haydn, Mozart, Pleyel, Beethooven, Webber, and Rossini, a part of that constellation occupy a prominent place in the scroll of fame. The names of Homer, Shakspeare, Dante, Raphael Titian, and Michael Angelo, who have been held up by all succeeding ages as the most perfect and splendid models in their several arts, do not shed a greater lustre upon their several nations. Truly, "they stand upon the earth, but they tower above their fellows." In grace and beauty they have not been surpassed." Ages may roll on before such a cluster of great men in one art will arise again; for it has been, and probably always will be, a peculiarity of all the arts, depending upon taste and genius to pass from "the first rude dawn of invention to meridian height of dazzling lustre, and in general decline ever after."

RATHER STRANGER THAN MESMERISM.

A respectable clergyman informs us, that being recently in the vicinity of Middletown Monmouth country, in this State, he embraced the opportunity to visit, in company with two other clerical gentlemen, a young female who is exciting, at the present time a great sensation in that region. She is it would seem another "Sharin von Precost," concerning whom Kerner, a distinguished physician in Germany, has written a book. The person alluded to is now 17 years old.

For four years past she has been affected with some mysterious nervous disorder, which has confined her to her bed for nearly that whole period. At first it assumed the form of St. Vitus Dance which was followed some time afterward with a remarkable sensitiveness of the whole surface of the body, that made the slightest touch very painful, until recently it has taken on its present marvellous character.—She eats on an average not more than half a cracker in twenty-four hours, and her bowels operate only once in forty days—yet her face and entire body remain full and plump while the skin preserves the fairness and freshness of health.

This may be considered to belong to the preternatural and the physician's whole relation to the supernatural and the spiritual.

She falls into a sort of trance or catalepsy, in which condition her soul passes into the other world. Heaven is opened to her as she is able to see and converse with its blessed inhabitants. They have, she says constant intercourse with this world Deceased persons become the guardian angels of those in whom they felt a special interest while living. She told one of the clergymen present at this interview who lived in that neighborhood, and had lost a child a short while before, that she saw the child's spirit looking over his shoulder while he was engaged in prayer at a certain time in his study.

The proofs given that she actually had intercourse with the unseen world, are as follows: Blood, without any wound, appeared suddenly on the forehead; and each of the hands and feet; and subsequently on the posts and lintel of the door of her bed chamber the marks of which remain to this time. These things are vouched for by her mother who is a respectable member of the Methodist Church and others.—The gentleman referred to says that she herself talks very rationally, and moreover very orthodoxly on religious subjects, and they came away favorably impressed so far as her sincerity was concerned.

Permit me to suggest to our Legislature, whether before they adjourn they ought not to revive the old statute against witchcraft—for if the above is true and all the wonders of clairvoyance are obsolete verities then surely that sin is yet extant in the world, and deserves to be made penal. [Newark—Advertiser.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE HEART.

Translated from the German of Ritcher.

Once came the loving Genius of the human race to Jupiter, and prayed "Father, give to men a better language. They have only words to express joy, grief or love."

"Have I not given them tears?" said Jupiter, tears of joy, tears of love?" The Genius replied, "Tears do not speak all the heart, Father give them another speech that they may utter their infinite longings—may paint the lingering light of the morning star of childhood—or the rosy dawn of youth—or the golden glow of the life to come shed on the clouds before it, after the sun is set. Give them a language of the heart, boy father." The Jupiter heard amid the melody of the spheres, the Muse of Song approach. He beckoned to him and said: "Go unto men and teach them thy language." The Muse of Song came down to Men and sang them Music, and from that time the heart could speak.—True American

MILLERISM WINDING UP.

Last week as I was passing through the Western part of Hamilton Co. Ohio, in a most lovely grove, I saw an encampment, much like the Gipsey camp on an English common. I tied my horse and walked to a group of men engaged in putting up a "tent." I enquired what was the object of the encampment and soon found, that this was the spot where the "Adventists" are to congregate and wait till the world with its wicked inhabitants is to be consumed. They are gathering in from different places, a group had just arrived from Cleaveland, Ohio, another which had taken up with the "Shakers" in an adjacent village was expected. It is a second edition of Mormonism. They appeared to have no property, considered that the earth was the Lord's and that his people, and that he would supply all their lack. They expect the dissolution of all things in a few days—"the children of the first resurrection are with them every day, departed saints are their constant companions." I came to a farm house near the camp and enquired more about these deluded families. The old German farmer remarked, "I guess de false prophets dat de Scripture talks of, I know one thing, I shall see dat mine cattle and horses well fastened." They number about 30 men, women and children. Their appearance is small and dejected and they are evidently laboring under a strong and wretched delusion.

P. W. C.

——Ohio, May 30, 1843.

A DOG STORY.—The Worcester Aegis has as good an instance of the sagacity of the canine species as we remember to have read for some time. [illegible] for a cow he accidentally dropped [illegible] in the street. Without noticing the [illegible] the soul, out the dog kept by, and on the [illegible] some time after he was still occupied [illegible] and as they discovered with surprise, [illegible] lost hill between [illegible] so as not to injure it.

SERVING A SUBPŒNA; OR, LOVE'S LAW.

It is singular what shifts love will make to accomplish its object. Bolts gates and bars are of little avail against Cupid's pickback contrivances—cunning will devise ways and means to overcome all. A young gentleman had courted a fair lady of this city and it was supposed the two in due time would become "one flesh." Some little quarrel of a trivial nature, as lovers quarrel generally are, occurred. Neither would confess the wrong to be on their side—presents and correspondence were mutually sent back—and the match was broken off. The young gentleman started immediately for New Orleans, to enter into commercial business thinking that distance would lessen the attachment he really felt for the young lady.

When a woman is injured or thinks she is injured by the one she loves she is more apt than the male sex, to "bite off her own nose," as the saying is, to inflict pain and be revenged on the offending object. A gentleman that the young lady once rejected renewed his proposals, and was accepted within a week after her old lover had embarked for the South. On reaching New Orleans he found that distance instead of weakening his attachment only made the lady dearer, and he become melancholy and low spirited—The first letter he received from New York from a friend of his announced that his old flame was shortly to be married to another. His course was quickly taken—the next morning saw him on board a packet ship bound for Gotham.

The passage unfortunately was long, and the poor fellow fretted and chafed so much, that the passengers began to think him deranged, or else a fugitive escaping from justice. The moment the vessel touched the wharf he darted for the office of his friend the lawyer. It is to be supposed the latter was much surprised to see his friend, imagining him two thousand miles away. After the usual salutations, he exclaimed: My dear fellow! you are just in time to see the wedding. Miss——, your old sweetheart is to be married this morning at 11 o'clock. To tell you the truth, I don,t believe there is much love about it, and that the girl really thinks more of one hair of your head than of the fortunate bridegroom's whole body.

"Good God! Where is she to be married—in church?"

"No. At her father,s house."

"My dear fellow, I—I—yes—no—I have it. Have you any case coming on in either of the courts at eleven o'clock!"

"Yes."

"Then fill me up a subpœna with the bridegroom's name. Don't stop to ask any questions. It matters not whether he knows anything about the parties in the suit. By heavens, Julia shall be mine!"

His friend saw his object at once, and promised to carry on the matter. The subpœna was made out and placed in the hands of a clerk to serve upon the unsuspecting bridegroom the instant he was seen to leave his residence, and he was despatched in a cab to watch the house—About ten minutes before eleven, as the soon to be happy, man was about entering a coach before the door of his residence, he was served with the subpœna.

"Can't help it," said the clerk in reply to his gesticulating about "not knowing the parties." "going to be married," etc. "We shant reach the hall before eleven—the case is the first on the calendar—wont keep you ten minutes. If you don't go heavy fine, imprisonment for contempt, etc.

The bridegroom who was rather of a timid nature, finally consented particularly as the clerk promised to send a friend of his who sat in the cab wrapped up in a large cloak to the house of his bride in expectation explaining the reasons of his absence. The reader can imagine who this person was.

Eleven o'clock came, but still no bridegroom. The guests were staring at each other—and the priest began to grow impatient—and the bride that was to be, looked pale and agitated, when a carriage drove up; the bell rang, and "There he is!" muttered many voices. A gentleman did indeed enter whose appearance created almost as much astonishment as that of Edgar Ravenswood in the hall of Ashton, in Scott's Bride of Lammermoor." The lady fainted—private explanations ensued between the parents and lover—and the result was, that in ten minutes after the two real lovers were joined in the sacred bonds of matrimony, much to the satisfaction of all.

The bridegroom that was have been soon after made his appearance, puffing and blowing. What he said and what he did, on beholding his rival, and being made acquainted with the condition of affairs, was really tragi-comical.

The story of the subpœna shortly after leaked out, and had created no small amusement, but the poor fellow declares he will sue the law for £5,000 damages, for subpœnaing him as a witness in a case of which he knew nothing, and by which he lost a wife. It will be a novel suit, indeed, if he should do so.—N. American.

GETTIN ALONG WITH NEIGHBOURS.

BY ADIN BALLOU.

I once had a neighbour, who though a clever man, came to me one day, and said, "Esquire White, I want you to come and get your geese away." "Why," said I, "what are my geese doing?" "They pick my pigs' ears when they are eating, and drive them away, and I will not have it." "What can I do?" said I. "You must yoke them." "First I have not time to do now," said I; "I do not see but they must run." "If you do not take care of them, I shall," said the clever shoemaker, in anger. "What do you say, Esquire White? "I cannot take care of them now, but I will pay you for all damages." "Well," said he, "you will find that a hard thing, I guess."

So off he went, and I heard a terrible squalling among the geese. The next news from the geese was, that three of them were missing. My children went, and found them terribly mangled and dead, and thrown into the bushes.

"Now," said I, "all keep still, and let me punish him." In a few days the shoemaker's hogs broke into my corn I saw them, but let them remain a long time. At last I drove them all out, and picked up the corn which they had torn down, and fed them with it in the road. By this time the shoemaker came in great haste after them.

"Have you seen anything of my hogs?" said he.

"Yes, Sir, you will find them yonder eating some corn which they tore down in my field." In your field?" "Yes, Sir, said I, "hogs love corn; you know—they were made to eat." "How much mischief have they done!" "O, not much, said I.

Well, off he went to look, and estimated the damage to be equal to a bushel and a half of corn.

"Oh, no," said I, "it can't be." "Yes," said the shoemaker, "and I will pay you every cent of damage." "No," replied I "you shall pay me nothing. My geese have been a great trouble to you."

The shoemaker blushed, and went home. The next Winter, when we came to settle, the shoemaker determined to pay me for my corn. "No," said I, "I shall take nothing."

After some talk, we parted; but in a day or two, I met him on the road, and fell into conversation in the most friendly manner. But when I started on, he seemeth loth to move, and I paused. For a moment both of us were silent. At last he said, "I have something labouring on my mind." "Well, what is it?" "Those geese. I killed three of your geese, and I shall never rest until you know how I feel. I am sorry." And the tears came into his eyes.

"O, well," said I "never mind, I suppose my geese were provoking."

I never took anything of him for it; but whenever my cattle broke into his field after that, he seemed glad—because he could show how patient he could be.

"Now," said the narrator, "conquer yourself; and you can conquer with kindness where you can conquer in no other way."—N. A. Standard.

FLESH TURNED TO STONE—The London correspondent of the Boston Atlas states that Dr Silvestro, an Italian, has revived the discovery of "a method of hardening, even to the consistency or rather solidity of marble, any organised substance." He is further said to have exhibited, amongst other specimens of his skill "a woman,s head, with the hair parted and dressed, the hair retaining its flexible properties and color although the surface from which it grew resembled stone. There was also a child,s hand plump and dimpled as in life, but cold semi-transparent and ringing like marble when struck. A piece of liver, of its deep rich chocolate brown color, somewhat resembling red granite and a petrified tongue appeared as if it never could have omitted a sound. It was literally a tongue in stone. The Journal Doctor says, that so cheap is the process that at a very small expense our dead friends may be turned into stone. This process throws entirely into the shade the Egyptian art of embalming.

TO PRESERVE FLOWERS.—Pour water into a flat dish; in the centre of the dish place a vase of flowers, and over the vase a bell glass with its rim in the water. This will exclude the external air, and the evaporation which takes place under the glass keeps the flowers constantly moist, and they will remain fresh for a long time.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. MARCH 5 1847

At this time our supply of cassada, potatoes, cabbage-pens, beans, plantains, oranges and fresh beef, is more than sufficient for our consumption. We hope the Squadron will soon be in port for supplies.

LUMBER, of every description, is exceedingly scarce, and the demand increases every day. In Monrovia several buildings are now being erected,—and many others are under repairs; and it is with the greatest difficulty that lumber can be procured to keep the workmen at work. We have lately had considerable quantities of boards from foreign vessels; but the demand is not lessened.

PALM OIL continues to be scarce—and we see not the least probability of obtaining this season, our usual supply of this necessary article. Foreign vessels continue to flock to our coast for it—and its price, has in consequence increased.

RICE is becoming scarce—only a very small quantity is now brought in for sale. It will pay a high price in a few weeks hence; for however large the supply of foreign bread stuffs may be—our people must have rice, or they will think they are starving.

OUR Market is well stocked with all kinds of trade goods and foreign provisions. We understand, that several merchant vessels are expected soon to arrive in our port from the United States and Europe, and they will no doubt add considerably to our present stock.

According to the official returns, the following persons are elected delegates to the convention:

Hilary Teage	of	Monrovia,
Beverly R. Wilson	"	"
John N. Lewis,	"	"
Samuel Benedict,	"	"
Elijah Johnson	"	"
John B. Gripon,	"	Millsburg,
John Day	"	Bexley.
Ephraim Titler,	"	Edina,
Amos Herring	"	"
Authy: W. Gardner	"	Bassa Cove.
Richard E. Murry,	"	Sinoe.

There are now building at this place and at Bassa Cove, seven boats differing in size from five tons to thirty tons:—and timber is being collected for the building of others. These boats will greatly assist our commerce, and our merchants will find it to their advantage to add sheet copper and zinc to the catalogue of goods they order yearly from foreign countries. If our boats are not protected from the worms, they will prove to troublesome and expensive property: and very few persons could be found to own them—and without the aid of such vessels, our commerce would not be entitled to the least consideration.

We are informed, that the commissioners, who were sent to negotiate for territory are getting on with their mission finely. It is expected that they will, in a fortnight's time, return home.

SELECTED EXTRACTS

INFLUENCE OF ACCIDENT ON GREAT MEN.

It is a curious coincidence that the two great Chancery lawers of the day should both have been forced into the profession by incidental circumstances. ROMILLY says, that which principally influenced his decision was the being thus enabled to leave his small fortune in his father's hands instead of buying a sworn clerk's seat with it. "At a latter period of my life—after a success at the bar which my wildest and most sanguine dreams had never painted to me—when I was gaining an income of $8000 or £9000 a year—I have often reflected, how all that prosperity had arrisen out of the pecuniary difficulties and confined circumstances of my father." WEDDERBURN (Lord Loughborough) began as an advocate at the Scotch bar. In the course of an alteration with the Lord President, he was provoked to tell his lordship that he had said as a judge what he could not justify as a gentleman. Being ordered to make an apology, he refused, and left the scotch for the English bar. What every one thought his ruin, turned out the best thing that could happen to him—

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them as we may."

LORD TENTERDEN'S early distinction was changed by a disappointment. When he and Mr. Justice RICHARDS were going the home circuit, they visited the cathedral at Canterbury together. RICHARDS commenced the voice of a singing man in the choir. "Ah," said Lord TENTERDEN, "that is the only man I ever envied! When at a school in this town, we were candidates for a chorister's place, and he obtained it. It is now well known that the Duke of Wellington, when a subaltern, was anxious to retire from the army, and actually applied to Lord CAMDEN (the lordlieutenant of Ireland) for a commissionership of customs! It is not always true, then, that men destined to play conspicuous parts in the world have a consciousness of their coming greatness, or patience to bide their time. Their hopes grow as their capacity expands with circumstances; honors on honors arise like Alps, on Alps; in ascending one we catch a glimpse of another, till the last and highest, which was vailed in mist when we started, stands out in bold relief against the sky—Edinburgh Review.

STATED SEASONS FOR PRAYER.—Stated seasons, returning at regular periods, are peculiarly necessary to preserve this duty in its full vigor. He who prays at such seasons will always remember the duty; will form his schemes of life, so as to provide the proper place for performing it; will be reproached by his conscience for neglecting it; will keep alive the spirit of prayer from one season to another, so as render the practice delightful; and will be preserved uninterruptedly in the practise by the strong influence of habit. He who prays at accidental seasons only, will first neglect then hate, and finally desist from the duty.—Dwight.

HOPE—You will scarcely find a man in all the ranges of your creation whose bosom bounds is not at the creation of hope. What is hope but the solace and stay of those whom it most cheats and deludes—whispering of health to the sick man, and of better days to the dejected—the fairy name at which young imaginations pour forth all the poetry of their souls, and whose syllables float like aerial music into the ear of frozen and paralyzed old age! In the long catalogue of human griefs, there is scarce one of so crushing a pressure that hope loses its elasticity, becoming unable to soar and bring down fresh and fair leaves from some far off domain, which itself creates.—Rev. H. Melville.

NOVELTY.—It is not the worth of excellency, but the strangeness of a thing which draws the eye and admiration of men after it, for can anything in nature be imagined more glorious and beautiful than the sun shining in his full might? and yet how many more spectators and wonderers does the same sun find under eclipse! —South.

LIGHT, THE SHADOW OF GOD—Light makes some things invisible. Were it not for darkness, and the shadow of the earth, the noblest part of creation had remained unseen and the stars of heaven as invisible as on the fourth day, when they were created above the horizon with the sun, and there was not an eye to behold them. The greatest mystery of religion is expressed by admiration and in the noblest part of Jewish types we find the cherubim shadowing the mercy seat. Life itself is but the shadow of death, and souls departed but the shadows of the living. All things fall under this name. The sun itself is but the dark Simulachrum, and light but the shadow of God—Sir Thomas Browne.

"BE YE ANGRY AND SIN NOT.—Anger is implanted in us a sort of string, to make us gnash with out teeth against the Devil, to make us vehement against him, not to set us in array against each other. We have arms given us, not to make war against ourselves, but that we may employ our whole armor against our spiritual adversary. Art thou prone to anger? Be so against thine own sins; chastise thy soul, scourge thy conscience, be a severe judge, and merciless in thy sentence against thine own sins. This is the way to turn anger to profit. It was for this that God implanted wrath within us.—St Crysostom.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	8	10
Bands, pound,	"	25	33 1-3
Beef, garce No. 1,	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Balls,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	18 00
Butter,	Firkin	25	37
Boards,	1000ft	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	12 1-2	18 3-4
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12 1-2	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 1-2
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Glass,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Iron, pigs	"	none
Lead, pig	Keg,	15	15
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	10 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	10 00
Opodeldoc	Gallon	none
Oil, palm	"	33 1-3	34
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Pepper	"	none
Pipes, tomba	Box	none
Prints, various	Yard,	12 1-2	25
Rolands	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Rum	Ton	none
Sugar, loaf	Lb.	15
Sugar, brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Scissors	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shot	"	none
Segars	Ps.	3 00	2 75
Tobacco	100lbs	9 00	10 00
Wash hand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00	5 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	10 00
Wine champaigne	"	15 00	20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Feb. 22. H. B. M. Brig Contest, Murdock Esq. commander, from windward.

" " Col. schooner Pedler Carroll master, from Sinoe: Passengers, James S. Payne and family, and the Rev James Eden.

March. 2. Am. barque Rhoderic Dhue, Cowell master, from the windward.

" " Col. sloop Nathan Bangs G. Ammons master, from leeward.

DEPARTURES.

Feb. " British Steam brig ——master for the windward.

" 23. H. B. M. Brig Contest, Murdock Esq. commander for the windward

" 25. British schooner Louis, Mitchell master for Sierra Leone: Passengers, Mrs. N. Thompson

POETRY.

NIGHT.

Oh! majestic night,
Nature's great ancestor. Day's elder born!
Young.

From the wrapt world no tumult broke
The silence deepening round.
And not a voice from Nature woke
Her slumbering profound;
Save when the Zephyr breathed repose,
In fitful whisperings by,
And music from the streamlet rose,
In low sweet symphony.

The moon from Heaven's cerulean arch,
Her silver radiance threw,
On azure fields their brilliant march,
Unnumbered worlds renew.
O'er all the heart a calmness stole,
From that still summer even,
While angel voices in the soul,
Were whispering hopes of Heaven.

'Twas such an hour when memory wings,
Her flight to former years,
And from their wrapt oblivion brings
Alternate smiles and tears;
When all that fond affection mourns
Lives in familiar scenes,
And each departed joy returns
In sweet delusive dreams.

Then does the mind's diurnal war,
In Night's wide empire cease
And all conflicting passions are
Hushed in celestial peace.
At such an hour 'twere bliss to die,
When the whole heart is Heaven,
And all its earthly errors lie
At mercy's feet forgiven.

Then may the wearied spirit soar
By worlds of light untrod,
Its starlit pathway sweeping o'er,
On to the bowers of God.
Oh! Night how wond'rous are the fires,
That light thy diadem,
Yet far o'er these the soul aspires
To its great source from them.

Trenton, 7 mo, 1846. B. R. P.

MISCELLANEOUS

NAPOLEON—HIS MARRIAGE WITH JOSEPHINE AND CORONATION.

BY M. THIERS.

The eve of that grand solemnity now approached; that is to say, the 1st of December, Josephine, who had found favor with the Holy Father by a kind of devoutedness much akin to that of the women of Italy, Josephine sought an interview with him, to make an avowal which she hoped to turn to good account She declared her fears in regard to her marriage to Napoleon, as, at the time of her marriage, religious ceremonies were abolished.

The very throne presented a strange specimen of the manners of the time Napoleon had put an end to this state of things for his sister, the princess Murat, by asking the Cardinal Caprara to give her the nuptial benediction; but he had not chosen to do the same for himself The Pope, scandalized by a situation which, in the eyes of the Church, was a mere concubinage, instantly demanded an interview, of Napoleon, and to that interview, declared that he could very well consecrate him, for the state of the consciences of emperors had never been inquired into by the Church, when they were to be crowned, but that he could not, by crowning Josephine, give the divine consecration to a state of concubinage. Napoleon, irritated against Josephine for this interested revelation, fearing to offend the Pope, whom he knew to be inflexible in matters of faith, and moreover, unwilling to alter a programme which had already been published, consented to receive the benediction. Josephine, sharply reprimanded by her husband, but delighted by her success, received on the night preceding her coronation, sacrament of the marriage in the chapel of the Tuileries. It was Cardinal Fesch, having M. de Talleyrand and Marshal Berthier as witness, who, with the most profound secresy, married the Emperor and Empress. The secresy was faithfully kept until the epoch of the divorce On the following morning, the reddened eyes of Josephine still bore testimony of the tears which these inward agitations had cost her.

On Sunday, the 2nd of December, a cold, but clear winter's day, that population of Paris, which forty years later, we had seen crowding in similar weather, toward the mortal remains of Napoleon, hurried to see the passing of the imperial cortege. The pope first set out at 10 o'clock in the morning, and much earlier than the Emperor, in order that the two corteges should not hinder each other. He was accompanied by a numerous body of clergy, attired with the most costly ornaments, and escorted by detachments of the imperial guard. A richly decorated portico had been erected all around the Place Notre Dame, to receive, at their descent from the carriages, the sovereigns and Princes who were to proceed to the ancient basilick. The archbishopric, adorned with a luxury worthy of the guests it was to shelter, was arranged so that the Pope and the Emperor could rest there for an instant.

After a brief stay, the Pope entered the church where for several previous hours there had been assembled the deputies of the towns, the representatives of the magistracy and of the army, the sixty bishops with their clergy, the Senate, the Legislative body, the Council of State, the Princes of Nassau, Hesse and Baden, the arch Chancellor of the German Empire, and lastly, the ministers of different powers.—The great doors of Notre Dame had been closed, because the back of the imperial throne was placed against it. The church therefore was entered by the side doors, situated at the two extremities of the trasversal nave When the Pope, preceded by the cross, and by the ensigns of the successor of St. Peter, appeared within that ancient basilick of St. Louis, all present rose from their seats, and five hundred musicians pealed forth in solemn strains the consecrated chant, Tu es Petrus. The effect of this was instant and sublime. The Pope proceeded at a slow pace, direct to the altar, before which he knelt, and then took his place on the throne that had been prepared for him at the end of the altar The sixty prelates of the French church presented themselves in succession to salute him. To each of them constitutional or not, his countenance was equally benevolent. The arrival of the imperial family was now awaited. The church of Notre Dame was decorated with unequalled magnificence. Hangings of velvet sprinkled with golden bees, descended from the roof to the pavement. At the foot of the altar stood two plain arm chairs, which the Emperor and Empress were to occupy before their crowning. At the west end of the church and opposite to the altar, raised upon twenty-four steps, and placed upon columns which supported a pediment, stood an immense throne, a sort of monument within a monument, intended for the Emperor when crowned, and his wife It was the custom in both the Roman and French ritual The monarch did not set himself upon the throne until he had been crowned by the Pontiff

They now waited for the Emperor, and waited for a considerable time. This was the only disagreeable circumstance in this grand solemnity. The position of the Pope, during this long delay, was painful. The fear of the director of ceremonies lest the two corteges should happen to meet, was the cause of this delay The Emperor set out from the Tuileries, in a carriage completely enclosed by glass, surrounded by gilt genii, bearing a crown, a popular carriage in France, and always recognised by the Parisians when it has appeared in subsequent ceremonies. He was attired in costume designed by the greatest painter of the day, and very similar to the costume of the sixteenth century He wore a plumed hat and a short mantle. He was not to assume the imperial costume until he reached the Archbishopric; and at the moment of entering the church. Escorted by his Marshals on horseback, he proceeded slowly along the Rue St. Honore, the Quary of the Seine, and the place Notre Dame, amidst the acclamations of immense crowds delighted to see their favorite General become Emperor, as though he had not himself achieved this with his excitable passions and his warlike heroism, and as if some touch of a magic wand had done it for him

Napoleon arrived at the portico we have already described, alighted from his carriage, proceeded to the Archbishopric, took the crown, the sceptre, and the imperial robe, and directed his course to the cathedral. Beside him was borne the the grand crown, in the form of a tiara, and modeled after that of Charlemagne After this first stage of the ceremony he wore only the crown of the Cæsars, namely, a simple golden laurel. All admired that noble head, noble beneath that golden laurel, as some antique medallion. Having entered the church to the sound of pealing music, he knelt, and then passed on to the arm chair which he was to occupy previous to taking possession of the throne

The ceremony then commenced. The sceptre, the sword, and the imperial robe, had been placed upon the altar. The Pope annointed the Emperor on the forehead, the arms, the hands, then blessed the sword, with which he girded him, and the sceptre which he placed in his hand, and approached to take up the crown Napoleon, who had watched his movements, now, as he had promised, settled the difficulty by firmly though not violently, seizing the crown and placing it on his own head. This action, which was perfectly appreciated by all present, produced an indescribable effect. Napoleon, then, taking the crown of the Empress, approached Josephine, as she knelt before him, and placed it, with visible tenderness, upon the head of the partner of his fortunes, who at that moment burst into tears This done, he proceeded towards the grand throne. He ascended it, followed by his brothers, bearing the train of his robes. Then the Pope, according to custom, advanced to the foot of the throne, to bless the new sovereign, and to chant those words which greeted Charlemagne in the basilick of St Peter, when the Roman clergy suddenly proclaimed him Emperor of the West:—"VIVAT IN ÆTERNUM SEMPER AUGUSTUS" At this chant, shouts of "vive l'Empereur," resounded through the arches of Notre Dame; the cannon, adding their thunder, announced to all Paris the solemn moment of Napoleon's consecration, with all the forms received among mankind.

The arch-chancellor Cambaceres, presented him with the form of an oath, a bishop handed him the New Testament, and upon the book of Christians he took that oath which embodied the great principles of the Revolution A pontifical high mass was then chanted, and the day was far advanced when the two corteges regained the Tuileries, through an immense concourse of people.—The True American.

THE PRIDE THAT APES HUMILITY

—It is an absurd taste, or rather an irrational prejudice, that objects to fine feathers, except as aids to deception, and as substitutes for what they should adorn It is good to laugh at that worst of vulgarities which is always dreading to be thought vulgar, and fears to array itself in a graceful and becoming garb, lest its solid qualities should be taken for mere glitter. He is a shallow philosopher who is frightened at the thought of being taken for a coxcomb, and dresses meanly to denote the greatness of his mind. The foppery of the bean is to be preferred to the foppery of the sloven An grand disdain of trifles is a symptom of littleness, and an affected attempt at fair argument is the most pitiful of all affectations. The "goodly outside" is excellent when not falsely assumed, but the worst natural face that Nature's journeymen ever left unfinished, is better than the bravest mask that ever hid it The sword-sheath of exquisite workmanship—the guilt vellum, and the rich leather in which the pages of poetry and philosophy are preserved—may be vanities, but they are never despised, except by a vanity infinitely more preposterous—The True American

THE OFFENDED

Every one is ready to admit the duty of not giving offence to others. It is one of the universally acknowledged laws of the society in which we are units, to live peaceably with all around us, and to avoid any thing which may cause estrangement, and produce angry and bitter feelings; and he who wantonly violates this law and needlessly irritates and provokes, proves himself unworthy of the blessings which civilization and society were intended to secure. If every one acted in an offensive manner, the component parts must be broken up, and man must again retrogade into solitariness and barbarism; for it is only by mutual respect and goodwill that society can cohere and exist "It is the glory of a man," says the sacred proverb "to pass over, a transgression;" and it is the truest wisdom and the best philosophy sometimes to shut our eyes to insult, even where there may be reason to fear it was not entirely unpremeditated. At all events we shall meet in the world quite enough of offences, unless we are more than ordinary fortunate without seeking out imaginary insults, and wasting our strength and destroying our peace by fighting with the wind Our severest scrutiny is best turned to ourselves, that we may not be offenders, and our most favorable judgment formed respecting the conduct and actions of others, that we may not be offended While we may be sure that in the crowded path of life, we ourselves do not intend to run wilfully against others, though we may sometimes stumble against them, so we must hope and believe that they in turn have no intention of offending us, though they sometimes accidentally jostle us in their turn The duty of endurance has undoubtedly its proper limits, but it is a wise determination not only not to offend, but also not to be easily offended. Every one desires that others should intrepret his actions kindly and where any may be of doubtful import, to hope the best; and such is the way in which actions should be regarded by us. Were the duty of not taking offence more thought of and better understood, the peace of families, of communities, of nations would rest on a firmer foundation, and something would be added to the general amount of human harmony and happiness.—U States Gazette.

A WARRIOR DISARMED.

About the year 1756 there lived at Stourbridge a family of the society of Friends, by the name of Winter. Their house was adjoining the principal inn of that town, and their windows overlooked the yard. It happened that a troop of soldiers were billetted in that town, and the principal officers' head-quarters were at the said inn. Amongst these officers was one who was occasionally given to fits of intoxication. At times of these paroxsyms his brain was brought up to a state of frenzy, and it was dangerous, when in this condition, to oppose his conduct or his conversation. On one occasion, whilst under this demoniacal influence, having had a dispute with his companions, he staggered forth into the inn-yard with his drawn sword, calling on his opponents to come out and settle their quarrel by single combat. In this way flourishing his sword, with ridiculous gesticulations and bravado he soon collected a mob of boys and others around him to laugh at his caricatures and enjoy the fun. In this situation he was perceived by the landlady of the inn, who concluded that murder was being committed; and her husband from home, she fainted away In this dilemma their kind neighbor Mrs Winter was applied to, who had always been the family's councillor in times of difficulty Mrs Winter having quietly surveyed the scene from her window; was not long in seeing that prompt and energetic measures must be taken to prevent the consequences which an eccentric lunge of the reeling warrior might inflict on some of the crowd around him. Having put on her drab bonnet, she proceeded to perform the work which her benevolent heart suggested to her as a duty required at her hand. Having gently put aside some of the crowd, she placed herself immediately in front of the astounded officer, and, whilst looking in his face with an air of calm benignity of Christian fortitude, she gently placed her hand on the hilt of his sword, when his grasp suddenly relaxed, and she softly drew away the dangerous weapon from the dangerous owner, who gazed with vacant awe upon his silent monitor as though he had seen an angel. Mrs. Winter retired with her trophy to to her own apartment, and the officer having stared wildly around him, staggered to his quarters, to reflect on the vision which had just appeared to him. A few hours rest and sleep having restored the officer to his reason, he began to reflect on his defenceless situation and fearing to appear on parade next morning without his usual appendage, which would lead to some awkward inquiries as to how he became disarmed of his sword, he sent his groom with a respectful message to Mrs. Winter, to beg that she would be so good as to return it to him by the bearer. Mrs Winter returned for answer, that his sword was safely locked up in her closet, but, that if he would call himself the next morning she would restore it to him There appeared, to him to be hard terms, but he wisely judged it was best for him quietly to submit, lest a worse thing should happen to him Accordingly in the morning, he waited upon Mrs. Winter and having in the most gentlemanly and handsome manner, thanked her for her kind and, as he esteemed it, merciful interference, she gave him his sword, desiring him to put it up into its sheath. Having given him a few gentle admonitions on the cause of his unofficer like conduct, and he promised never to be found again in a similar situation, he took his leave of Mrs. Winter, and they both had occasion to recur in their future life to this deliverance, with mutual feelings of thankfulness—The Universe

A FOOLISH FRATERNITY.

In all times, love has been described as a fire, and many things noted as that will keep it burning; but the object of "The Fraternity of the Penitents of Love" was to show, that the fire of their love could in winter produce on them the same effect as a fire of wood and charcoal; and in the dog days act like ice and snow. To prove this, the resolute knights and squires, dames and damsels who had the hardihood to embrace this severe institution, clothed themselves during the heat of summer in the thickest manner, lined with the warmest furs; the fire of their love kept them cool as the icicle that hangs on Diana's temple. In the winter season they dressed themselves in the thinnest and lightest stuffs that could be procured. It was a crime to wear fur on a day of the most piercing cold, or to appear with a hood, cloak, gloves, or muff. The flame of their love kept them sufficiently warm. Fires all the winter were banished from their houses. They dressed their apartments with evergreens; and in the most intense frosts, their beds were covered only with a piece of canvass. The fire of their love made everything genial. The devotees passed the greater part of the day abroad, wandering from castle to castle; and during their desperate pilgrimage, many of them perished by the inclemency of the weather, and died martyrs to their enthusiastic profession—W. Bernan.

SHAMEFUL.—A man named Cunningham, was yesterday bound over by Mayor Swift, on a charge of abusing and maltreating his wife,

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) APRIL 2 1847. NO. 12

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. F. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr. J. F. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

RATHER STRANGER THAN MESMERISM.

A respectable clergyman informs us, that being recently in the vicinity of Middletown, Monmouth country, in this State he embraced the opportunity to visit, in company with two other clerical gentlemen, a young female who is exciting at the present time a great sensation in that region. She is, it would seem, another "Sherin von Prevost," concerning whom Kœner a distinguished physician in Germany has written a book. The person alluded to is now 17 years old.

For four years past she has been affected with some mysterious nervous disorder, which has confined her to her bed for nearly that whole period. At first it assumed the form of St. Vitus Dance, which was followed some time afterward with a remarkable sensitiveness of the whole surface of the body, that made the slightest touch very painful until recently it has taken on its present marvelous character. —She eats on an average not more than half a cracker in twenty-four hours and her bowels operate only once in forty days—yet her face and entire body remain full and plump while the skin preserves the fairness and freshnes of health.

This may be considered as belonging to the preternatural and the physical: what follows has relation to the supernatural and the spiritual.

She falls into a sort of trance or catalepsy in which condition her soul passes into the other world. Heaven is opened to her as she is able to see and converse with its blessed inhabitants. They have, she says constant intercourse with this world. Deceased persons become the guardian angels of those in whom they felt a special interest while living. She told one of the clergymen present at this interview who lived in that neighborhood and had lost a child a short while before that she saw the child's spirit looking over his shoulder while he was engaged in prayer at a certain time in his study.

The proofs given that she actually had intercourse with the unseen world are as follows: Blood, without any wound, appeared suddenly on the forehead, and each of the hands and feet; and subsequently on the posts and lintel of the door of her bed chamber the marks of which remain to this time. These things are vouched for by her mother who is a respectable member of the Methodist Church, and others.—The gentleman referred to says that she herself talks very rationally and moreover very orthodoxly on religious subjects and they came away favorably impressed so far as her sincerity was concerned.

*P*ermit me to suggest to our Legislature whether before they adjourn they ought not to revive the old statute against witchcraft—for if the above is true; and all the wonders of clairvoyance are obsolute verities; then surely that sin is yet extant in the world and deserves to be made penal.

[Newark Advertisor.

How to be always easy—or right use of the Eyes. An Italian Bishop struggled through great difficulties without repining and met with much opposition in the discharge of his Episcopal function without even betraying the least impatience. An intimate friend of his who admired those virtues which he thought it impossible to imitate one day asked the prelate if he could communicate the secret of his being always easy. "Yes replied the old man, 'I can teach you my secret and with great facility it consists in nothing more than making a right use of my eyes.' His friend urged him to explain himself. Most willingly returned the bishop, in whatever state I am I first of all look up to heaven, and remember that my principal business here is to prepare for my journey there; I then look down upon the earth and call to mind how small a space I shall occupy in it when I come to be interred, I then look abroad upon the world and observe what multitudes there are who in all respects, are more unhappy than myself. Thus I learn where true happiness is placed where all our cares must end and how very little reason I have to repine or complain.

AN ANECDOTE. An able farmer about the time the temperance cause was beginning to exert a healthful influence in the country, said to his newly hired man, Jonathan, I did not mention to you when I hired you that I think of doing my work this year without rum. How much more must I give you to do without?"

"Oh," said Jonathan, "I don't care much about it; you may give me what you please."

"*W*ell," said the farmer, "I will give you a sheep in the fall, if you will do without."

"Agreed!" said Jonathan.

The oldest son then said, "Father, will you give me a sheep, if I will do without rum."

"Yes Marshall, you shall have a sheep if you will do without'

The youngest son, a stripling, then said, "Father will you give me a sheep, if I will do without too?"

"Yes, Chandler, you shall have a sheep if you do without rum"

Presently Chandler speaks again: "Father hadn't you better take a sheep too?"

This was a poser. He hardly thought he could give it up yet: but the appeal was from a source not to be disregarded. The result was, the demon was henceforth banished from the premises to the great joy, and final happiness of all concerned.

THE STARVED ROCK.

or, the Last of the Illinois.

[From the Diary of a Traveller.]

October 16, 18,—,we arrived at Ottawa, on the Illinois river after something of a cold night's ride. This is a small, yet an old town and one of very little business. Here we remained only to change horses, and for a very scanty refreshment. At some three miles from this town we came to a Rock on the river's bank of about 250 feet high, and only accessible on one side, by a very narrow path. It is generally called "Starved Rock," from the fact that times of old, or times long passed one tribe of the Red Men, the Illinois encamped on it, and were besieged by their hostile neighbors, the Ottawas till they starved them to death on the barren Rock. This place is on the bank of the *I*llinois river, some 12 miles from Peru. In the course of my inquiries respecting the history of this Rock I gathered the following items as given substantially by the last remnant of the Illinois as he returned to the hunting-grounds of his early manhood to lay his weary and aged limbs with the bones of his fathers. His silvered locks and wrinkled brow showed that death had been unconscious of his existence or he would long since have claimed his right. When the old warrior was asked if he was one of the tribe that perished there, he replied:

"Alas! I am the only remnant of the once powerful *I*llinois. Here upon this lonely Rock I saw those brave warriors perish one by one. As the forest leave fall before the rude autumn wind so fell our noble braves before the wrath of an implacable enemy. After the famine had destroyed the most of our numbers, and finding longer resistance would be vain, I resolved to make my escape if possible. After dark I tore up my blanket and making a rope I tied it to a shrub and lowered myself to the water, unperceived by my enemies. I discovered a canoe lying near me, and silently unfastening it, I quietly floated down the river. As I turned to take a last farewell of this unhappy place, I beheld, by a light that gleamed from the Rock that the enemy had ascended it. Soon the wild, demoniac cry of victory, mingled with the suffering cries of the victims rang through the air. I could see them butchering and torturing the small remnant of my tribe who were unable to offer any resistance. Fearful of being discovered I plied my paddle and made my escape, and have since lived beyond the Mississippi until I found death approaching when I resolved to return and lay myself with the rest of my tribe.,'

The old warrior continued--"If you would know the cause of this unhappy quarrel listen and you shall hear. Our tribe the once powerful Illinois sent our young chief Onejeda, with a chosen band of warriors, to a great Council, held beyond the Mississippi for the purpose of perfecting a league against the Ottawas and Pottawattamies. But it failed of success and Onejeda started on his return. On his way he passed by the camp of the Ottawas, who were then upon a hunting excursion and had left their camp in the care of their squaws. They had selected one of the most beautiful sites upon Rock river. Upon one side extended the beautiful undulating prairie, enamelled with flowers of the brightest hues; upon the other rolled the beautiful river, bearing on its tribute to the Father of Waters: and in the distance stretched a dark line forest, until it seemed to blend with the horizon. Wild Thunder the Ottawa chief had a daughter, whose beauty was as far-famed as the bravery of her warlike sire. Often had the neighoring chief, tried to gain her hand but were as often repulsed by her ambitious father. As Onejeda rode along the brow of the bluff toward the camp he beheld the far-famed beauty, the lovely Tahmaroo, joyfully tripping along and merrily singing a wild native air, as she gathered the gay flowerets, appearing more like some favored beauty of the gods who had chosen the prairie for her paradise than like the daughter of an Indian chief. When he gazed upon her light and slender form her long raven tresses, her dark rolling eye, and her graceful movement his soul became fired with the wild excitement of love; his heart beat quick, his temples throbbed, and his brain was fevered, as he gazed in silent admiration on this forest beauty. Bold daring and intrepid as he was his firmness deserted him, and he became a slave to his ungovernable passion Resolving to possess the object of his wild admiration at all hazards, and knowing full well that his only chance would be to seize her in the absence of her father, and make a rapid flight. He laid his schemes immediately; to plan was to execute with Onejeda, as the eagle pounces upon his prey. With characteristic rashness, he seized the young and timid Tahmaroo, and placing her before him upon his wild steed he fled like the wind across the prairie. When Wild Thunder returned and found his only daughter, the pride of his heart the gentle fawn he so dearly loved had been stolen and carried away by a hostile chief, like a tigress robbed of her whelps, he became frantic with rage—his wrath knew no bounds. His clouded brow the piercing flashes of his dark and fiery eyes, showed the wild & malignant passions that were harrowing up his soul as he breathed forth vengeance torture and extermination against the *I*llinois. His stalwart warriers quailed, so dreadful were his curses. He called his braves and followed immediately in pursuit; and like bloodhounds on the scent they came bounding over the prairie on our trail. We were encamped upon a height that overlooked Fox river, when we were apprised by one of our runners of the hot pursuit of the Ottawas. We immediately commenced a rapid march down the river, in the hope of avoiding our enemies, and crossing the Mississippi; for their overpowering numbers rendered it impossible for us to resist them. But when we got one day's march below the mouth of the Fox, we met a large force of the Pottawattamies, who were leagued with our enemies, and we were forced to make a rapid retreat. As we came up the valley we beheld the Ottawas stationed upon Buffalo Rock. Our only chance was to ford the Illinois and fly south; here again we found our retreat cut off; for the crafty chief had sent a part of his warriors across the *I*llinois, at the mouth of the Fox, who had marched down and were guarding that side of the river. Finding all retreat cut off, we resolved to gain one of the islands in the river, and fortify ourselves in the best way we could. As we were descending the bluff we came in sight of this point. Its isolated position bold sides and towering height at once pointed it out as a safe and commodious retreat. Here we ascended; and so rejoiced were we at our escape that we feasted, danced sang in the most extravagant manner. But our fond hopes of safety were soon turned to despair. When we beheld our watchful enemies march to the foot of the Rock deliberately encamp and prepare for a siege, the dreadful truth at once flashed upon our minds. The narrow pass from the Rock was guarded; all retreat was cut off; we were deprived of all means of procuring food and nothing but a lingering death now awaited us. Maddened by despair, Onejeda made a desperate sally, our noble warriors fought like panthers they scatted death and destruction among the Ottawas; but when they were gaining some advantage, the detachment from the Pottawattamies came pouring down the bluff in such immense numbers, that Onejeda ordered his men to retire up the narrow defile of the Rock, himself coming last beating back the fierce assailants and safely covering their retreat. On the following morning when the gentle Tahmaroo beheld the bleeding wounds of Onejeda, his sad and dejected countenance, as he sat alone, brooding over his misfortunes, she began to betray emotions of sympathy; and when she thought of his daring bravery, the danger he had encountered, and his painful sufferings, and felt the conviction that all this was in consequence of his ardent love for her, she felt a new and strange emotion—a singular and devoted attachment for Onejeda began to take possession of her soul. She began to think of nothing but his wounds and his sufferings, and how she might provide for his safety. With the characteristic quickness of her sex in an emergency she immediately arranged a plan by which she thought to effect a mutual accommodation. Selecting one of the finest young braves she gave him the calumet and a rich belt of wampum, that belonged to her mother, and directed him to descend to the camp and offer the pipe of peace, and present to her father the wampum belt as a peace-offering from his daughter, and implore him by the memory of her mother—by the love he bore his daughter, and by the ties of humanity; to cease his relentless, persecution. With painful anxiety we watched our young brave approach the enemies camp. But a cold, horrid shudder ran through evey frame as we beheld Wild Thunder seize and throw him into a large fire, and knocking him back with his war club as often as he attempted to escape, kept him there till he roasted him alive. As the lovely morning is darkened by the black cloud of an approaching storm, so were the beautiful features of the lovely Tahmaroo overshadowed as her affection for her father was turned into hate by this fiendish cruelty.

"The last ray of hope now vanished, and death revelled among us. The misery that our unhappy tribe suffered was truly appalling. Mothers were unable to give nourishment to their dying infants; the stern warrior whose eye the tear had never moistened, whose arm the fear of death had never unnerved, sat weeping over his dying wife; and the old veterans, who had often led our young braves to victory sat in stern silence with their blankets drawn over their faces, struggling with death, with a brave determination to betray no signs of fear.

"With a sad heart and a mournful confidence Tahmaroo led the feeble Onejeda to a projecting point of the rock that overhung the river and overlooked her father's camp. In a prophetic and solemn voice she calls upon the Wild Hunter to listen to a daughter's curse. 'Behold the wrath of the Great Spirit, said she, pointing to Heavens, that were lit up with a crimson hue; unnatural father! Cursed be your tribe, and doubly cursed be you, whose heart knows no pity!—Friendless and childless may you die detested, deserted, may you starve on the lone prairie! May the wild wolves feed on your murderous carcass! May the Great Spirit chain your soul upon a barren rock where you can never taste food or drink? Onejeda we will go to the beautiful praires and live in our happy hunting-grounds, where our cruel enemies can never come.' "As she spoke she clasped her arms around him and with a sudden spring leaped from the dizzy height.—A frightful scream—a sudden plunge into the dark abyss below—and all was silent as death The waves were the winding-sheet and the beautiful Illinois the tomb of the noble Onejeda and the lovely, heroic Tamahroo."

While reconnoitering and gazing upon the enchanting and majestic scene of the above tragedy, my heart swelled with rapture while beholding this sublime and magnificent scene. But when I recollected that the place of such enchanting beauty had once been the theatre of most savage cruelty I could not but grieve, to think that man should mar the noblest of nature's works by his deeds of blood and cruelty that while surrounding nature smiles with angelic sweetness, man should become a victim to his own fierce and fiendish passions.

From the National Anti-slavery Standard.

JUGGLERS OF INDIA.

A juggler, in performing the tree trick, chooses either a small spot of earth, of the extent of two or three feet square, and in the open air, or he takes a large flower-pot, and fills it with mould for his purpose. Either of the ways will do. Having this small plat of earth before him, and spectators ranged around at a distance of two or three feet, the juggler shows to the company a mango stone, or the stone found in the centre of the Eastern fruit known by that name, which varies in size from that of an apple upwards. This stone the juggler then plants in the earth, at the depth of several inches, and covers it up. Not many minutes elapse until the spectators behold a small green shoot arise from the spot. It increases visibly in height and size every moment, until it attains the altitude of a foot or so. It then begins to send off branches from the main stem; on the branches, leaves begin to appear, bearing the natural hue of vegetation. Buds next present themselves; the whole affair, meanwhile, assuming the regular aspect, in every particular, of a miniature tree some four feet high The buds are followed by blossoms, and finally the green fruit of the mango meets the astonished eyes of the spectators. "Look but touch not," is all this time the juggler's word; and he himself also preserves the character of a looker-on. When the fruit has arrived at something like a fair growth for such a tree, the originator of this extraordinary vegetation plucks it and hands it to the spectators. This is the winding up of the charm. The assembled persons handle the fruit, and see nothing in the slightest degree different from the ordinary produce of the mango, elaborated by the slow vegetation of months. Our informant on these points ate a portion of the fruit brought forth by this juggler, and found it to taste exactly like the raw mango. The whole process now detailed usually occupies about a quarter of an hour, from the planting of the stone to the production of the fruit. Though he gives away the fruit, the performer does not part with the tree.—This feat, which is perfectly familiar to all who have been in India, is certainly an extraordinary one, and affords the most effectual evidence of the power of deception to which the race of jugglers has attained.

The feat of sitting, without seeming support, in the air, is one of the few first-rate Indian tricks which have been performed in Europe; but even this is now held somewhat cheap; the mode of performing it being pretty clearly understood. The feat is performed in this way. In the centre of a ring of spectators, stands the juggler with an assistant. When all is ready for the performance the assistant holds an ample cloak or awning over the juggler, which covers him completely for the time. In a few minutes this covering is removed, and the juggler is discovered seated crossed-legged in the air—unsubstantial air—at the height of a foot or so from the ground. He is in the thin dress of his country, and on one of his arms, which is extended horizontally, in form, and which, as well as the other, has a wide sleeve upon it, a fold of a cloak was negligently thrown; the remainder of the cloak hanging to and resting on the ground. The slight contact of the elbow with the cloak is all that connects the man with terestial things. Otherwise, he is totally left in air; and how he maintains himself, there, is inexplicable to appearance: But the cloak alluded to seems to be in careless contact with another cloak, or portion of attire, that rests on the ground father off. Now, it is to be believed, that, at the point where the cloak touches the elbow, a spring of a wonderful kind passes up the sleeve to the arm, and bends down under his body, placing him probably upon a hoop. The other end of the spring passes off and finds its support under the second or father-off cloak. The spring, in all likelihood, can be folded up into divisions, so as to be easily concealed while the awning is thrown over the juggler at the close of the performance, and before he gives liberty to the spectators to examine the spot; which he usually does. This is the received explanation of the feat. but there is some difficulty still in understanding the nature of the weight or support which is placed beneath the cloak. This must evidently be of considerable power to sustain his frame; and how he gets it out of the way is not easily seen. These feasts are the result of surprising art, address, or contrivance; and for such the natives of India certaily far excel the whole world.

From the Presbyterian Advocate.

BENEVOLENT SAILOR BOY.

As a schooner was sailing near Montaug Point, Long Island, during the past year, she was suddenly struck by a heavy gust of wind, upset and instantly sunk. A vessel near by, which had seen the calamity, sent its boat to save from sinking any that had not gone to the bottom. On coming near where the schooner went down, they saw a little boy, twelve yearr old floating on some wood, and went to take him off. As they approached him, with nobleness of soul not often manifested, he exclaimed.

"Never mind me. save the Captain, he has a wife and six children."

The kind hearted boy knew that the Captain's family loved him, and would need his support. Both, however, were saved.

Three days after the vessel was lost, the boy got into a car as it was passing between Boston and Fall River. As he was poor and ragged, some of the passengers who wore fine clothes, slightly shrunk from him. He took his seat quietly, and the sea captain who entered the car with him, told a minister what had happened. In telling the touching story, the captain was much affected, and generously added,

"The boy has only the cloths you see sir, or he would not be so ragged. I care not much for myself, though I too, lost all, but the poor lad will have a hard time of it.'

Several persons who heard the story, gave the poor orphan small sums of money, and advised him to tell others what he had gone through, who would no doubt, give him something. Many boys in his situation would have readily taken the advice, and told the story of their misfortunes in order to get help. But the poor boy only replied, "I am not a beggar, I don't wish to beg their money."

A fine benevolent looking person then arose, and plead the case of the boy in such a warm manner, the passengers gave ten dollars for him. The man who obtained this sum for the poor unfortunate boy, had been a sailor, and sufferer himself, and therefore knew how to pity the distressed

---

NOT TAKING THE DOCTORS ADVICE —Killing a husband with kindness—A foul deed —Among the most disagreeable things attending the practice of the most ardent of all professions—Medicine—are the prejudices the physician must constantly contend with, either in the mind of the patient or that of his friends. It is easier to cure the bodily complaints of a hundred persons, than to eradicate the prejudices from the mind of one. Absurd, ridiculous, and hurtful notions, which have, as it were, grown with them, will adhere to the mind, in spite of all the efforts to root them out.

Visiting a patient a short time ago, says Dr Lambert, (a celebrated physician, late from Cincinati, but now practising in this city,) I perceived a very disagreeable smell, like that of putrid meat, apparently issuing from beneath the bed clothes at the foot of the bed I inquired what it was. "Why," said the good wife, who was attending on her sick husband, 'it's nothing but a dung hill fowl he has got on the bottom of his feet, poor man'

'A dung hill fowl!' exclaimed I, with amazement

'Yes, Doctor,' said she, 'I had the fattest fowl in the barn yard cut open alive, and one half put on one foot, and one half on the other, while it was alive and kicking. It is a charming thing for a fever, Doctor.'

'A live fowl cut open and put on a man's feet to cure the fever! Who put this foolish notion into your head?'

'Foolish notion or not, Doctor, I am sure Mr Tozer is a great deal better of his complairts than he was, poor man, he doesn't sweat so confusely, and he breathes a great deal shorter and quicker than he did.'

'So much the worse, good woman.'

'So you always tells me, Doctor, when I'm doing all I can for the benefit of the sick in my family So you told me when I was stopping the cold of my first husband—the dear, good Mr. Pheeser. Heaven rest his soul, which in spite of all I could do, turned to an information of the lungs, and he is now in his grave, poor man.'

'But what could put it into your head, this shocking remedy of the split fowl?'

'Why it's been in my head ever so long, Doctor My grandmother was cured by it, of a putrified fever, as I've heard my mother say Father was likewise cured by the same remedy, of a dreadful rebellious fever; but just as he was getting on his feet again, he had a prolapse, which carried him off Besides these, my cousin Jonathan Jenkins was cured of an information in the bowels in the same way. Then Mr Thistlesifter, who is very skilful in roots and arbs, and so forth, says there is nothing in the world so good for fever, as the split fowl.'

'A split fool!' I was just going to say; and indeed, if all fools were so, who meddle with that which they know nothing about, the world would be better off. 'Did you give him the medicine I left him?'

'No, Doctor, Mrs. Thistlesifer came here just after you went away, and I couldn't do no less than to insult her in so imminent a crisis; and we came to the conclusion between us, that it was not best to give him the medicine you left —but to put the split fowl on his feet, poor man, and dress him well with pepper grass tea, and a little go-over-ground, and smartweed with it'

'So you didn't give him the medicine I left.'

'No, Doctor; Mrs Thistlesifter and I thought it such an important case, that the split fowl was the principal thing that could be relied on. Besides, to tell the truth, Doctor, we were afeared there was mercury in the medicine, as we noticed a white powder in it'

'Indeed! and so because you and Mrs Thistlesifter noticed a white powder in the medicine, you threw it aside, and split open a live fowl!'

'Yes, Doctor, I do think mercury is a dreadful bad thing. It saves people's lives, to be sure; but then it gets into the bones, as Mrs. Thistlesifter says, and there's no getting it out again as long as you life O! I wouldn't a had Mr Tozer, poor man, to take it for any thing.'

'And so, by following your own and Mrs. Thistlesifter's foolish notions, you've lost your husband'

'Lost him, did you say, Doctor; lost my dear Mr. Tozer!"

'Ay; I grieve to inform you that he wont live forty eight hours!'

'Not forty eight hours, Doctor! not live forty-eight hours! and I've only been married to him a year!'

'I'm very sorry to say there's no hope for him'

'And I laid out so much for my weddin clothes only a year ago. And the dung hill fowl gone too—the fattest rooster in the barn yard. Oh, miserable me! that I should be a widow again so soon!' Saying this, the good woman wrung her hands and wept bittery.

The next day Mr. Tozer died. Mrs Tozer, as in duty bound, wept profusely for his death—but finally comforted herself that she had done everything an affectionate wife could do—having taken the advice of Mrs. Thistlesifter, and having killed the most valuable rooster in the barn yard to save her husband's life.—N. O. South American

From the Pennsylvania Freeman.

HINTS FOR WIVES.

"Obedience is a very small part of conjugal duty, and, in most cases, easily performed. Much of the comfort of a married life depends upon the lady; a great deal more, perhaps, than she is aware of. She scarcely knows her own influence; how much she may do by persuasion—how much by sympathy—how much by unremitted kindness and little attention. To acquire and retain such influence, she must, however, make her conjugal duties her first object. She must not think that any thing will do for her husband—that any wine is good enough for her husband—that it is not worth while to be agreeable when there is only her husband by—that she may close her piano, or lay aside her brush, for why should she play or paint merely to amuse her husband?—No—she must consider all these little arts of pleasing chiefly valuable on this account—as means of perpetuating her attractions, and giving permanence to his affection—she must remember that her duty consists not so much in great and solitary acts—in display of the sublime virtues to which she will only be occasionly called; but in trifles—in a cheerful smile, or a minute attention naturally rendered, and proceeding from a heart full of kindness, and a temper full of amiability."

In looking over a late paper, I met with the above valuable hints on the duties of wives to their lords' pointing out the mode in which they were to secure, in the husband, the chivalric devotion which had characterized the lover. The most infallible specific, or the one most strongly insisted upon in rules of this kind, is a "smiling countenance." No matter what a wife's annoyances may have been during the day, her countenance must always be wreathed in smiles on the approach of her husband.

Being one of those fortunate individuals, who have hitherto escaped the noose, I have had leisure to give to these subjects that profound reflection which characterieses those situated like myself.

"For if there's anything in which I shine
'Tis in arranging all my friends' affairs
Not having of my own domestic cares.

It has often occurred to me therefore, that it was rather singular that all this good advice should always come from one side. How is it that there are so few guide-posts to point the way to innocent young gentlemen, who have recently submitted their neck to "the noose and the halter?" Why is it not of enormous use upon, that the husband should always return to his fireside with a smile, and endeavour to soothe the perturbed spirit, that has for hours been subjected to the thousand annoyances of the nursery and the kitchen?

There is many an unfortunate Mrs. Rogers among my acquaintance, with "nine small children and one at the breast," who need all the soothing tenderness erst bestowed by the lover, to enable them to forget the troubles so wearing to the nerves—by the way it has sometimes occurred to me whether it was not Mrs. Rogers who was the martyr and honest John a most fortunate individual, to get so well "out of the scrape" of being obliged to make adequate provision for the filling those ten small mouths and the clothing those ten small bodies.

Compare for a moment the lot of Husbands and Wives, in what is called a "well regulated family;" the former takes his seat at the breakfast table where his taste and comfort has been silently consulted, so far as is practicable—on his wife devolves the care of preparing the "nine small children" to take their seats there also, and in some degree of regulating their conduct. Breakfast ended, the husband goes forth to his workshop, his counter, his counting house or his office, greets pleasantly his acquaintances by the way, and passes the day among the evervarying scenes of every day business life. The wife, meanwhile, amid incessant clamor, must renew the treadmill task of yesterday—must wash the same faces, make the same beds, sweep the same rooms; must give directions for the succeeding meals and perhaps assist in preparing them; must settle disputes in the kitchen, and quarrels among the nine fallen little sons and daughters of her Adam—and amid all these occupational moments to "stitch" the innumerable garments needed in a family.

Let her look to it, according to the supient and oft reiterated advice above alluded to, that she gets through all this in time to clothe her harrassed and care-worn visage in those "wreathed smiles" so indispensable toward maintaining the good humor of her liege lord. He too has had troubles to encounter for from trouble no one is exempt—but not of that petty har a sing kind, that are wearing away the spirits and the life of the partner he has chosen.

Night comes—the husband finds the repose so much needed, to enable him to meet the unavoidable cares of to morrow, and sleeps as quietly as "the babes in the woods," while the wife starts at the slightest noise, to minister to the comfort of the restless inmates of the trundel bed and the crib, all of whom are sure to be astir at the earliest dawn, and demanding the immediate care of the mother, who rose weary and unrefreshed again to go through the same routine——truly she should smile! whether she always can, is a debateable question. I insist, therefore, that the husband should have a full share of the praise so lavishly bestowed on the wife.

Until a better state of things can be brought about, I am firmly resolved to continue.

AN OLD MAID.

From the National Anti-slavery Standard.

WHITE AND BROWN BREAD.

Several years ago, we threw out the surmise that the separation of the white from the brown parts of wheat grain was likely to be baneful to health. We proceeded upon theoretical grounds, believing Providence must have contemplated our using the entire grain, and not a portion only, selected by means of a nicely-arranged machinery. It struck us forcibly, that to go on, for a long course of years thus using a kind of food different from what nature designed, could not fail to be attended with bad consequences. We have since learned that our views have some recognized support in science. The following paragraph from a recent pamphlet, will at once serve to keep the subject alive in the minds of our readers, and explain the actual grounds on which the separation of flour is detrimental:

"The general belief," says the writer, "is, that bread made with the finest flour is the best, and that whiteness is the proof of its quality; but both these opinions are popular errours. The whiteness may be, and generally is, communicated by alum, to the injury of the consume; and it is known by men of science that the bread of unrefined flour will not. Keep a man on brown bread and water, and he will live and enjoy good health; give him white bread and water only, and he will gradually sicken and die. The meal of which the first is made contains nourishment of the various structure composing our bodies. Some of these ingredients are removed by the miller in his efforts to please the public; so that fine flour, instead of being better than the meal, is the least nourishing; and to make the case worse, it is also the most difficult of digestion. The loss is, therefore, in all respects a waste; and it seems desirable that the admirers of white bread (but especially the poor) should be made acquainted with these truths, and brought to inquire whether they do not purchase at too dear a rate the privilege of indulging in the use of it. The unwise preference given so universally to white bread, led to the pernicious practice of mixing alum with the flour, and this again to all sorts of adulterations and impositions; for it enabled bakers, who were so disposed, by adding more and more alum, to make bread made from flour of an inferior grain, look like the best or most costly, and to dispose of it accordingly; at once defrauding the purchaser, and tampering with his health. Among the matters removed by the miller are the large saline substances, which are indispensable to the growth of the bones and teeth, and are required, although in a less degree, for daily repair. Brown bread should, therefore, be given to nurses, and to the young or the growing, and should be preferred by all, of whatever, age, whose bones show a tendency to bend, or who have weak teeth. It is believed that brown bread, will generally be found the best by all persons having sluggish bowels and stomachs equal to the digestion of the brain. But with some it will disagree; for it is too exciting to irritable bowels, and is dissolved with difficulty in some stomachs. When this happens, the brain should be removed, either wholly or in part; and by such means the bread may be adopted with the greatest ease, to all habits and all constitutions."

Mr. Smith, in his late remarkable work on Fruits and Farinacea as the food of man, gives some illustrations of this doctrine. "Bulk," he says, "is nearly as necessary to the articles of diet as the nutrient principle. They should be so managed that one will be in proportion to the other. Too highly nutritive diet is probably as fatal to the prolongation of life and health, as that which contains an insufficient quantity of nourishment. It is a matter of common remark among old whalemen, that during their long voyages, the coarser their bread the better their health. 'I have followed the seas for thirty-five years,' said an intelligent sea captain to Mr. Graham, 'and I have been in almost every part of the globe; and have always found that the coarsest pilot bread, which contains a considerable portion of bran is decidedly the healthiest for my men.' 'I am convinced, from my experience,' says another captain, 'that bread made of the unbolted wheat meal is far more wholesome than that made of the best superfine flour—the latter always tending to produce constipation.' Captain Dexter of the ship Isis, belonging to Providence arrived from China in December, 1804. He has been about one hundred and ninety days on the passage. The sea-bread which constituted the principle article of food for his men was made of the best superfine flour. He had not been long at sea before his men began to complain of languor, loss of appetite, and debility. The difficulties continued to increase during the whole voyage; and several of the hands died on the passage of debility and inanition. The ship was obliged to come to an anchor about thirty miles below Providence; and such was the debility of the men on board, that they were not able to get the ship under weigh again' and the owners were under the necessity of sending men down from Providence to work her up. When she arrived, the owners asked Captain Dexter what was the cause of the sickness of his men. He replied, 'The bread was too good.'"

CLOCKS REGULATED BY LIGHTNING.—One of the most wonderful exhibitions of the power of the Electro Telegraph is shown in the regulation and running of clocks, placed far apart from each other. It is stated in a foreign journal, that "a clock has been so arranged in Edinburgh, by its connection with the magnetic wires, that the oscilations of its pendulum mark the hours on a dial plate in Glasgow, and upon another in Edinburgh, at one and the same moment. So perfect is its operation, that the electrical current passes from one city to the other in a second of time not perceptible, since the two clocks never vary perceptibly. When the pendulum in Edinburgh moves to the right, the magnetised rod in Glasgow moves in the same direction, and both return together to the left. Two other clocks are also to be placed in the intermediate stations of Linlithgow and Falkirk, to be regulated by the one in Edinburgh. It is proposed, as soon as all the railroad lines are supplied with telegraphic wires along their whole extent, to establish the general regulator in Greenwich, which will mark a uniform time upon the several stations upon every railroad in the whole kingdom. In this manner, the whole country will know the exact Greenwich time and thus will be obviated all the present danger arising from disagreement in watches, and the sad catastrophes they have not unfrequently occasioned, by mistakes in the departures of trains."

THE WIFE, A BEING TO COME HOME TO—And after all, what is it that man seeks in the companionship of a woman? An influence like the gentle dew, and the cheering light more felt throughout the whole existence, in its softening, healing, harmonizing power, than can be acknowledged by a single act, or recognized by any certain rule. It is in fact a being to come home to in the happiest of that expression. Poetic lays of ancient times were wont to tell how the bold warrior, returning from the fight, would doff his plumed helmet, and reposing from his toils, lay bare his weary limbs that woman's hand might pour into their wounds the healing balm.

But never wearied knight nor warrior covered with the dust of the battle field was more in need of woman's soothing power, than those care-worn sons of the soil, who struggle for the bread of life in our more peaceful and enlightened days.—And still, though the romance of the castle, the helmet, the waving plume, and the—

"Clarion, wild and high,"

may all have vanished from the scene, the charm of woman,s influence lives as brightly in the picture of domestic joy, as when she placed the wreath of victory on the hero's brow. Nay, more so, for there are deeper sensibilities at work, thoughts more intense, in our great theatre of intellectual and moral strife, than were the contest for martial fame, and force of arms procured for each competitor his share o glory or of wheatth.

Among all changes which have taken place in the condition of mankind, it is then not the least of woman's privileges, that she can still be all to man when his necessities require; that can retire from the tumult of the world, and seek her society with a zest which nothing can impair, so long as she receives him with a true and faithful heart—true to the best and kindest impulses of which her nature is capable; and sacred to the faithful trust committed to her care.

And that it is so, how many a home can witness—how many a fireside welcome—how many a happy meeting after absence painfully prolonged. Yes there are scenes within the precincts of the household hearth which no the less because no stranger's eye beholds them, repay and richly too, days of weary conflict, and long nights of anxious care. But who shall paint them? and those who hold the picture there in all its beauty, vividness, and truth, would scarcely wish to draw aside the veil which screens it from the world.

PRETTY PREACHING

I am tormented with the desire of preaching better than I can.

But I have no wish to make fine, pretty sermons. Prettiness is well enough when prettiness is in place. I like to see a pretty child, a pretty flower; but in a sermon, prettiness is out of place. To my ear it would be any thing but commendation, should it be said to me, "You have given us a pretty sermon." If I were upon trial for my life, and my advocate should amuse the jury with his tropes and figures, burying his argument beneath a profusion of the flowers of rhetoric, I would say to him—"Tut man, you care more for your vanity than for my hanging. Put yourself in my place—speak in view of the gallows, and you will tell your story plainly and earnestly." I have no objection to a lady's winding a sword with ridands, and studding it with roses, when she presents it to her hero lover; but in the day of battle he will tear away the ornaments, and use a naked edge on the enemy.—Rev. Robt. Hall.

THE FARMER—With no inheritance but health, with no riches but industry, and no ambition but virtue, he is the sole king among men, and the only man among kings.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA. APRIL 2 1847

The emigrants by the "Roanoke" who came to the colony in December 1845, have not idled away their time. The greater part of them went to work on their farms, with a determination to gain an honest and independent livelihood; and we are quite certain that they have succeeded. Their cottages and farms present to the most indifferent observer an air of contentment not often seen.

We are told that two vessels have lately been launched at Bassa Cove; and that they will be in our port in a few days. We congratulate the Bassa Covians on this addition to their commercial marine.

DROWNED.—We are informed by Col. N. M. Hicks, of this town, that on the 29th, ultimo Monsieur Frogerays commander of the French Brig of war "Comete;"—and a Monsieur Fombrouge master of the French merchant schooner "L. Bonne, from Gore," and and four sailors were drowned in attempting to cross the bar at the Gallenas. The commander left the Comete in one of his own boats; but at the solicitation of the master of the schooner, took a seat with him. A very few minutes after the exchange, the merchantman's boat capsized. We understand that the body of the commander has been found.

It is reported here by Samuel Lovett master of the American Brig "Hollander," that the English force stationed off New Cesters; intends in a few days to destroy the slave establishment at that place; and that the chief officer in command of that force, has given notice to the Honorable John Day superintendant of public affairs at Grand Bassa of the fact.

No official notice has been received by the Executive from the superintendent in reference to this reported movement—consequently we are left in doubt as to its correctness.

We hope, however, that the report is true, and that there will be no delay in breaking up and puting a stop to the traffic in slaves in that quarter.

NAVAL.

March 18. Arrived H. B. M. Sloop "Favorite" Captain Murray from the windward, and sailed on the 20th for Ascension.

March 24th The United States Frigate "United States," Captain Joseph Smoot bearing the broad pennant of Commodore George C. Read, from Porto Praya.—all well.

The United States sailed on the 2nd inst. for Cape Palmas via Sinoe.

AN AFFLICTIVE BEREAVEMENT

Departed this life on the 9th inst., MRS ANN consort of Rev. Wm. H. Payne, missionary at Jamaica, after an illness of but two days. About four days before her death, she began to complain of an unpleasant sensation in her head, which increased until it resulted in congestion of the brain, which deprived her of consciousness most of the time for the last two days of her life. She has been a worthy member of the Baptist church in this place for the last five or six years.

The circumstances were very painful to her surviving husband. He left her, and their infant son about seven weeks since, both in usual health. When symptoms became alarming, a messenger was immediately despatched for her husband; about twenty five miles distant but he did not arrive until an hour after her burial. His feelings may be imagined but not described. We bespeak for him and her surviving friends an interest in the prayers of the faithful. We presume a more extended notice will be furnished, by some one acquainted with her.—Africa's Luminary.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile business under the firm of Samuel F. McGill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MCGILL,
R. S. MCGILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

DIED.

At Marshall on the 10th ult. Mr. Randolph Cooper, after a long, lingering illness.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	8	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	33 1-3
Beef, cargo No. 1,	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Baffs,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	25	30
Boards,	1000*ft*	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	12 1-2	18 3-4
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Chocks domestic,	Ps	12 1-2	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 1-2
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 32
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	10 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	10 00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1-3	34
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2	25
Romauls	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 00	3 75
Tobacco	100*lbs*	9 00	10 00
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00	5 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	10 00
Wine champaigne	"	15 00	20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

March 18. Col. sloop Nathan Bangs, Ammons master, from windward.

" 19. Col. sloop Perseverance, Jones master from windward,

" 23. Am. brig Hollander, Lovett master, from Boston; via, Sierra Leone, passenger C. Goedelt Esq.

27. French ship Quos-Ego, Colin master, from Nantes.

" " Col Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, from Junk.

" 29. British steamer —— Tonsley master, from Sierra Leone.

" 30. Am. barque Montgomery, Hooper master, from leeward; passenger, H. W. Dennis.

DEPARTURES.

March 28. Am. brig Hollander, Lovett, master for leeward.

" 30. Am. schooner Mary Wilks, W H. Folger master, for New-Orleans.

" " Col. sloop Nathan Bangs Ammons master, for leeward.

" " Col. Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master for leeward.

" 31. French ship Quos-Ego, Colin master, for leeward.

" " British steamer —— Townsley master, for leeward.

POETRY.

From the Pennsylvania Freeman.

THE ERRING.

BY JULIA A. FLETCHER.

Deal gently with the erring!
Ye know not the power,
With which the dark temptation came
In some unguarded hour.
Ye may not know how earnestly
They struggled, or how well,
Until the hour of weakness came,
And sadly thus they fell.

Think gently of the erring!
Oh, do not thou forget,
However darkly stained by sin,
He is thy brother yet.
Heir of the self same heritage;
Child of the self-same God;
He hath but stumbled in the path
Thou hast in weakness trod.

Speak gently to the erring!
Oh, is it not enough
That innocence and peace are gone,
Without thy censure rough?
It sure must be a weary lot—
That sin-crushed heart to bear;
And they who share a happier fate,
Their chidings well may spare.

Speak kindly to the erring!
Thou may'st yet lead them back,
With holy words and tones of love,
From misery's thorny track!
Forget not thou hast often sinned,
And sinful yet must be;—
Deal gently with the erring one
As God hath dealt with thee!

MISCELLANEOUS

INFLUENCE OF VEGETABLE DIET ON LONGEVITY.

It is said that in no other part of the would (in proportion to the population are there more evidences of extreme longevity than among the Norwegian peasantry, who scarcely ever taste animal food. In the severe climate of Russia, also, where the inhabitants live on a coarse vegetable diet, there are a great many instances of advanced age. The late returns of the Greek Church population of the Russian empire give (in the table of the deaths of the male sex) more than one thousand above a hundred years of age; many between one hundred and a hundred and forty; and four between one hundred and forty and one hundred and fifty. It is stated that whatever age the Mexican Indians live they never become gray-haired. They are represented as peaceable cultivators of the soil: subsisting constantly on vegetable food; often attaining a hundred years of age, yet still green and vigorous. Of the South American Indians, Ulloa says:—"I myself have known several who at the age of a hundred were still very robust and active, which unquestionably must in some measure be attributed to the perfect sameness and simplicity of their food." Both the Peruvian Indians and Creoles are remarkbly long-lived, and retain their faculties to a very advanced age. Slaves in the West Indies are recorded from a hundred and thirty to a hundred and fifty years of age.—Smith's Fruits and Farinaces.

THE HUMAN BODY

The architect will, upon examination find that his splendid arches, his strougly built pillars are merely copies, and rude ones too, of certain parts in our osseous system! The musician has only to study the arrangement of the human apparatus of voice, and he cannot fail to perceive an original model of every stringed or wind instrument with which he is acquainted. The mariner may proudly regard his last invanted pulleys, his most improved rigging-tackle; but what are these but imitations of the tendons of the human body? The optician may invent his instruments ever so scientifically, and grind his lenses ever so nicely, but he will fail in attaining the same perfection either in neatness or transparency, as is presented by the parts which enter into the compcsition of the eye. Lastly, the mechanician owes his knowledge of valves and pumps, to the contrivances contained in our circulation; and the watchmaker constructs his barrel-chain, having for his model the backdone of the serpent. I trust to have the pleasure of demonstrating these truths to you, and of convincing you that many of the so-called original designs of man, are but barbarous copies of designs which emanate from the master hand of the Almighty.—Dr. Ashenheim.

HISTORY OF THE BEARD.

Of the antiquity of the custom of wearing the beard, there can be but little doubt, since unless Adam was the first barber, as well as gardener he must have worn the old ornament to his chin with which God had furnished him, though nothing has shown the mutability of fashion more than to cut color and curl, since the creation of man. The Jews have, perhaps been more constant to the beard, of any nation, having worn it from the time of the Patriarchs till within a few years back; nay, with them the cut of the beard was a sacred duty—to shave it was a sign of mourning, and to pluck it an insult. The early Greeks wore the beard long, as also for a short period did the Romans. The British at one period, (when Cæsar invaded Britain) clipped the beard close, and wore only the moustache. The Saxons who first arrived on our island must have been an extremely fierce looking race, since their whiskers and moustaches are described as of immense length reaching to the breast. William the Conquerer ordered all the men to shave in England, though he himself continued to wear a short beard and moustache. King Stephen, Henry the Second, Richard the First, and John, all wore their beards according to their several tastes! Henry the Third was clean shaven; Edward the First and Second both were fastidious in the arrangements of their beards and moustaches; as were also all the beaux and courtiers during their reign; crisping them with hot irons, and taking great pains with their cut and curl. In Richard the Second's reign we observed the forked beard of the Chaucer fashion. During the reigns of Edward the Sixth and Richard the Third, men wore their faces ad libitum; Richmond shaved; Henry the Eighth sported a till-shaved beard, like the one described as ornamenting the chin of Hudibras; in the succeeding reign we recognized a beard pertaining to the countenance of that wondrous mortal, the slightest glance of whose face of genius and beauty (enshrined as it is in all English hearts) facinates the eye wherever his picture hangs in our halls, and we bless heaven that we speak the tongue that Shakspeare wrote. During Elizabeth's reign men of all parties appear to have been extremely choice in the shape of their beards—Each profession seems to have been peculiarly barbed. The courtier, scholar, soldier, and priest, had each their own peculiar twist of moustache. Men even swore by their beards in the good old days of Queen Bess, for what says the Bard—"Stand you forth now, stroke your chin and swear by your beards that I am a knave."—The squash buckler and bully, we presume, were furnished, as it is customary to represent a "pistol" upon the beards, with a beard like a toppice of brushwood and moustache of most formidable twirl; many cashiered rascals, with hearts as white as snow' "wearing upon their chins the beard of Hercules." In fact, according to some authorities men were at that time so careful of their chins, that it was no uncommon thing for them to be encassed at night lest they should turn in bed and rumple their beards out of proper form during sleep. The soldier, during Elizabeth's reign, was perhaps more solicitous to sport an ample vallace upon his face than any other profession, and we find him accordingly in the "Seven Ages of Man," described as "bearded like a pard" when on service; and again, when stern alarms had changed to merry meetings, we find the old ornament of the warrior's cheek stuffing some botcher's cushion.

HINDOOS AND CHINESE: PURCHASED SUBSTITUTES FOR TORTURE AND DEATH.

—In what country could wretches be found who, for a small payment, would allow themselves to be hung on a rope by two sharp iron hooks inserted in the flesh of their backs, and to be whirled rapidly about in the air? Every spring, at one of the religious festivals, there are men who willingly undergo this torture, being paid by rich hypocrites, who hope to save their souls by these vicarious mortfications; and they go through the whole without a groan, some of them even singing. After being cured of their wounds, they are ready to undergo the same process the following year Yet they are not martyrs cheered under their sufferings by the prospect of heavenly beatitude They know perfectly well that their reward will be ten pounds. The Chinese go still further. They not only torture themselves by deputy, but sometimes suffer decapitation in the same commodious manner. A rich man coudemned to lose his head, is allowed to find a substitute, who shall suffer in his stead, and he finds one! Nor is it merely decapitation which the man has to undergo, but he is usually tortured before he receives the final blow. A man sells himself in China to the executioner to find bread for his family, just as in Europe he devotes himself to the chances of war. What must be the love of such a man for his family, or the obtuseness of his physical sensibility? The one and the other are to us alike incomprehensible. Jacquemont's Voyage dans l' Inde.

SACREDNESS OF TEARS —There is a sacredness in tears. They are not the mark of weakness but of power. They speak more eloquently than ten thousand tongues. They are the messengers of overwhelming grief, of deep contrition and of unspeakable love.

Oh! speak not harshly of the stricken one—weeping in silence! Break not the deep solemnity by rude laughter, or intrusive footsteps. Scoff not if the stern heart of manhood is sometimes melted to tears of sympathy—they are what help to elevate him above the brute I love to see tears of affection. They are painful tokens, but awful pleasure! If there were none on earth to shed a tear for me, I should be loth to live; and if no one might weep over my grave, I could never die in peace.—Dr. Johnson.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S STONE.

The eccentric, but brilliant, John Randolph, once rose suddenly up in his seat in the House of Representatives, and screamed out at the top of his shrill voice, "Mr. Speaker! Mr. Speaker! I have discovered the philosopher's stone. It is Pay as you go!"

John Randolph dropped many gems from his mouth, but never a richer one than that.

"Pay as you go," and you need not dodge sheriff's and constables.

"Pay as you go," and you can walk the streets with an erect back and a manly front and you have no fear of those you meet. You can look at any man in the eye without flinching. You wont have to cross the highway to avoid a dun, or look intently into the shop windows to avoid seeing a creditor.

"Pay as you go," and you can snap your finger at the world, and when you laugh, it will be a hearty, honest one. It seems to us sometimes that we can almost tell the laugh of a poor debtor. He looks around as though he was in doubt whether the laugh was not the property of his creditors, and not included in articles "exempted from attachment." When he does succeed in getting out an abortion of a laugh—for it is nothing but an abortion—he appears frightened, and looks as though he expected it would be pounced upon by a constable.

"Pay as you go," and you will meet smiling faces at home—happy, cherry-cheeked smiling children—a contented wife—a cheerful hearth-stone.

John Randolph was right. It is the philosopher's stone.

True Nobility.—We find, says the Boston Transcript, a most beautiful anecdote of a man in an elevated station, with whose name Europe is now reechoing, and whose good deeds to his nation seem to warm the hearts of those who love virtue and justice in America It purports to be an abstract of a letter from Rome, and is published in an English paper It runs to the effect, that a man was arrested in Rome whilst distributing clandestinely a pamphlet entitled, "History of Pius IX, the Enemy of Religion and Chief of Young Italy." When the Pope heard of his arrest he ordered the man to be brought before him. After interrogating the offender his Holiness remarked, "As your faults affect only myself, I pardon you" The man fell at the feet of the Pope, and offered to reveal the names of the authors of the pamphlet but the Pope replied, "Let their faults be buried in silence, and may repentance touch their hearts!"

This, adds the Transcript, is one of the most touching instance of character exalted and elevated by purity and Chistian love, that we ever remember to have seen. It shows the highest moral dignity, and, we might almost say, the very "beauty of holiness."

A GOOD ANECDOTE —As the good Deacon A. on a cold morning in January, was riding by the house of his neighbor F, the latter was chopping wood and threshing his hands at his door. The usual salutations were exchanged, and the severity of the weather briefly discussed, and the horseman made demonstrations of passing on, when his neighbor detaining him with,

"Don't be in a hurry, Deacon; would'nt you like a glass of good old Jamaica this cold morning?"

"Thank you kindly," said the old gentleman, at the same time beginning to dismount with all the deliberation becoming a Deacon; I don't care if, do."

"Ah, don't trouble yourself to get off, Deacon said the wag, "I merely asked for information—we havn't a single drop of rum in the house."

WITTY.—A noble Lord asked a clergyman once, at the bottom of his table—"Why the goose, if there was one, was always placed next the parson? "Really," said he, "I can give no reason for it; but your question is so odd, I shall never see a goose again without thinking of your Lordship."

IMPORTANT TO THE LADIES —The London Gazette contains some important information for the ladies, with regard to the manner of placing their lips, when they desire to look amiable, dignified, etc. It suggests that when a lady would compose her mouth to a bland and serene charactor, she should, just before entering the room, say Besom, and keep the expression into which the mouth subsides until the desired effect upon the company is evident. If, on the other hand, she wishes to assume a distinguished and somewhat noble bearing, not suggestive of sweetness, she should say Brush, the result of which is infallible. If she would make her mouth look small and pretty, she must say, Flip, but if the mouth be already too small and need enlarging, she must say, Cabbage. Ladies, when having their daguerreotypes taken may observe these rules with some advantage.

EFFECTS OF SCIENCE —We saw a newspaper boy carefully shunning every famale who chanced to come in his way as he was selling his papers along Market street, yesterday morning. One of his fellows asked him what he did it for. "Why," said the itinerant vender of news, "did'nt you read in the papers that cotton had been discovered to be explosive I dare'nt go behind a woman with a bustle on."—Pitts. Chron.

ABUSE —Plutarch, in his admirable biographies tells us that Cato, the Censor, being scurrillously treated by a fellow who led a licentious and dissolute life, said to him quietly, "a contest between thee and me is very unequal—for thou canst bear ill language with ease, and return it with pleasure—but for my part, 'tis unusual for me to hear it, and disagreeable to speak it."

A CHINESE ANECDOTE--An Emperor of China had devoted himself to the study of alchemy. An impostor brought him an elixir, declaring that if he would drink it, he would become immortal. A Mandarin present having, in vain, tried to undeceive him, took the cup, and drank off the liquor. The Emperor, enraged at this presumption, condemned him to death. "Sire," answered the Mandarin, 'if this liquor can bestow immortality, you cannot put me to death; if it does not, what harm have I done!' This speech appeased the Emperor, who admired and praised the wisdom of his minister.

NAMES.—Emma is from the German signifies a nurse; Caroline from the Latin, noble minded; George from Greek, a farmer; Martha, from Hebrew, bitterness; the beautful though common name Mary, is Hebrew, and means a drop of salt, a tear, Sophia, from Greek, wisdom; Susan, from Hebrew a lily: Thomas, from Heberew, a twin; Robert, from German famous in council

LOVE.—The following beautiful sentiments are from the pen of Harriet Mertineau a maiden lady, verging, it is believed, on her third score of years Whether she has experienced the feeling so eloquently and beautifully described, we know not, but we have rarely met with so delightful a picture as she has drawn A contemporary truly remarks that 'her sentiments are pure and hearty, and to realize them in their fulness is like revelling among the roses of life.' "There needs no other proof," she says, "that happiness is the most wholesome moral atmosphere, and that in which the immorality of man is destined ultimately to thrive, than the elevation of soul, the religious aspiration which attends the first assurance, the first sober certainty of true love. The Statesman is the leader of a nation; the warrior is the grace of an age; the philosopher is the birth of a thousand years; but the lover—where is he not? Wherever parents look round upon their children there he has been; wherever children are at play together there he is or will be; wherever there are roofs, under which men dwell—wherever there is an atmosphere vibrating with human voices there is the lover, and there is his lofty worship going on—unspeakable, but revealed in the brightness of his eye, the majesty of the presence, and the high temper of the discourse. True love continues and will continue to send up its homage amidst the meditations of every eventide, and the busy hum of noon and the songs of morning stars."

HOW TO FIND A WIFE —When a young woman, while in the act of sweeping approaches you with kind words and gracious looks and politely requests you to move, for she wants to sweep where you are sitting, depend upon it, she is the girl, you want so far, certainly, as temper is concerned; for never is a woman so petulant, so domineering as when she has a broom in her hand, except it is when she has a mop.—Hampshire Herald.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) JUNE 4 1847. NO. 16

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

From the London Sun.

THE SEA-SERPENT.

After all the jokes and jeers at the expense of American skippers, it now appears that the Sea Serpent is to take rank amongst the veritable marvels and monsters of the great deep. The sober and serious Northmen have again taken his case in hand, and come forward to vouch for his character. The following circumstantial narrative of his visits to the fjords of Norway, published in the Norwegian papers, and attested by clergymen, lawyers, booksellers, printers and others.

In the neighborhood of Christiansand and Molde, in the province of Romsdal, several presons, highly respectable and creditable witnesses, have reported that they have seen this animal. In general they state that it has been seen in the larger Norwegian fjords, seldom in the open sea. In the large bight of the sea at Christiansand it has been seen every year, though only in the warmest season, in the dog days, and then only when the weather was prefectly calm and the surface of the water unruffled. The following persons whose names are here mentioned, give the subjoined testimony:—Niles Roe, workman at Mr. Wm Knudzton's, relates: I saw the serpent twice, once at noon, and two days afterwards towards the evening, in the fjord at the back of Mr. Knudzton's garden. The first time it was about a hundred feet distant. It swam first along the fjord, then afterwards direct over to the spot where I stood. I observed it for above half an hour. Some strangers who were on the opposite shore fired at it, when it disappeared. The second time it was further from me. It was small, perhaps twice as long as this room (about 44 feet); while swimming it made serpentine movements some to the side others up and down I cannot state what thickness it was, but it appeared to be about as thick as a common snake in proportion to its length. I was thinner toward the tail. The head was several times slightly elevated above the surface of the water. The front of the head was rather pointed, the eyes were sharp, and glistening like those of a cat. From the back of the head a mane like that of a horse commenced, which waved backwards and forwards in the water. The color of the animal was a blackish brown. John Johnson (merchant, about 90 years of age); I saw the animal some years since in the fjord, it was about a thousand paces distant when nearest to me. It swam very swiftly, in the same time that we rowed about a quarter of a mile to the side from it, it had swam about double the distance. I saw it most plainly when it swam in a semicircle round a tolerably large rock that obstructed its passage, in doing this it partly raised itself above the surface of the water. Its color was blacksih brown, and about the length of this house (55 feet.) With the exception of the head, I did not remark much of the body, as that appeared but little above the surface. Judging from what I observed, I should say that the thickness of the body was about that of a stout man. The agitation it caused in the water was very strong. Its movements were serpentine, up an down like a leech swimming. Lars Johnoen (fisherman at Smoelen about 50 years of age.) I have several times seen the sea serpent, but some time since, twelve years ago, in the dog-days in the fjord not far from here; I was fishing in my boat. I saw it twice in the course of two hours, and for some time quite near me. It came close to my boat, so that it was about six feet from me. I became alarmed, recommended my soul to God, laid down in the boat, and only held my head so far over it that I could observe the serpent.

It swam now past the boat, that was agitatad by the ripple caused by its movement in the water; which was previously smooth, and afterward removed itself. After it had swam a considerable distance from me, I began again to fish. Not long afterwards the serpent came close to the boat, which now was strongly agitated by its movements in the water. I laid down and remained quite still, and notwithstanding my fright, kept a watchful eye on the aoimal, it passsd me, disappeared, and returned, though not so close as previously, and disappeared entirely, when a light wind arose and ruffled the water. Its length was about five to six fathoms, and the body, which was round as a serpent's, was about two feet in diameter. The tail seemed to be very round. The head was about as long as a brandy anker (ten gallon cask) and about the same thickness, it was not pointed but round. The eyes were very large, round and sparkling. Their size was about the diameter of the box here. (5 inches) and they were as red as my handkerchief, (crimson) Close behind the head a mane, like a horse's commenced along the neck, and spread itself on both sides, right and left, while swimming on the water, it was of tolerable long hair. The mane as well as the head and rest of the body, was brown as this looking-glass frame, (old mahogany) Spots stripes of other colors I did not observe, nor were there any scales, it seemed as if the body was quite smooth. Its movements were occasionally fast and slow, which latter was the case when it neared my boat, I could clearly observe it, it was serpent like, and moved up and down. The few undulations which those parts of the body and tail that were out of water made, were scarcely a fathom in length. Those undulations were not so high that I could not see between them and the water. When Lars Johnoen had given this explanation, he was shown the drawing which Pontoppidan had given of the animal. He looked at it with astonishment, smiled and said he found a great resemblance between it and the animal he had seen. He likewise said, that some of the other sea serpents he had seen were a great deal longer than the one above described.

M. Wm. Knudzton and Candidatus Theologiœ Bochium, gave the following which account:—We together saw the sea serpent in a narrow fjord, at the distance of a bout one sixteenth of a mile (half an English mile,) for about a quarter of an hour; afterwards it dived, and came up so far from us that we could not see it plainly. The water was smooth as a mirror, and the animal had, as it moved on the surface, the appearance of a serpent. Its motions were in undulations, and so strong that white foam appeared before it, and at the side which stretched out several fathoms. It did not appear very high above the water, and its length was quite discernable. Once it stretched its head quite erect in the air. The body was somewhat dark, and the head nearly black; it had nearly the form of an eel, or snake, and a length of about 100 feet, and in proportion to it; an inconsiderable thickness. The breadth diminished remarkably from the head, so much so that the tail ended in a point. The head was long, and small in proportion to the throat, as the latter appeared much greater than the former, probably as it was furnished with a mane. Foged (sheriff) Gottsche made the following remarks:—"I saw the sea-serpent for some time in a small fjord, first from a boat, afterwards from the beach, several minutes, at a distance of from thirty to thirty-six feet. In the beginning it swam round the fjord at Torvig, afterwards it went in the deeps. I saw its head stretched considerably out of the water. I remarked as well two or three undulations of the fore part of the body. Its motion was not like that of an eel, but consisted of waving undulations, up and down. They were exceedingly strong, and caused tolerable large waves; they were the largest at the fore part of the animal, and toward the back gradually lessened. The traces of them I discerned in a length of eight or ten fathoms. The head seemed blunted and had the form and size of a ten gallon cask; the undulations of the body were round, and about the dimensions of a good timber stock, (12 to 14 inches square) The entire length of the animal I could not judge, as it was not possible to observe the extremity. Its color appeared to be dark gray. At the back of the head there was a mane, which was the same color as the rest of the body.

The writer of this article received letters from Mr. Sinoran Knudizon, stating that a sea-serpent had been seen in the neighborhood of Christiansand by several people, and from Dr. Hoffmann, a respectable surgeon in Molde, lying on a considerable fjord to the south of Christiansand, rector of Hammer, Mr. Kraft, curate, and several persons very clearly saw, while on a journey, a sea-serpent of considerable length.

The Rev. Mr. Deinboll, Archdeacon of Molde, gives the following account of one which was seen last summer near Molde. The 28th of July, 1845 J. C. Lund, bookseller and printer, G. S. Krogh, merchant, Christian Flang, Lund's apprentice, and John Elgenses, laborer were out on Romsdale-fjord, fishing. The sea was, after a warm sun-shiny day, quite calm. About 7 o'clock in the afternoon, a little distance from the shore, near the ballast place and Molde House, they saw a long marine animal which slowly moved itself forward, as it appeared to them, with the help of two fins, on the fore part of the body nearest the head, which they judged from the boiling of the water on both sides of it. The visible part of the body appeared to be between forty and fifty feet in length, and moved in undulation like a snake. The body was round, and of a dark color, and seemed to be several ells (an ell is two feet in thickness. As they discerned a waving motion in the water behind the animal, they concluded that part of the body was concealed under water. That it was one connected animal, they saw plainly from its movement. When the animal was about 100 yards from the boat, they noticed tolerably correctly its fore part, which ended in a sharp snout; its colossial head raised itself above the water in the form of a semicircle; the lower part was not visible. The color of the head was dark brown, and the skin smooth. They did not notice the eyes or any mane or bristles on the throat. When the serpent came about musket shot near Lund fired at it, and was certian that the shots hit it in the head. After the shot hit, he dived, but came up immediately. He raised his head in the air like a snake preparing to dart on its prey. After he had turned and got his body in a straight line, which he appeared to do with great difficulty, he darted like an arrow against the boat. They reached the shore, and the animal perceiving it had came into shallow water, dived immediately, and disappeared in the deep.

Such is the declaration of these four men, and no one has any cause to question their veracity, or imagine that they were so seized with fear, that they could not observe what took place so near them. There are not many here, or on other parts of the Norwegian coast, who no longer doubt the existence of the sea serpent. The writer of this article was a long time sceptical, as he had not been so fortunate as to see this monster of the deep, but after the many accounts he has read and the relations he has received from creditable witnesses, he does not dare longer to doubt the existence of the sea serpent.

F. W. DEINBOLL.

Molde, the 20th Nov. 1845.

The following gives some later particlars.

"Sund's Parsonage, Aug. 31, 1846.

On Saturday, the 3th inst., in the course between the islands of Sartor Leer and Tos, a sea monster, supposed to be a sea serpent, was seen by several persons. Early on this day, just as the steamer Biorgvin passed through Rognefiord towing a vassel to Bergen Daniel Salomonson, a cotter, saw a sea monster whose like he declares he never met with although accustomed to the sea and its inhabitants from his earliest years. The animal came swimming from Rognefiord in a westerly direction toward his dwelling at Gronnevigskiœset, in the northern part of the parish of Sund. The head appeared like a Fœring boat (about 20 feet long) keel uppermost, and from behind it raised itself forward in three and sometimes four and five undulations each apparently about twelve feet long, its rate appeared to be that of a light boat rowed by four active men. When it reached Gronnevigsiœset at a distance of two rifle shots, it turned with considerable noise and continued its course towards Lundenœs. They, about 11 o'clock in the same day his wife Ingeborg, in Daniel's absence, heard a loud noise in the sea, and she and the two little children saw a great monster such as described above, take a northerly course, close by their place, at such a rate that the waves were dashed on the shrse in the same way as when a steamer is passing by. Neiter of them say that they saw anything like eyes or fins, or indeed anything projecting from its round form, but they declare that the color of the animal was dark brown, and that it often rose up with gentle undulations, sometimes, however sinking below the surface so that merely a stripe indicated the rapid course of the gigantic body. On the same morning a lad, by name Abrahamsen Hagenœs, was out fishing in the Roghenord, not far from Lundenœs, and just ready to throw out his line when he, as he asserts became aware that at about 100 fathoms distance a monster with a head as large as a Fœring boat (about twenty feet long) and a long body lay upon the sea like kegs and was nearing his boat—seized with panic he exerted all his strength to reach the shore, and as the animal apparently following him was only about 40 fathoms off he leaped ashore, drew up the boat and ran up the bank, whence he viewed the monster, which had by this time approached the shore within 20 fathoms. He says that that part of the body which was visible was about sixty feet in length, and that its undulation course was similar to the eel; that the color of the back was blackish shiningstrongly, and, as far as he could distinguish, there was a whitish stripe under the belly. Report also says that the sea-serpent was seen by several persons in Biornfiord, causing a great deal of dread, but of this our informant wants authentic accounts. Our informant further says that he has no reason whatever to doubt the truth of the story of the man and his wife or the trustworthiness of the lad Abraham, except so far as that his his fears may have caused him to see several things through a magnifying glass.

From the Living Age.

PERIODICAL WORK CONDUCTED BY LUNATICS.

LUNTICS, who, fifty years ago, were dungeoned and whipped, are now treated to balls and soirees, they conduct farms, and are admitted to public worship. A new feature has been developed in their treatment at the Crichton Institution, Dumfries: they there club their wits to prepare and issue a monthly periodical sheet. The first number of The New Moon, or Crichton Royal Institution Literary Register, appeared on the 30th December, in the form of a double leaf in quarto. It is sold to the public, but we are not informed at what price. In the prospectus, the fact of the exclusive management of the work by inmates is asserted; and the object is stated to be, a humble endeavour to lead persons of that class "to think aright on the chief subject which should occupy their attention under present circumstances, so that they may leave the institution wiser and better men and women than they entered it."

Not only is the literary matter sane in its general tone, and rhetorically correct, but there is a positive merit in several of the little articles. For example a gentleman signing himself Sigma, thus addresses Dr. Browne, the superior of the establishment, (and we would ask if many men under Thomas Moore could write in the same style more smartly:)—

"I am sorry to learn you have got rheumatism,
Which is, I am told, a corporeal rheum
Not very unlike what is called Tuseyism;
If you take my advice, my kind friend, you wont follow
The cold-water cure of that Pluvius Apollo,
Who at Graefenberg cures old and young of the dumps,
By the magical aid of a couple of pumps,
Old Pindar, 'tis true, as you very well know,
In the choicest of Greek has proclaimed long ago,
'Ariston men hudor;' but, then, what of that?
The man was a pagan—so, verbum sap. sat.
Your kids, you will learn with much pleasure, I know,
Are all as you left them, and in statu quo.
(This same is a classical phrase, else, egod!
I would break Priscian's head, and write sta u QUO:)
Some mad as march hares, but a few like the Dane,
With a slight touch north-east, yet otherwise sane. * * *
M. Sacre, that sage transcendental philosopher.
(I wonder if ever he read Alexander Ross over?)
As his use and wont is, has been blowing the balmy,
And cheek, as a smoker should, really quite palmy.
He swears the debates are detestable stuff—
Not worth a cigar, or a pinch of Scotch snuff;
And, faith, I believe that for once, entre nous,
He's not very far wrong—I'm blowed if I do.
At billiards to-day I gave him a maul;
And was n't he savage? ho, no! not at all:
He fumed and he fretted—'The cues were a scandal,
And really unfit for a gentleman to handle;'
Then concluded by saying, he would give me thrice six
Out of twenty-four points and beat me to sticks!"
* *

"J. C," who from his style seems of clerical education, preaches to the following effect, and however trite the ideas, assuredly their arrangement here is as good as could be expected from any other quarter whatever:—"Although it is a proper natural, and laudable wish to be splendidly and extensively useful, yet as every man is most delighted with the esteem, and interested in the good conduct and happiness of his domestics and friends, he ought to be the more careful to 'walk before his house with a perfect heart.' That such instruct their families and lead them in the ways of righteousness, is what is required of them. This is the province of which the care has been assigned to, and of which the improvement will be required at the hands and he who exerteth himself in this his station and sphere of action, however low or limited, is as meritorious in the sight of God, and likely to be as happy in himself, as he who, disengaging himself from all domestic ties and duties, gives a wider but more contingent range to his zeal and philanthropy, and encompasses sea and land to promote the improvement, reformation, and happiness of his fellow-men. But, above all, it certainly deeply concerns parents to set a good example before their children. This is equally beneficial to the public and to themselves; and the neglect equally fatal to both. If ever any real and substantial reformation of society is to be effected, this is the source from which it must flow; the sure foundation must be laid in the instruction, education, and moral training of youth."

We conclue with a short lyrical poem, which has, we think, absolute merits sufficient to entitle it to notice apart from all consideration of the interest arising from the condition and circumstances of the writer:—

"The harp so loved awakes no more,
Its chords are mute, its charms are gone:
The mind may joy not in its lore,
Where hope and happiness are flown.

For though it soothed in other days,
It cannot reach a woe so deep
As that which o'er this bosom strays,
To wake the pangs that never sleep.

The wind blows cold o'er glen and hill
And nature all is war and war,
But nature's home bears no ill,
Like that which haunts the heart of man.

What though the torrents dash the steep,
And frosts her flouting flowers deform,
And bolder lift her voice and weep,
In thunder, strife, and winter's storm;

The life remains that genial spring
Can still to scorched state restore
And cause her wine her glories fling
O'er all that lay so waste before.

The wild bee hums around the flower
That opens brightly on the brae;
The bird sings from the budding bower,
And cheers the wanderer on his way.

And far upon the moorland gray,
The plover seeks its summer home;
And sunshine crowns the scene of day,
As far as fond or eye can roam.

And thus are nature's charms replaced,
As if they had been ever new;
Her garlands blooming on her breast,
Her ringlets beaded with the dew.

But when, amid life's devious track,
Draws on the darkness of decay,
Oh, what to man shall ere bring back
The charms that time hath swept away?

And if the young must oft deplore
The ills that curb their early glee,
Oh! what again shall joy restore
To my loved mountain harp and me! —I. R."

It might be asked, Supposing the writers of these extracts had been at liberty, and had been guilty of some capital outrage, would not such compositions have proved as strong proofs of their sanity, and consequently liability to punishment, as any that have been adduced in cases where punishment has been suffered, or, at best, narrowly missed, (that of Macnaughton, for instance?) and yet these persons are deemed fit inmates for a lunatic asylum, and actually are in such an asylum at this moment.

THE CHARACTER OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

FROM A SERMON, BY REV. JACOB M'DOUGLASS

"Truly this was the Son of God." Matt xxvii 54.

THE character of Christ, as drawn by the Evangelists, is one striking evidence of the truth of Christianity. That a few weak, illiterate men could, of themselves, and from their native resources, have composed a narrative of a fictitious hero, like the blessed Jesus, is utterly incomprehensible. Had men sat down to write a fabulous history of a pure and perfect character, they would have been utterly at fault—they would have been involved in a labyrinth of perplexities. They would either have debased and contaminated their hero with blemishes and gross imperfections, or they would have produced an inconsistent character—a character only the product of wild and incoherent rhapsody. Only examine the character of a Heathen God as drawn by Homer, or Virgil, or Ovid, or Lucian; look at the conduct of Jupiter or Juno, or Mars, or Venus. Behold! how grossly deficient in morality!

And then read the historical romance of Cyrus, written by Xenophon, in which he clothes a great personage with imaginary virtues. O how inconsistant, how ridiculous, how at variance with fact and real history! Deists themselves have admired the character of Christ as drawn by the Evangelists—how natural, how simple, how obvious! and yet how difficult for an uninspired man to imitate! How like a noble Grecian temple, the pride of architecture—every column, every arch, every stone of proper dimension, and in its proper location, the whole filling the mind with sensations of sublimity, and grandeur, and delight!

Our Lord is deserving of imitation, 1st in his early piety

We find him at twelve years of age, saying, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" We find him with a piety and wisdom above his years, "sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing and asking them questions." In truth, early piety confers on him who is the subject of it, and on the service he renders to the Great Author of his being, a peculiar, transcendent pre-eminency. No comfort in life, no happiness in death, like the comfort thrown around a religious, commenced in the bud and bloom of our days.

2. Let us imitate Jesus Christ in his obedience to his earthly parents.

St. Luke tells us, "he went down to Nazareth, and was subject to them"—his earthly parents. He paid obedience to the mother that bore him, and to the reputed father that provided for him. Though far superior to his parents, he never refused to offer them the respect and obedience due from children to parents. If the highest on earth think their parents beneath them, and themselves above their parents, command, their conduct differs most widely from that of Christ. Our Lord did not think thus. Oh! what shall we think of those monsters of ingratitude, who are ashamed to own their parents, because of their poverty, or despise them on account of their infirmities! They are verily the reproach and disgrace of their species. Listen to the command of the wise Solomon, "Hearken to thy father that begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old."

3. We have to admire the great wisdom of Jesus Christ as a teacher.

Few people, in the present day, can have an adequate conception of the extremely great prejudices of the Jews. They expected a Messiah, a great preacher—but a great conqueror, a great king. But although the miracles of Christ must have had some effect on the Rulers and Pharisees, still that influence was neutralized by his poverty, his meanness, his want of the pomp, and pride, and circumstance of office. So that, to oppose the prejudices of the Jews, and justify himself required the greatest wisdom; and indeed, wisdom shone pre-eminently in our blessed Lord.

The officers of Christ were forced to declare, "Never man spake like this man." Persons in humble and in humble life are no despicable judges of oratory, and they testified the excellence of his preaching—"The common people heard him gladly." It is said of the Nazarenes, "they wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth." If you would compare the discourses of our blessed Lord with those of Plato, or the answers of the Oracle, or of the Sybils, you would see the vast and overwhelming superiority of the discourses of Christ. The writings of Plato are involved in obscurity and transcendentalism. The answers of the Oracles are doubtful in the extreme, they are darkened with ambiguity and liable to be interpreted in a variety of ways. But the discourses of the blessed Jesus how simple! how easy to be understood, how sweetly they glide into the recesses of the heart! How easy had it been for Him in whom were hidden all the treasures of wisdom, to have given forth his instructions in such a manner as to have overpowered the human understanding! How hard it is for men of superior learning to adapt their lessons to the capacities of the young and ignorant! How irksome to most men the employment of teaching! How few teachers are there who can avoid shewing some affectation of their superiority in knowledge! Who could ever have expected that He who was, the maker of all things, who saw by intuition through all the depths of science,—that one, capable of instructing the most enlightened archangel, to descend to initiate in first principles, the multitude of the ignorant and illiterate!

"Blessed are they that mourn—the humble, the poor in spirit, the meek, the merciful." Here is no affectation of mystic learning—no pompous ostentation of profound science—no nice distinctions of speculative points! Christ is most excellent as a teacher.

Then how wisely does He suit his instructions both to the dispositions and capacities of his hearers! Parable and allegory have ever been among the most entertaining mode of communicating instruction. The severity of the precept is lost in the entertainment of the table. The sensible image reflects light on the moral, thought; and the abstract thought gives importance to the sensible representation. By apt similitudes and allegories drawn from surrounding objects, did this Great Teacher recommend to his hearers the most solemn truths. The honest and teachable mind was thus allured to search after divine knowledge.

4. Our blessed Lord was exemplary in the holiness of his life.

The life of Jesus Christ was a pattern of holiness. Holiness unto the Lord was engraven on his slightest, his most inconsiderable action. "He was holy, harmless, undefiled, he was separate from sinners." Well did our Lord say to the Jew, "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" Pontius Pilate would have been glad to discover some flaw, some defect in his character. And yet what does Pilate say of the Jesus? "I find no fault in him." Christ lived in a sinful world but He belonged not to that world. He was in the midst of an adulterous and perverse generation, but contaminated, in no wise, by the contagion. He was like the Oasis, the green spot, blooming with verdure, in the midst of the arid, and sultry, and unfruitful, desert. There is a river in Greece, which emulates in the Egean Sea, and for a great space after its entrance into the sea, preserves its sweet, and clear, and silver waters in the midst of the brackish and deep blue waves of the ocean. Such was our Lord surrounded by the waves of wretchedness and sin.

The character of Christ appears more exalted when compared with that of Mohammed. Let the reason of mankind decide between the two. "Set before reason Mohammed and his disciples, all armed to arm pit and blood, riding in triumph over the spoils of thousands and tens of thousands, who fell by his victorious sword. Shew her the cities which he fired, the countries he ravaged and destroyed, and the miserable distress of all the inhabitants of the earth. When she has viewed him in this scene, carry her into his retirements; shew her the prophet's concubines, his wives and concubines; let her see his adulteries, and hear him allege revelation and his divine commission to justify his oppression and lust. When reason is tired with this scene, then shew her the blessed Jesus,—humble and meek,—going good to the souls of men—patiently instructing both the ignorant and perverse. Let her see Him in his most retired privacies—let her follow Him to the mount, and hear his devotions and supplications to his God. Carry her to his house to view his poor face, and hear his heavenly discourse. Let her see Him injured, but not provoked. Let her attend Him to the tribunal, and consider the patience with which he endured the scoffs and reproaches of his enemies. Lead her to the cross, and let her view Him in the agonies of death, and hear his last prayer for his persecutors, 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do!' When reason hath viewed all, ask her which of the pictures of God—in her answer we have already heard, when she saw part of this scene through the eyes of the centurion, who attended at the cross; by him she spoke, and said, 'Truly this was the Son of God.'"

Truly the Saviour is deserving of our imitation. O what sweetness, what purity of manners, what fidelity in all the relations of life! as a child, subject, as a master, as a teacher as a friend as a more than father to his disciples! What a supreme command over the passions of human nature! How superior to all the temptations of avarice, and pride, and ambition! How meek, how patient amid injuries! when he is struck on the right cheek, he turns the other to the smiter! He submits, as the lamb before the slaughter, and as a sheep, is dumb before her shearers, so he opens not his mouth. And in a period of all the most terrible afflictions, when he expires in agony on the hill of Calvary where he is crucified, reviled, execrated by a whole nation; scenes, if ever imperfect, and a return of retributively were just to be, they would have been under such circumstances, he Son of thunder and vengeance may be heard to invoke from heaven fiery bolts on his murderers, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do!"

But to view rightly we admire the character of our Lord Jesus Christ—we ever should, we ever must only view it as the ground work on which to build the atonement—the end and aim of a sacrifice for the sins of men. Let us remember that He lived and died, not merely to set us a pattern of holy living, but by his active and passive obedience to make expiation for the sins of the whole world. Let us take Christ for our pattern, but oh! let us not disown Him as our priest.

Unbelievers talk much of Christ living and dying as an exemplar, to set us an example of patience, and fortitude, and justice; but they say nothing of his dying, as an expiatory sacrifice. On the subject of the atonement of the Lord Jesus, they are most basely, most criminally silent. We ask of Paine that the furnishing us with a glorious example was one end of the coming of Christ into the world, but not the grand end; it was a subordinate end, but not the ultimate. He came into the world to save that which was lost. "He died the just for the unjust that he might bring us to God." May God preserve us from the pernicious error of denying the atonement of Christ. Other errors may bruise the heel, but the tendency of this is to stab Christianity to the heart. Inasmuch as it deprives us of the choicest benefit of the death of Christ, viz. the expiation of guilt. Yes! Christ was wounded, not merely to teach us patience and disinterestedness, but for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities. He tasted death for, or in the room of every man.

Christian brethren! How greatly blessed are we under the dispensation of Christ. We have a perfect example before us. The Heathen had no such example. They might have gone to their Aristotle, or their Socrates, or Zeno, or Diogenes, and they would have observed men tainted with faults and inconsistencies. We have a perfect example before us. When we are in perplexities, let us ask ourselves, how did Christ act in such situations? and let us act in a similar manner. Let us set the Lord Jesus always before us. Let us run with patience, the race before us, looking unto Jesus. Let our running, let this be the goal before us. Let us look unto Jesus.—Living Age

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, JUNE 4, 1847.

We have heard with much sorrow that the natives in the interior will suffer and indeed are at present suffering from an unprecedented scarcity of provisions. This is owing to the sickliness of the weather. Last season in the month in which there is usually very dry weather there was so much rain as to prevent them from burning their farms. We are pleased however to be able to say, we can help them out the way of African bread stuffs: such as Cassada, Potatoes, Rice &c. &c. Of these articles we have an abundant supply—enough for ourselves and some to spare to our neighbors

PALM OIL.

The low price of Camwood having rendered it a rather heavy article of commerce has operated favorably on the industry of the natives in this part of our Commonwealth. Although Palm Oil has been for many years one of the chief articles of export from Western Africa, until this season none worth mentioning has been produced in this part of our Commonwealth but Camwood failing the natives have turned to the all-prolific Palm Tree, and more has been purchased in around the settlement within the last three months than in many three previous years. It will be seen a few lines above that we have rendered the word "natives" conspicuous by putting it in italics. This we have done with a view of awakening attention. How much we would ask has been made by Americans? Hills can be counted by scores; can they not climb a palm tree? Cannot they wield the pestle? Is the labor which the native African proverbially loathe gie, which he has to resort to carefully and voluntarily undergo, too hard for Americo muscle? Are such returns too poor for those who say they can find nothing to do? Or the employment too mean for those who go about idle? Palm Oil is in great demand at from thirty to forty cents a gallon; trees are growing by thousands in our forests; idlers are going by scores in the streets in the offices and stores, and all the Oil which is sold is produced by natives!! Remarks similar to these we have frequently thrown out, but we now earnestly ask the attention of all classes of our citizens to this subject. It is probable that just at this time, Camwood being a heavy article in the Market, and Oil scarce and high from the great demand these remarks will find favour with many, who under other circumstances would regard them as being penned only to fill up a space. From the great competition in the Oil trade at the leeward such persons perhaps, find their operations embarrassed and their profits reduced, they are consequently ready to deplore the idleness of the Americans in not producing those articles they wish to export. If the competition be lessened gland their individual profits return to the wonted channel, the enterprise would cease. This however, would be exceedingly unwise—would indicate great superficiency of thought and a total ignorance of the very first principles of political economy: measures as it would be the same as to say, a county is much benefitted, and is as independent, when it is compelled to procure all its articles, not only of elegance but of convenience and comfort from abroad, and that too when it has nothing to give in exchange for them no when they are produced by its own inhabitants.!! Our whole operations hitherto have been simply a petty trading system, supported on one hand, principally by credit from foreigners and on the other wholly by barter with the natives along the sea-board. And what progress we ask in the name of common sense, what progress after twenty four years of labor have we made in the road to wealth? Look at the size and number of our vessels and warehouses—refer to the table of our annual exports, they will give the sickening answer. Is it asked why? an explanation shall be had.

Suppose an individual takes credit from a foreigner to the amount of one thousand dollars, payable in four months in Palm Oil at thirty cents a gallon. There being no Oil produced in the colony he ships here goods on board his colonial craft, and proceeds to the leeward to obtain the article by barter with the natives. To collect to produce 1000 gallons of oil would put down at four cents and as the native must be supposed to have his profit we will suppose the article to cost the American trader twelve cents—which is a gross profit of fifty per cent, without making any allowance for bad debts, losses by sea and other casualties. Does the trader clear and pocket the fifty per cent? By no means for we have to deduct at least twenty per cent for wages of hands, provisions, casks and wear and tear of boat; so that we see the trader for all his risk and trouble would make only thirty per cent, and none in the colony would be benefited but the few who were personally concerned in the transaction. It may be replied that the persons concerned in this transaction, would probably expend their money or a part of it at last, in the market and stores and thus the profits realized would become general benefit. This is admitted; but we would ask, if these five hundred dollars would not in all probability be more judiciously expended, or carefully husbanded if distributed among twenty then among ten men or families.

We have seen that the profits accruing to the colony by this transaction is only five hundred dollars. But let us look a little more closely at the process.

According to our system of navigation we require about three fifths of a man to every ton the vessel measures. Our colonial crafts are usually about ten tons: consequently the vessel engaged in the above transaction would require six men. On inquiry we learn that six gallons of oil a day is about the quantity procured by a native in his rude method of manufacture. We assume this as a standard for any American of ordinary activity. Twelve dollars a month is the average wages paid to sailors and six weeks is a fair time to allow for the collection of 5000 gallons of oil which would be fifty per centon the thousand dollars at the price assumed. At this rate each man's profit from the operation would stand thus:

The trader would have	1665 Gallons
deduct expenses 20 per cent	333
	1332.
The traders share 1332 Gallons, at 30 cts. is	$ 399.60
Each man 6 weeks at $ 12 a month	18.00

In the above calculation we have made no deduction for accidents, such as loss of chains, canoes, bad debts and a thousand other things which are constantly occurring, but have supposed the voyage to be a perfectly successful one. Now let us take another view, and suppose the oil produced in the colony from some one of the millions of trees within our territory. The following table will indicate the difference.

Each man 6 weeks or 39 days producing 6 Gallons a day would have	234 Gallons.
234 Gallons at 30 cents is	$ 70,20
Add 7 cents a Gallon the native's profit which would now go to the American	16 38
	$ 86 58
Deduct $18 wages during a trip to purchase 5000 Gallons	18 00
	68,58.

Thus we see the seaman by remaining at home and expressing the oil from the nut, would clear $68.58 over and above his wages in the same time in a voyage to the leeward.

The merchant now rid of the expense of a voyage would pocket the whole of the fifty per cent profit on the goods, excepting perhaps a small deduction for difference in price, which would go to swell the profits of the produce.

Let us now suppose there are one hundred persons employed in working the coasting vessels and keeping Factories for the collection of oil: and this will be admitted considerably under the true number. Factors are paid about the same as seamen.

One seaman earns in 6 weeks	$ 18,00.
In making oil he earns in the same time above his wages	$ 68,58.
Consequently 100 men would earn above their prison wages,	$ 6,858,00.

So that the colony is actually the loser of $5,058, and that by only one hundred men in the short space of six weeks! and all owing to our downright insanity in indolently applying ourselves to make the oil which we can make ourselves.

We will take another view of the matter. We have supposed the cost of procuring the oil to be 14 cents a gallon.

3333 1/3 gallons at 30 cts is	$ 1000,
Deduct cost of purchase.
$1000 would produce at 14 cts a gallon	7142.
Deduct freight for 1/3	3333
	3809,
The net gain of the above on a barter trade cargo of only $ 1000 would be 3809 gallons or	$ 1142 70.

Let us pursue this subject a little further and put down the minimum of our annual exports at $ 100,000, of which palm oil constitutes five sixths. Five sixths of $ 100,000 is $ 83,000.

Now a superficial view above data as correct, it is seen at a glance, that by purchasing our oil from the natives instead of producing it at home, the colony saves an annual outlay of $ 85,023 on this article alone! a sum sufficient to support ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY ONE FAMILIES at $500 a year—or to purchase annually FIVE VESSELS of one hundred TONS burthen and six voyages for an American voyage.

We write only for Liberians, otherwise we might deem it necessary to anticipate inquiries whether the territory actually possessed by the colony can produce the quantity we have put down. Every man in the colony knows that palm trees abound throughout all our borders—that no space of five miles can be pointed out where they may not be counted by scores and by hundreds—that where they do not grow they have only to be planted—that the soil is everywhere adapted to them, and lastly, that they become more prolific the more regularly the fruit is gathered from them. About the year 1815 Captain Isaac Spence a merchant trader from London purchased from the natives about Rev. Seatre two barrels of oil, and encouraged them to go on in procuring it by engaging to take all they would make in the ensuing season. We may safely put down the amount exported in 1846 from the region extending from Cape Mesurado down to Cape Palmas, at TWO MILLION GALLONS!

We throw out these remarks for the consideration of the people, and we are confident that in all our calculations we have made the most liberal allowances. Palm oil has never been down as low as thirty cents. At the moment we write it will command 35 cents, and is worth in America 63. We know further that it is produced on the coast at a cost less than 14 cents. It is a most sure and ready source of national wealth and is worthy of the prompt attention of every Liberian.

We owe our readers an apology for the late appearance of the present number. Sever indisposition on the part of the assistant Editor has prevented his giving regular attention to the paper, and an affection of the eyes amounting almost to blindness has prevented us since March from doing any thing in the way of writing until the present number, and we hope these remarks will disarm the severity of criticism on any defects which may be found in this number, which we, imprudently perhaps undertaken to get out,

SAM. ES.

SELECTED EXTRACTS

A HOUSE SET ON FIRE BY WATER

On Sunday, the 24th Jan the house at East Dennis, occupied by Mr. David Farnsworth, was set on fire and narrowly escaped destruction, in consequence of a glass globe of water containing two small fishes, having been hung up against a south window. The house having been shut up two or three days, Mr. F., on approaching, saw smoke issuing from the chimney. Five minutes elapsed before he got in, as he had to return to his father-in-laws, for the key. On entering he found one of the window curtains was burnt, and that a covered easy chair standing by the window was in flames. After extinguishing the fire, he ascertained the cause. The glass globe filled with water hung where the rays of the sun fell directly upon it, forming a lens, or burning glass, and a part of the curtain happening to be in the focus, was set on fire. Repeated experiments were afterwards made with the same globe. When filled with water and exposed to the sun paper placed in the focus was instantly ignited but when the water was turned out, the same effect was not produced. If Mr. F.'s house had been destroyed, every body would have said that it was set on fire by an incendiary.—Scientific American.

ENGLISH ECONOMY.

"How were the graves generally made? —The plan on which the grave was opened was quite in accordance with that generally observed or adopted throughout London; that is, the opening what is called a public grave, thirty feet deep, perhaps; the first corpse interred was succeeded by another, and up to sixteen or eighteen, and all the openings between the coffin boards were filled, up with smaller coffins of children. When this grave was crammed as full as it could be, so that the topmost coffin was within two feet of the surface, that was banked up, and that piece of ground was considered as occupied.

"The largest number of burials I have ever attended on one day was during the raging epidemic called the influenza, I think, in 1837. On one Sunday afternoon I buried twenty-one persons myself; that was in Holywell Mount ground, situated about a quarter of a mile distant, in the Cutain road.

Sometimes this dead hole is left open a fortnight, or covered only with planks, before it is filled; it is then covered over with earth, to be opened again in rotation at the end of a year. Speaking of the "sequel" in New Bunhill fields, Mr. Heldson observes:—

Rumors about Vera Cruz—It is impossible to tell what may be the plans of Santa Anna, nor do we believe that he has any settled plans, but must take advantage of circumstances and events as they present themselves. The rumor that he has directed the troops to be withdrawn from the Castle and Vera Cruz, and thus abandon those two important places, appears to be utterly discreditable from its extreme folly and rashness, if not something worse. In the Castle there must be two thousand men, commanded by good officers, many of them French and English Engineers, besides vast stores of ammunition, and three hundred pieces of cannon, sufficient to stand out against the whole British navy, if properly defended. To suppose for a moment that an important key to the city of Mexico, and one of its strongest defences, built and completed at the cost of several millions, is to be surrendered without a blow, is beyond any degree of probability. It is possible, however, that Santa Anna may throw in to the Castle some of the best troops, and order Vera Cruz (the city) to be abandoned, so that after Gen. Scott has entered the city, the guns of the Castle may be opened on our troops. This is the most feasible project, and the most reasonable one. The course of Santa Anna, if he really wishes a fight and means what he says, in prosecuting this war, would have been to have marched all his forces towards Vera Cruz, and disputed the landing of General Scott, if he knew where he was about landing. At all events, we cannot entertain the idea that Santa Anna intends to give up the Castle without firing a shot. The gun brigs Ætna and Stromboli are ready for sea at Boston, and have orders to sail immediately. They will carry some fifty persons each, amongst which are several officers of skill and experience. The guns each weigh 15'000 pounds and will carry an 85-pound shot or shell, with a charge of 25-pounds of powder, a half mile farther than the guns of the Castle. These two vessels will act in conjunction with four similar vessels despatched from the Brooklyn Navy Yard. They should have been before Vera Cruz at this moment, but great delay in every thing, has been the result of the embarrassment in obtaining supplies from Congress. The Castle cannot be stormed now much before the 20th instant. —Sun.

DATE OF CHRIST'S BIRTH.—Wieseler, a learned German divine, concludes that the day when that event occurred cannot be decided—that it most probably took place about the close of February—that it might have occured near the close of January or December.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Mercantile business under the firm of Samuel F. McGill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MCGILL,
R. S. MCGILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS,
Gen: Agent and Treasurer.

MARRIED,

At Caldwell, on the 15th, ult., by the Rev. E. Johnson, M. B. Spellman, to Miss E. Carter, both of that place.—Com

In this town, on the evening of the 3rd inst., at half past 5 o'clock, by the Rev. A. D. Williams, Mr. Thomas Havens, to Miss Frances Stewart, both of this place.—Com.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	8	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	33 1-3
Beef, cargo No. 1.	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Baffs,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	25	30
Boards,	1000ft	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	12 1-2	18 3-4
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12 1-2	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 1-2
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	50 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Fish Cod,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	10 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	10 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	10 00
Oil paint	Gallon	one
Oil palm	"	33 1-3	34
Pork	Bbl	5 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	one
Porter,	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2	25
Rompuns	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	5
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 00	3 75
Tobacco	1000lbs	9 00	10 00
Wash hand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00	5 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	10 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

May 11. Col sloop Star, Chase master from leeward.

" 17 Col schooner Perseverance, Jones master from leeward,

" 20 French barque——master from leeward; passenger, Mr. James Smith.

" 22 Dutch schooner——master, from Sierra Leone.

" 24. Am. brig——naster, from windward sailed next day for leeward.

" " British brig——master, from windward

" 25. Col sloop Nathan Bangs G. Ammons master, from leeward.

" 28. Col. schooner Pedler G. E. Carroll master, from leeward.

" " Col schooner Perseverance, Jones master leeward.

DEPARTURES.

May 8 Col sloop Star Chase master, for leeward

" 12 Col sloop Nathan Bangs, G. Ammons master, for leeward

" 18 Col cutter Eliza Frances Howard master, for leeward.

" 19 Col schooner Perseverance Jones master for leeward.

" 29 French barque——master, for windward.

" " British brig——Bishop master, for leeward,

" " British schooner——master, for leeward.

POETRY.

THE HUSBAND'S COMPLAINT.

I HATE the name of german wool in all its colors bright;
Of chairs and stools in fancy-work I hate the very sight.
The shalls and slippers that I've seen—the ottomans and bags—
Sooner than wear a stitch on me, I'd walk the street in rags.
I've heard of wives too musical, too talkative, or quiet—
Of scolding or of gamming wives and those too fond of riot;
But yet, of all the errors known which to the women fall,
For ever doing fancy-work I think exceeds them all.
The other day, when I came home no dinner got for me;
I asked my wife the reason, and she answered, "One, two, three!"
I told her I was hungry, and I stamped upon the floor;
She never even looked at me, but murmered, "One, Green more."
Of course she makes me angry, though she does n't care for that,
But chatters, while I talk to her, "One white, and then a black.
One green, and then a purple—(just hold your tongue my dear;
You really do annoy me so)—I've made a wrong stitch here."
And as for confidential chat, with her eternal frame,
Though I should speak of fifty things, she'd answer me the same,
'Tis, "Yes, love—five reds, then a black—(I quite agree with you)—
I've done this wrong—seven, eight, nine, ten—an orange, then a blue."
If any lady comes to tea, her bag is first surveyed;
And, if the pattern pleases her, a copy then is made.
She stares the men quite out of face; and when I ask her why?
'Tis "O! my love, the pattern of his waiscoat struck my eye."
And if to walk I am inclined ('tis seldom I go out,)
At every worsted-shop she sees oh! how she looks about,
And says, "Bless me! I must go in—the pattern is so rare;
That group of flowers is just the thing I wanted for my chair."
Besides, the things she makes are all such touch me not affairs,
I dare not even use a stool nor screen: and, as for chairs,
'T was only yesterday I put my youngest boy in one,
And until then I never knew my wife had such a tongue.
Alas! for my poor little ones, they dare not move or speak;
'Tis "Tom, be still; put down that bag. Why, Harriet, where 's your feet?
Maria! standing on that stool! it was not made for use;—
Be silent all. Three greens, one red, a blue, and then a puce"
Oh! Heaven preserve me from a wife with fancy-work run wild,
And hands which never do aught else for husband or for child.
Our clothes are rent, our bills unpaid, our house is in disorder;
And all because my lady-wife has taken to embroider.
I'll put my children out to school—I'll go across the seas
My wife so full of fancy-work, I'm sure cannot miss me:
E'en while I write she still keeps on her "One, two three, and four."
She's past all hope. Those Berlin wools, I'll not endure them more! Britannia.

MISCELLANEOUS

(Continued from the Last.

But at this confession, the dark blood of the squaw boiled fiercely up, and seemed ready to burst from the veins; for two or three minutes her features wore an expression, which, to any bystander, who knew her naturally soft and placid countenance, would have been a sure sign that no common project of vengeance had entered her soul. At length she exclaimed, raising her arms over her head, with a fierce gesture

"By the name of our Great Spirit, who presides over us! By the name of the God whom the white missionaries preach, thou deservest to die! And, if I could, I would kill thee for my pony's sake"

On hearing this, Nogisqua produced knife, and flung it to Miami, saying, "Kill away!"

Whether his intoxication was so great that he knew not what he was doing, or whether he thought the squaw jested, or he despised her anger—whatever induced him to commit the rash act of putting this instrument into her hands at such a moment, it was fatal to him. Miami sprang towards him, seized the knife, and plunged it into his breast up to the handle. The Indian fell amidst his dearly purchased whiskey, and in a second or two was dead.

The calmness of the squaw returned to her when her loss had been avenged in such a deadly manner; her passion passed away, but no sign, of repentance appeared. She turned to the door of the tent, and, looking out, tried to discover her brother Tiascala Seeing him at some distance, she beckoned him to approach; and as he ran into the tent, and lifted up his hands and eyes in astonishment, she said,

"White man had the pony—Death has Nogisqua!"

The boy did not answer; but for many minutes he stood gazing at the dead Indian then said "Shall I go and tell it?"

"Yes," replied the squaw, and Tiascala proceeded to the door of each tent and around, saying in a mourful voice, "Noqisaua is dead! Nogisqua is dead!"

At this sudden announcement the female relatives of Miami were the first to hasten to her tent, (unconscious that she had killed him;) to commence the lamentations customary in the tribe when one of the members died. Letting these pass, who already began, with frantic gestures, to unloose their hair, and utter deep wails, Tiascala communicated to the Indians who remained the news that the squaw had killed her husband. On hearing this, one or two distant relatives of Nogisqua (for his only brother was not of the village) demanded justice, summary Indian justice, upon Miamia—But Tiascala, who hoped to save his sister, and was already much terrified at what he had seen, implored earnestly that before they did anything he might hear the news of Bawhish, their chief and his father; and the Elders of the Potawatamies decided that he said right—that it was the chief's voice alone that could sentence the criminal.

Alarmed, therefore—confused—unwilling to go yet convinced of the necessity of using dexpatch—the unhappy Tiascala set forth to bear the news to his father The friends of Nogisqua when he was gone, headed by an old squaw, the aunt of the slain man, walked to the tent, where Miami still sat, surrounded by almost all the women of the tribe. They were in profound silence, for finding from her own lips that she had killed Nogisqua, they deferred their lamentations till her own doom was decided on

The Indians took the corpse of her husband, wrapped it in a blanket, and carried it out; laying it under the shade of some trees near at hand, and placed two pieces of stick upon it, in the form of a cross; for they mixed certain notions the missionaries had taught them with many of their own ceremonies Beside it also they laid his gun, and some of the whiskey for which he had paid so dearly.

The squaw attempted not to escape from her tribe, and except that her hands touched no longer the tasks she was accustomed to fulfil in the day, and that when any one approached her ever rolled restlessly and inquisitively upon them, she awaited her fate with the utmost calmness.

CERTAINTY OF JUSTICE.

I know a story of a shark—a fearful, bloody story—and one that haunts my memory night and day, dreaming or waking. When I was at Campeachy, I formed a sort of pot-friendship with a pearl-fisher who had served under Mina in the expedition to New Orleans, and could tell of log-burning and bush-fighting, and things I had never heard of before; and I used to sit in his wigwam all nigh, and swill rum grog, while he went over his campaigns and his wanderings. He was a merry fellow, and knew how to keep the joke fresh; and I licked his grog, and was compelled to like his company, for the yellow, fever had broke out in our ship, and I was thrown upon my shifts till she came off her quarantine, so that I was contented to slight my hammock in the pearl diver's hut as long as he would allow me.—One night I was drunk—perhaps he made me so for particular ends, but if he did he was punished for it. It was very dark and squally, and we were sitting alone in the hut over the light or mangrove fire. After looking at me for some time, with a serious steadfast eye, Jose said—

"Anderson, I will put my life in your hands—I have need of a friend to advise with, and I think you will not betray me. You may have heard, for rumor is loud lipped, that the cathedrall of Nuestra Senora was plundered about two years ago, and that two black men who were implicated in the sacrilege, suffered public on the wheel. There was another man who evaded detection. They died like men of honour, with the secret in their hearts, and yet he lives unknown and unsuspected I am that man! Hush! The gold and silver vessels tempted my eye, and I never knelt down at the altar without wishing to tear them down. The devil assisted me and I did it. Madre de, Dios! such a commotion as it made in the town. The people seemed to have made a vow to talk of nothing else and the padres yelled as if it was doomsday. The poor blacks yelled too, but my name was never mingled with their confessions—my punishment is far off The gold cups and candlesticks are buried under ten fathom water, among the rocks of an old fishing station I know the place well; assist me in raising them to-night, and I will share them with you, and we will both take the first chance of going to Honduras.'

I consented at once—for the devil is ever ready to take advantage of a man's necessities—and went down to the beach immediately, where Jose unfastened his doree, and we put off to the fishing station. The sea ran high, and we had enough to do to manage our light craft. Jose's experienced eye was not long in discovering the repository of his treasure, though the night was so dark and the drift was so strong that he could scarcely see beyond the bows, excepting when a streamer flashed through the cloud, and showed the heavy black waves, mounting round about us.

"Its a plaguy bad night, messmate," said I. Jose turned—the lightning glared over his face—it was pale as death.

"To-night or never!" he replied. "Wear up the doree while I strip"

He did not lose an instant in preparation, and after repeating his caution to wear up the craft, and keep near the place, he crossed himself, and dropped heavily but quietly into the water I thought I heard a cry as he descended, and my anxiety began to take the course of fear. Jose had scarcely dived a fathom when he arose again to the surface—apparently senseless and inanimate. I thought he had stunned himself against the rocks. I called to him, but he returned me no answer. I called him again and louder, and still no reply. Cold with fear, I paddled towards the place where the lightning had shown me his floating body. One arm was lying listlessly upon the waves. I seized hold of it hastily—and dragged him into the boat. As I did so, blood—warm blood!—spouted over my breast and knees, a streamer flashed across the firmament—I utter a yell of horror and let the load drop heavily at my feet. It was a headless trunk! The jaws of a shark had anticipated man's justice—the punishment of the ill-fated and guilty Jose, had only been protracted—not repeated —The Sun

DEATH.

Death is indeed the disturber of every man's felicity An ugly shadow that darkens the brightest noon; a frost that defies swaddling clothes, and the glow of summer. It is the great horror of every fancy, the great agony of every heart. The pitiless, pursuing, tireless and unsated hungerer, whose maw seems to expand as it feeds, whose thirst grows with the rush of the fountain that slakes it A discord shuffling between all our harmonies; a cloud black and baneful in the sky; a wind bitter and fierce over the waters; a thick slimy mist in the air and sand-waste on the earth, wherever we turn No submission nor bribe, no flattery nor oblation, no prayer nor threatening can avert him He knows no time, no ceremony, no fear, and no remorse The king and the beggar, the rich and the poor, the tyrant and the slave, have his favor alike Sleepers on velvet cushions, in dungeons, upon the rack, or in the fifth of holes, claim the roll-call of death He carries a dark lanthron, whose taper-wick is fed by the light of souls struggling through pale faces toward Eternity! He is in the air, in the earth, in the sea, on the gleam of the sword, and in the foam that sparkles the rim of the wine cup! The winged Mercury of all "leperous distilments"—poison, murder, plague and famine. The extinction of races is his inheritance, the wail of the world his music, its agony his banquet. He has his pastime picking bones, strangling infants, idiots, dwarfs and grown men, but his holidays are held on battle fields, in massacres, and he delights in inquisitions, headmen's blocks and fandangoes under the gallows He is the genius of graveyards, the god of worms. He snatches the king from his crown the victor from his wreath, the judge from his ermine, and the bishop from his mitre. The hearth is made desolate by him, and the altar left of its worshippers. Lovers, parents and children, and friends are parted at his nod. Even the poor miser, who has pined and suffered a life time, is robbed from his gold. There is no expectancy he will not cut off, no honor he leaves undisputed, no seal unbroken He even envies the fool the carriage of his carcase! And yet, Death has some good points Even his indiscriminacy is not without credit. He takes the whip from the tyrant and the chain from the slave. He relieves the beggar from his rags, the sick man from his pain, and the weeper from his grief. He opens dungeon doors, breaks down prison walls, and lets the captive go free. He is the avenger of innocence, the protector of weakness, and the mocker of injustice He teaches the peasant the true value of his fields, the merchant of his goods, the money-lender of his gold. He rights the wrong, wipes out distinctions of blood, and proves the equality of men. Death is a sterling Democrat, a leveler, without stint and by measure, and withal, a righteous, impartial and unflinching judge Death stands by to ward off dishonor, the lash, and all worse infirmities than himself While he is a tyrant, he is also a drudge and a slave. We can force our burthens upon him, and he cannot escape He is bound to serve the beggar as well as the prince He can not choose a moment's labor, but round and round, with wan cheeks, goes to his task, the fit pack-horse of mankind. He feels no ferocity, for he has no will—commits no atrocity, because he is a tool. His office is only negative, his term within period, and his end annihilation. After all, Death is not such a grim gaunt friend. He saves as many buds as he blights flowers, and he does either from obedience rather than instinct. I neither fear nor love him more than any other servant of Destiny!

C. D S.

THE FRIAR AND THE NIGHT WHISPER.

While Mr. Welch was a minister of one of the French villages, one evening, a Popish friar traveling through the country, because he could find no lodging in the whole village addressed himself to Mr. Welch's house, begging the favour of lodging for that night. The servant informed Mr. Welch who readily consented; but as he had supped, and family worship was over, he did not see the friar, but retired to his room. After the friar had supped, the servant showed him to his chamber, between which and Mr. Welch's there was but a thin deal partition. After the friar's first sleep, he was surprised with hearing a constant whispering kind of noise, at which he was exceedingly hugly frightened.

The next morning, as he walked in the fields, a countryman met him, and, because of his habit, saluted him, asking him "where he had lodged last night!" The friar answered, "with the Huguenot minister." The country man asked him what entertainment he met with. The friar answered, "very bad, for," said he, "I always imagined there were devils haunting those minister's houses, and I am persuaded there was one with me this night; for I heard a continual whisper all the night which I believe was nothing else but the minister and the devil conversing together. The countryman told him he was much mistaken, and that it was only the minister at his night prayers. "O," said the friar, "does the minister pray any?" "Yes," said the countryman, "more than any man in France; and if you stay another night with him, you may be satisfied." The friar returned to Mr. Welch's house, and feigning indisposition, begged another night's lodging, which was granted him.

After a while, Mr. Welch came down, assembled the family, and according to custom, first sung a psalm, then read a portion of the scriptures, which he briefly expounded, and then prayed in his usual fervent manner; to all which the friar was an astonished witness. At dinner the friar was very civilly entertained, Mr. Welch thinking best to forbear all questions and disputes for the present. In the evening Mr. Welch had family worship as in the morning, which occasioned still more wonder in the friar. After supper, they all retired, the friar longed to know what the night-whisper was. He lay awake till Mr. Welch's usual time of night for rising to pray when hearing the same whispering noise, he crept softly to Mr Welch's door and there heard not only the sound, but the words distinctly, and such communication between God and man as he knew not had been in the world. Upon this the friar waited for Mr. Welch to come out of his chamber; when he told him he had lived in darkness and ignorance till this time, but was now resolved to give himself up entirely to Mr. Welch's teaching, and declared himself a Protestant. Mr. Welch congratulated him upon his better understanding, and exceedingly encouraged him; and it is said that he lived and died a true Protestant. "This account I had," says his biographer, "from a very pious minister who was bred in Mr. Welch house in France."

INSTINCT OF BIRDS —When the lapwing wants to procure food, it seeks for a worm's nest, and stamps the ground by the side of it with its feet, after the manner of boys, in order to procure worms for fishing. After doing this for a short time, the bird waits for the issue of the worm from the hole, who alarmed at the shaking of the ground, endeavors to make its escape, when he is immediately seized and becomes the prey of this ingenious bird—The Sun

ANTIQUITY OF COURSING.—AS early as A. D 150 Arrean wrote a treatise on coursing The Gauls, it appears, first introduced this healthly exercise. Early in the morning the serfs of the nobles went out with the dogs to ascertain the hare's route; having done so they returned to their masters, who instantly mounted, and went in search of puss. In the reign of Elizabeth, when the ladies of the court, instead of tea and bread and butter, took for their breakfast good roast beef, washed down by stout brown beverage, and then spent a whole day on horseback, coursing was so popular a recreation, that her Majesty ordered the Duke of Norfolk to draw up a code of laws for its regulation, which even now is held in great respect by sportsmen.

EMBARRASSING—The Norwich (Conn) News says that two ladies at a neighboring hotel each presented to her Lord a fine boy at the same time. In the hurry of the occasion, the nurses placed the babies in the same cradle, and were afterwards unable to tell "which from 'tother." The mother's and fathers are vexed and embarrassed at the result. We think we have heard the same story before.

POETRY.

THE HUSBAND'S COMPLAINT.

I HATE the name of german wool in all its colors bright;
Of chairs and stools in fancy-work I hate the very sight.
The shalls and slippers that I've seen—the ottomans and bags—
Sooner than wear a stitch on me, I'd walk the street in rags.
I've heard of wives too musical, too talkative, or quiet—
Of scolding or of gamming wives and those too fond of riot;
But yet, of all the errors known which to the women fall,
For ever doing fancy-work I think exceeds them all.
The other day, when I came home no dinner got for me;
I asked my wife the reason, and she answered, "One, two, three!"
I told her I was hungry, and I stamped upon the floor;
She never even looked at me, but murmered, "One, Green more."
Of course she makes me angry, though she does n't care for that,
But chatters, while I talk to her, "One white, and then a black.
One green, and then a purple—(just hold your tongue my dear;
You really do annoy me so)—I've made a wrong stitch here."
And as for confidential chat, with her eternal frame,
Though I should speak of fifty things, she'd answer me the same.
'Tis, "Yes, love—five reds, then a black—(I quite agree with you)—
I've done this wrong—seven, eight, nine, ten—an orange, then a blue."
If any lady comes to tea, her bag is first surveyed;
And, if the pattern pleases her, a copy then is made.
She stares the men quite out of face; and when I ask her why?
'Tis "O! my love, the pattern of his waiscoat struck my eye."
And if to walk I am inclined ('tis seldom I go out,)
At every worsted-shop she sees oh! how she looks about,
And says, "Bless me! I must go in—the pattern is so rare;
That group of flowers is just the thing I wanted for my chair."
Besides, the things she makes are all such touch me not affairs,
I dare not even use a stool nor screen: and, as for chairs,
'T was only yesterday I put my youngest boy in one,
And until then I never knew my wife had such a tongue.
Alas! for my poor little ones, they dare not move or speak;
'Tis "Tom, be still; put down that bag. Why, Harriet, where 's your feet?
Maria! standing on that stool! it was not made for use;—
Be silent all. Three greens, one red, a blue, and then a puce"
Oh! Heaven preserve me from a wife with fancy-work run wild,
And hands which never do aught else for husband or for child.
Our clothes are rent, our bills unpaid, our house is in disorder;
And all because my lady-wife has taken to embroider.
I'll put my children out to school—I'll go across the seas
My wife so full of fancy-work, I'm sure cannot miss me:
E'en while I write she still keeps on her "One, two three, and four."
She's past all hope. Those Berlin wools, I'll not endure them more! Britannia.

MISCELLANEOUS

(Continued from the Last.

But at this confession, the dark blood of the squaw boiled fiercely up, and seemed ready to burst from the veins; for two or three minutes her features wore an expression, which, to any bystander, who knew her naturally soft and placid countenance, would have been a sure sign that no common project of vengeance had entered her soul. At length she exclaimed, raising her arms over her head, with a fierce gesture

"By the name of our Great Spirit, who presides over us! By the name of the God whom the white missionaries preach, thou deservest to die! And, if I could, I would kill thee for my pony's sake"

On hearing this, Nogisqua produced knife, and flung it to Miami, saying, "Kill away!"

Whether his intoxication was so great that he knew not what he was doing, or whether he thought the squaw jested, or he despised her anger—whatever induced him to commit the rash act of putting this instrument into her hands at such a moment, it was fatal to him. Miami sprang towards him, seized the knife, and plunged it into his breast up to the handle. The Indian fell amidst his dearly purchased whiskey, and in a second or two was dead.

The calmness of the squaw returned to her when her loss had been avenged in such a deadly manner; her passion passed away, but no sign, of repentance appeared. She turned to the door of the tent, and, looking out, tried to discover her brother Tlascala. Seeing him at some distance, she beckoned him to approach; and as he ran into the tent, and lifted up his hands and eyes in astonishment, she said,

"White man had the pony—Death has Nogisqua!"

The boy did not answer; but for many minutes he stood gazing at the dead Indian then said "Shall I go and tell it?"

"Yes," replied the squaw, and Tlascala proceeded to the door of each tent and around, saying in a mourful voice, "Noqisaua is dead! Nogisqua is dead!"

At this sudden announcement the female relatives of Miami were the first to hasten to her tent, (unconscious that she had killed him,) to commence the lamentations customary in the tribe when one of the members died. Letting these pass, who already began, with frantic gestures, to unloose their hair, and utter deep wails, Tlascala communicated to the Indians who remained the news that the squaw had killed her husband. On hearing this, one or two distant relatives of Nogisqua (for his only brother was not of the village) demanded justice, summary Indian justice, upon Miamia—But Tlascala, who hoped to save his sister, and was already much terrified at what he had seen, implored earnestly that before they did anything he might hear the news of Bawbish, their chief and his father; and the Elders of the Potawatamies decided that he said right—that it was the chief's voice alone that could sentence the criminal.

Alarmed, therefore—confused—unwilling to go yet convinced of the necessity of using despatch—the unhappy Tlastala set forth to bear the news to his father. The friends of Nogisqua when he was gone, headed by an old squaw, the aunt of the slain man, walked to the tent, where Miami still sat, surrounded by almost all the women of the tribe. They were in profound silence, for finding from her own lips that she had killed Nogisqua, they deferred their lamentations till her own doom was decided on

The Indians took the corpse of her husband, wrapped it in a blanket, and carried it out; laying it under the shade of some trees near at hand, and placed two pieces of stick upon it, in the form of a cross; for they mixed certain notions the missionaries had taught them with many of their own ceremonies. Beside it also they laid his gun, and some of the whiskey for which he had paid so dearly.

The squaw attempted not to escape from her tribe, and except that her hands touched no longer the tasks she was accustomed to fulfil in the day, and that when any one approached her ever rolled restlessly and inquisitively upon them, she awaited her fate with the utmost calmness.

CERTAINTY OF JUSTICE.

I know a story of a shark—a fearful, bloody story—and one that haunts my memory night and day, dreaming or waking. When I was at Campeachy, I formed a sort of pot-friendship with a pearl-fisher who had served under Mina in the expedition to New Orleans, and could tell of log-burning and bush-fighting, and things I had never heard of before; and I used to sit in his wigwam all nigh, and swill rum grog, while he went over his campaigns and his wanderings. He was a merry fellow, and knew how to keep the joke fresh; and I licked his grog, and was compelled to like his company, for the yellow fever had broke out in our ship, and I was thrown upon my shifts till she came off her quarantine, so that I was contented to slight my hammock in the pearl diver's hut as long as he would allow me.—One night I was drunk—perhaps he made me so for particular ends, but if he did he was punished for it. It was very dark and squally, and we were sitting alone in the hut over the light or mangrove fire. After looking at me for some time, with a serious steadfast eye, Jose said—

"Anderson, I will put my life in your hands—I have need of a friend to advise with, and I think you will not betray me. You may have heard, for rumor is loud lipped, that the cathedrall of Nuestra Senora was plundered about two years ago, and that two black men who were implicated in the sacrilege, suffered public on the wheel. There was another man who evaded detection. They died like men of honour, with the secret in their hearts, and yet he lives unknown and unsuspected I am that man! Hush! The gold and silver vessels tempted my eye, and I never knelt down at the altar without wishing to tear them down. The devil assisted me and I did it. Madre de, Dios! such a commotion as it made in the town. The people seemed to have made a vow to talk of nothing else and the padres yelled as if it was doomsday. The poor blacks yelled too, but my name was never mingled with their confessions—my punishment is far off. The gold cups and candlesticks are buried under ten fathom water, among the rocks of an old fishing station. I know the place well; assist me in raising them to-night, and I will share them with you, and we will both take the first chance of going to Honduras."

I consented at once—for the devil is ever ready to take advantage of a man's necessities—and went down to the beach immediately, where Jose unfastened his doree, and we put off to the fishing station. The sea ran high, and we had enough to do to manage our light craft. Jose's experienced eye was not long in discovering the repository of his treasure, though the night was so dark and the drift was so strong that he could scarcely see beyond the bows, excepting when a streamer flashed through the cloud, and showed the heavy black waves, mounting round about us.

"Its a plaguy bad night, messmate," said I. Jose turned—the lightning glared over his face—it was pale as death.

"To-night or never!" he replied. "Wear up the doree while I strip"

He did not lose an instant in preparation, and after repeating his caution to wear up the craft, and keep near the place, he crossed himself, and dropped heavily but quietly into the water. I thought I heard a cry as he descended, and my anxiety began to take the course of fear. Jose had scarcely dived a fathom when he arose again to the surface—apparently senseless and inanimate. I thought he had stunned himself against the rocks. I called to him, but he returned me no answer. I called him again and louder, and still no reply. Cold with fear, I paddled towards the place where the lightning had shown me his floating body. One arm was lying listlessly upon the waves. I seized hold of it hastily—and dragged him into the boat. As I did so, blood—warm blood—spouted over my breast and knees, a streamer flashed across the firmament—I utter a yell of horror and let the load drop heavily at my feet. It was a headless trunk! The jaws of a shark had anticipated man's justice—the punishment of the ill-fated and guilty Jose, had only been protracted—not repeated.—The Sun

DEATH.

Death is indeed the disturber of every man's felicity. An ugly shadow that darkens the brightest noon; a frost that defies swaddling clothes, and the glow of summer. It is the great horror of every fancy, the great agony of every heart. The pitiless, pursuing, tireless and unsated hungerer, whose maw seems to expand as it feeds, whose thirst grows with the rush of the fountain that slakes it. A discord shuffling between all our harmonies; a cloud black and baneful in the sky; a wind bitter and fierce over the waters; a thick slimy mist in the air and sand-waste on the earth, wherever we turn. No submission nor bribe; no flattery nor oblation, no prayer nor threatening can avert him. He knows no time, no ceremony, no fear, and no remorse. The king and the beggar, the rich and the poor, the tyrant and the slave, have his favor alike. Sleepers on velvet cushions, in dungeons, upon the rack, or in the fifth of holes, claim the roll-call of death. He carries a dark lanthron, whose taper-wick is fed by the light of souls struggling through pale faces toward Eternity! He is in the air, in the earth, in the sea, on the gleam of the sword, and in the foam that sparkles the rim of the wine cup! The winged Mercury of all "leperous distilments"—poison, murder, plague and famine. The extinction of races is his inheritance, the wail of the world his music, its agony his banquet. He has his pastime picking bones, strangling infants, idiots, dwarfs and grown men, but his holidays are held on battle fields, in massacres, and he delights in inquisitions, headmen's blocks and fandangoes under the gallows. He is the genius of graveyards, the god of worms. He snatches the king from his crown the victor from his wreath, the judge from his ermine, and the bishop from his mitre. The hearth is made desolate by him, and the altar left of its worshippers. Lovers, parents and children, and friends are parted at his nod. Even the poor miser, who has pined and suffered a life time, is robbed from his gold. There is no expectancy he will not cut off, no honor he leaves undisputed, no seal unbroken. He even envies the fool the carriage of his carcase! And yet, Death has some good points. Even his indiscriminacy is not without credit. He takes the whip from the tyrant and the chain from the slave. He relieves the beggar from his rags, the sick man from his pain, and the weeper from his grief. He opens dungeon doors, breaks down prison walls, and lets the captive go free. He is the avenger of innocence, the protector of weakness, and the mocker of injustice. He teaches the peasant the true value of his fields, the merchant of his goods, the money-lender of his gold. He rights the wrong, wipes out distinctions of blood, and proves the equality of men. Death is a sterling Democrat, a leveler, without stint and by measure, and withal, a righteous, impartial and unflinching judge. Death stands by to ward off dishonor, the lash, and all worse infirmities than himself. While he is a tyrant, he is also a drudge and a slave. We can force our burthens upon him, and he cannot escape. He is bound to serve the beggar as well as the prince. He can, not choose a moment's labor, but round and round, with wan cheeks, goes to his task, the fit pack-horse of mankind. He feels no ferocity, for he has no will—commits no atrocity, because he is a tool. His office is only negative, his term within period, and his end annihilation. After all, Death is not such a grim gaunt friend. He saves as many buds as he blights flowers, and he does either from obedience rather than instinct. I neither fear nor love him more than any other servant of Destiny!

C. D S.

THE FRIAR AND THE NIGHT WHISPER.

While Mr. Welch was a minister of one of the French villages, one evening, a Popish friar travelling through the country, because he could find no lodging in the whole village addressed himself to Mr. Welch's house, begging the favour of lodging for that night. The servant informed Mr. Welch who readily consented; but as he had supped, and family worship was over, he did not see the friar, but retired to his room. After the friar had supped, the servant showed him to his chamber, between which and Mr. Welch's there was but a thin deal partition. After the friar's first sleep, he was surprised with hearing a constant whispering kind of noise, at which he was exceedingly frighted.

The next morning, as he walked in the fields, a countryman met him, and, because of his habit, saluted him, asking him "where he had lodged last night?" The friar answered, "with the Huguenot minister." The country man asked him what entertainment he met with. The friar answered, "very bad; for," said he, "I always imagined there were devils haunting those minister's houses, and I am persuaded there was one with me this night; for I heard a continual whisper all the night which I believe was nothing else but the minister and the devil conversing together. The countryman told him he was much mistaken, and that it was only the minister at his night prayers. "O," said the friar, "does the minister pray any?" "Yes," said the countryman, "more than any man in France; and if you stay another night with him, you may be satisfied." The friar returned to Mr. Welch's house, and feigning indisposition, begged another night's lodging, which was granted him.

After a while, Mr. Welch came down, assembled the family, and according to custom, first sung a psalm, then read a portion of the scriptures, which he briefly expounded, and then prayed in his usual fervent manner; to all which the friar was an astonished witness. At dinner the friar was very civilly entertained, Mr. Welch thinking best to forbear all questions and disputes for the present. In the evening Mr. Welch had family worship as in the morning, which occasioned still more wonder in the friar. After supper, they all retired, the friar longed to know what the night-whisper was. He lay awake till Mr. Welch's usual time of night for rising to pray when hearing the same whispering noise, he crept softly to Mr Welch's door and there heard not only the sound, but the words distinctly, and such communication between God and man as he knew not had been in the world. Upon this the friar waited for Mr. Welch to come out of his chamber; when he told him he had lived in darkness and ignorance till this time, but was now resolved to give himself up entirely to Mr. Welch's teaching, and declared himself a Protestant. Mr. Welch congratulated him upon his better understanding, and exceedingly encouraged him; and it is said that he lived and died a true Protestant. "This account I had," says his biographer, "from a very pious minister who was bred in Mr. Welch house in France."

INSTINCT OF BIRDS.—When the lapwing wants to procure food, it seeks for a worm's nest, and stamps the ground by the side of it with its feet, after the manner of boys, in order to procure worms for fishing. After doing this for a short time, the bird waits for the issue of the worm from the hole, who alarmed at the shaking of the ground, endeavors to make its escape, when he is immediately seized and becomes the prey of this ingenious bird.—The Sun

ANTIQUITY OF COURSING.—As early as A. D 150 Arrear wrote a treatise on coursing The Gauls, it appears, first introduced this healthly exercise. Early in the morning the serfs of the nobles went out with the dogs to ascertain the hare's route; having done so they returned to their masters, who instantly mounted, and went in search of puss. In the reign of Elizabeth, when the ladies of the court, instead of tea and bread and butter, took for their breakfast good roast beef, washed down by stout brown beverage, and then spent a whole day on horseback, coursing was so popular a recreation, that her Majesty ordered the Duke of Norfolk to draw up a code of laws for its regulation, which even now is held in great respect by sportsmen.

EMBARRASSING.—The Norwich (Conn) News says that two ladies at a neighboring hotel each presented to her Lord a fine boy at the same time. In the hurry of the occasion, the nurses placed the babies in the same cradle, and were afterwards unable to tell "which from 'tother." The mother's and fathers are vexed and embarrassed at the result. We think we have heard the same story before.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) JULY 30 1847. NO. 17

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. F. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Stone,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. COX,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

CONSTITUTION OF THE REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA

ARTICLE I.

DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.

The end of the institution, maintenance, and administration of government, is to secure the existence of the body politic, to protect it, and to furnish the individuals, who compose it, with the power of enjoying, in safety and tranquility, their natural rights, and the blessings of life; and whenever these great objects are not obtained, the people have a right to alter the government and to take measures, necessary for their safety, prosperity, and happiness.

Therefore, we the people of the Commonwealth of Liberia in Africa, acknowledging with devout gratitude the goodness of God, in granting to us the blessings of the christian religion, and political, religious and civil liberty, do, in order to secure these blessings for ourselves and our posterity, and to establish justice, insure domestic peace, and promote the general welfare, hereby solemnly associate, and constitute ourselves a free, sovereign and independent state, by the name of the Republic of Liberia, and do ordain and establish this Constitution for the government of the same.

Sec. 1st. All men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent and unalienable rights; among which, are the rights of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring possessing and protecting property, and of pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness.

Sec. 2nd. All power is inherent in the people; all free governments are instituted by their authority, and for their benefit, and they have a right to alter and reform the same when their safety and happiness require it.

Sec. 3rd. All men have a natural and unalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences, without obstruction or molestation from others; all persons demeaning themselves peaceably, and not obstructing others in their religious worship, are entitled to the protection of law in the free exercise of their own religion, and no sect or christian shall have exclusive privileges or preference over any other sect; but all shall be alike tolerated; and no religious test whatever shall be required as a qualification for civil office, or the exercise of any civil right.

Sec. 4th. There shall be no slavery within this Republic. Nor shall any citizen of this Republic, or any person resident therein, deal in slaves, either within or without this Republic directly or indirectly.

Sec. 5th. The people have a right at all times, in an orderly and peaceable manner, to assemble and consult upon the common good, to instruct their representatives, and to petition the government, or any public functionaries for the redress of grievances.

Sec. 6th. Every person injured shall have remedy there—for by due course of law; justice shall be done without sale denial or delay: and in all cases not arising under martial law or upon impeachment, the parties shall have a right to a trial, by jury, and to be heard in person or by council, or both.

Sec. 7th. No person shall be held to answer for a capital or infamous crime, except in cases of impeachment. Cases arising in the Army and Navy, and petty offences, unless upon presentment by a grand jury; and every person criminally charged shall have a right to be reasonably furnished with a copy of the charge, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have a speedy public, and impartial trial by a jury of the vicinity. He shall not be compelled to furnish or give evidence against himself, and no person shall for the same offence be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.

Sec. 8th. No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, property, or privilege, but by judgement of his peers, or the law of the land.

Sec. 9th. No place shall be searched nor person seized, on a criminal charge or suspicion unless upon warrant lawfully issued, upon probable cause, supported by oath, or solemn affirmation, specially designating the place or person, and the object of the search.

Sec. 10th. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed nor excessive punishments inflicted; nor shall the legislature make any law impairing the obligation of contracts; nor any law rendering any act punishable, in any manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed.

Sec. 11th. All elections shall be by ballot, and every male citizen, of twenty-one years of age possessing real estate, shall have the right of suffrage.

Sec. 12th. The people have a right to keep and to bear arms for the common defence. And as in time of peace, armies are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be maintained, without the consent of the legislature, and the military power shall always be held in exact subordination to the civil authority and be governed by it.

Sec. 13th. Private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

Sec. 14th. The powers of this government shall be divided into three distinct departments, the Legislative, Executive and Judicial, and no person belonging to one of the departments, shall exercise any of the powers belonging to either of the others. This section is not to be construed to include Justices of the Peace.

Sec. 15th. The liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a state; it ought not, therefore, to be restrained in this Republic.

The printing press shall be free to every person, who undertake to examine the proceedings of the legislature or any branch of government; and no law shall ever be made to restrain the rights thereof. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of man, and every citizen may freely speak, write, and print on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty.

In prosecutions for the publication of papers, investigating the official conduct of officers, or men in public capacity, or where the matter published is proper for public information, the truth thereof may be given in evidence. And in all indictments for libels, the jury shall have a right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court, as in other cases.

Sec. 16th. No ex post facto law, nor law impairing the obligation of contracts, or making any irrevocable grant of special privileges, franchises or immunities shall be passed by the legislature.

Sec. 17th. Suits may be brought against the Republic in such manner, and in such cases as the legislature may, by law direct.

Sec. 18th. No person can, in any case, be subjected to the law martial, or to any penalties or pains, by virtue of that law, (except those employed in the army or navy, and except the militia in actual service) but by the authority of the legislature.

Sec. 19th. In order to prevent those, who are vested with authority, from becoming oppressors, the people have a right at such periods, and in such manner, as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life, and to fill up vacant places, by certain and regular elections and appointments.

Sec. 20th. All prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, unless, for capital offences, when the proof is evident, or presumption great; and the privilege and benefit of the writ of habeas corpus shall be enjoyed in this Republic, in the most free, easy, cheap, expeditious, and ample manner, and shall not be suspended by the legislature, except upon the most urgent and pressing occasions, and for a limited time, not exceeding twelve months.

ARTICLE II.

LEGISLATIVE POWERS.

Sec. 1st. The Legislative power shall be vested in a Legislature of Liberia, and shall consist of two separate branches A House of Representatives and a Senate, to be styled the Legislature of Liberia; each of which shall have a negative on the other, and the enacting style of their acts, and laws, shall be—It is enacted by the Senate and house of Representatives of the republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled.

Sec 2nd. The representatives shall be elected by and for the inhabitants of the several counties of Liberia, and shall be apportioned among the several counties of Liberia as follows:—The county of Montserrado shall have four representatives, the county of Grand Bassa shall have three, and the county of Sinoe shall have one, and all counties hereafter that shall be admitted in the republic shall have one representative, and for every ten thousand inhabitants one representative shall be added. No person shall be a representative who has not resided in the county two whole years immediately previous to his election, and who shall not when elected, be an inhabitant of the county, and does not own real estate of not less value than one hundred and fifty dollars in the county in which he resides, and who shall not have attained the age of twenty-three years, the representatives shall be elected biennially, and shall serve two years from the time of their election.

Sec. 3d. When a vacancy occurs in the representation of any county by death, resignation, or otherwise, it shall be filled by a new election.

Sec. 4th. The house of Representatives shall elect their own speaker and other officers, they shall also have the sole power of impeachment.

Sec. 5th. The Senate shall consist of two members from Montserrado county, two from Bassa county, two from Sinoe county, and two from each county which may be hereafter incorporated into this republic. No person shall be a Senator who shall not have resided three whole years immediately previous to his election in the republic of Liberia, and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of the county which he represents, and who does not own real estate of not less value than two hundred dollars in the county which he represents, and who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years. The Senator for each county who shall have the highest number of votes shall retain his seat four years, and the one who shall have the next highest number of votes two years, and all who are afterwards elected to fill their seats, shall remain in office four years.

Sec. 6th. The Senate shall try all impeachments; the senators being first sworn, or solemnly affirmed to try the same impartially, and according to law, and no person shall be convicted but by the concurrence of two thirds of the Senators present. Judgment in such cases shall not extend beyond removal from office, and disqualification to hold an office in the republic, but the party may still be tried at law for the same offence.

When either the President or Vice President is to be tried, the Chief Justice shall preside.

Sec. 7th. It shall be the duty of the Legislature as soon as conveniently may be after the adoption of this constitution, and once at least in every ten years afterwards to cause a true census to be taken of each town, and county of the republic of Liberia; and a representative shall be allowed every town having a population of ten thousand inhabitants and for every additional ten thousand in the counties after the first census one representative shall be added to that county, until the number of representatives shall amount to thirty, afterwards one representative shall be added for every thirty thousand.

Sec. 8th. Each branch of the legislature shall be judge of the election returns, and qualifications of its own members. A majority of each shall be necessary to transact business, but a less number may adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members. Each house may adopt its own rules of proceedings, enforce order, and with the concurrence of two thirds, may expel a member.

Sec. 9th. Neither house shall adjourn for more than two days without the consent of the other; and both houses shall always sit in the same town.

Sec. 10th. Every bill or resolution which shall have passed both branches of the Legislature, shall before it become a law be laid before the President for his approval. If he approves, he shall sign it, if not, he shall return it to the Legislature with his objections—if the Legislature shall afterwards pass the bill or resolution by a vote of two thirds in each branch, it shall become a law. If the President shall neglect to return such bill or resolution to the Legislature with his objections for five days after the same shall have been so laid before him—the legislature remaining in session during that time, such neglect shall be equivalent to his signature.

Sec. 11. The Senators and Representatives shall receive from the Republic a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law; and shall be privileged from arrest except for treason, felony or breach of the peace, while attending at, going to or returning from the session of the Legislature.

ARTICLE III

EXECUTIVE POWER.

Section 1. The Supreme Executive Power, shall be vested in a President, who shall be elected by the people; and shall hold his office for the term of Two Years. He shall be Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy. He shall, in the recess of the Legislature, have power to call out the Militia or any portion thereof, into actual service in defence of the Republic. He shall have power to make treaties, provided the Senate concur therein by a vote of two thirds of the senators present. He shall nominate, and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint and commission all Ambassadors and other public Ministers and Consuls, Secretaries of State, of War, of the Navy, and of the Treasury, Attorney General, all Judges of courts, Sheriffs, Coroners, Marshalls, Justices of the peace, Clerks of courts, Registers, Notaries Public, and all other officers of state, civil and military, whose appointment may not be otherwise provided for by the constitution, or by standing laws. And in the recess of the Senate, he may fill any vacancies in those offices, until the next session of the senate. He shall receive all Ambassadors and other public ministers. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed,—he shall inform the legislature from time to time, of the condition of the Republic, and recommend any public measures for their adoption which he may think expedient. He may after conviction, remit any public forfeitures and penalties, and grant reprieves and pardons for public offences, except in cases of impeachment. He may inquire information and advice from any public officer, touching matters pertaining to his office. He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene the legislature, and may adjourn the two houses, whenever they cannot agree as to the time of adjournment.

Sec. 2. There shall be a Vice President who shall be elected in the same manner, and for the same term as that of the President, and whose qualifications shall be the same; he shall be president of the Senate, and give the casting vote when the house is equally divided on any subject. And in case of the removal of the president from office, or his death resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office; the same shall devolve on the Vice President; and the Legislature may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation or inability, both of the president and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

Sec. 3. The Secretary of State shall keep the records of the state, and all the records and papers of the legislative body, and all other public records and documents, not belonging to any other department, and shall lay the same when required, before the President or Legislature. He shall attend upon them when required, and perform such other duties as may be enjoined by law.

Sec. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury, or other persons who may by law, be charged with the custody of the public monies, shall before he receive such monies, give bonds to the state, with sufficient sureties, to the acceptance of the legislature, for the faithful discharge of his trust. He shall exhibit a true account of such monies when required by the President or legislature; and no monies shall be drawn from the Treasury, but by warrant from the President, in consequence of appropriation made by law.

Sec. 5. All ambassadors and other public Ministers, and Consuls, the Secretary of State, of War, of the Treasury and of the Navy, the Attorney General, and Post Master General, shall hold their offices during the pleasure of the President. All justices of the peace, sheriffs, coroners, marshalls, clerks of courts registers, and notaries public, shall hold their offices for the term of two years, from the date of their respective commissions; but may be removed from office within that time by the President at his pleasures and all other officers whose term of office may not be otherwise limited by law, shall hold their offices during the pleasure of the President.

Sec 6. Every civil officer may be removed from office by impeachment, for official misconduct. Every such officer may also be removed by the President upon the address of both branches of the Legislature, assigning the particular reasons for his removal.

Sec. 7. No person shall be eligible to the office of President, who has not been a citizen of this Rebulic for at least five years, and shall not have attained the age of thirty five years; and who shall not be possessed of unincumbered real estate, of not less value than six hundred dollars.

Sec. 8. The President shall at stated times receive for his services, a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished, during the period for which he shall have been elected;—and before he enters on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation.

I do solemnly swear, (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the Republic of Liberia, and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect and defend the constitution and enforce the laws of the Republic of Liberia.

ARTICLE IV.

JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT.

Section 1. The Judicial power of this Republic shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such subordinate courts as the Legislature may from time to time establish. The Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Judges of Court, shall hold their office during good behaviour; but may be removed by the President, on the address of two thirds of both houses for that purpose, or by impeachment and conviction thereon. The Judges shall receive salaries established by law, which may be increased, but not diminished during their continuance in office. They shall not receive any other perquisite or emoluments whatever, from parties or otherwise, on account of any duty required of them.

Sec 2. The Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases affecting ambassadors or other public ministers and consuls, and those to which the Republic shall be a party. In all other cases the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and facts with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Legislature shall from time to time make.

ARTICLE V.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

Sec. 1st. All laws now in force in the Commonwealth of Liberia and not repugnant to this constitution, shall be in force as the laws of the Republic of Liberia, until they shall be repealed by the Legislature.

Sec. 2nd. All judges, magistrates, and other officers now concerned in the administration of justice in the Commonwealth of Liberia, and all other existing civil and military officers theiren, shall continue to hold and discharge their respective offices in the name and by the authority of the Republic, until others shall be appointed and commissioned in their stead pursuant to this Constitution.

Sec. 3d. All towns and municipal corporations within this Republic, constituted under the laws of the Commonwealth of Liberia, shall retain their existing organizations and privileges, and the respective officers thereof shall remain in office and act under the authority of this Republic, in the same manner and with the like powers as they now possess under the laws of said Commonwealth.

Sec. 4th The first election of President, Vice President Senators and Rrepresentatives shall be held on the first Tuesday in October in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and forty-seven in the same manner as elections of members of the Council are chosen in the Commonwealth of Liberia, and the votes shall be certified and returned to the Colonial Secretary, and the result of the election shall be ascertained, posted and notified by him as is now by law provided in case of such members of Council.

Sec. 5th. All other elections of President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, shall be held in the respective towns on the first Tuesday in May in every two years, to be held and regulated in such manner as the Legislature may by law prescribe. The returns of votes shall be made to the Secretary of State who, shall open the same, and forthwith issue notices of the election to the persons apparently so elected Senators and Representatives; and all such returns shall be by him laid before the Legislature at its next ensuing session, together with a list of the names of the persons who appear by such returns to have been duly elected senators and representatives; and the persons appearing by said returns to be duly elected shall proceed to organise themselves accordingly as the Senate and House of Representatives. The votes for President shall be sorted, counted, and declared by the House of Representatives. And if no person shall appear to have a majority of such votes, the Senators, and Representatives present, shall in convention, by joint ballot, elect from among the persons having the three highest numbers of votes, a person to act as President for the ensuing term.

Sec. 6th. The Legislature shall assemble once at least in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in January, unless a different day shall be appointed by law.

Sec. 7. Every legislator and other officer appointed under this constitution, shall before he enters upon the duties of his office, take and subscribe a solemn oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of this Republic, and faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of such office. The presiding officer of the Senate shall administer such oath or affirmation to the President, in convention of both houses; and the President shall administer the same to the Vice President, to the Senators, and to the Representatives in like manner. If the President is unable to attend, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, may administer the oath or affirmation to him, at any place, and also to the Vice President, Senators and Representatives, in convention. Other officers may take such oath or affirmation before the President, Chief Justice, or any other person who may be designated by law.

Sec. 8. All elections of public officers shall be made by a majority of the votes, except in cases otherwise regulated by the constitution or by law.

Sec. 9. Offices created by this Constitution which the present circumstances of the Republic do not require that they shall be filled, shall not be filled until the Legislature shall deem it necessary.

Sec. 10. The property of which a woman may be possessed at the time of her marriage and also that of which she may afterwards become possessed, otherwise than by her husband shall not be held responsible for his debts; whether contracted before or after marriage.

Nor shall the property thus intended to be secured to the woman be alienated otherwise than by her free and voluntary consent, and such alienation may be made by her either by sale devise or otherwise.

Sec. 11. In all cases in which estates are insolvent the widow shall be entitled to one third of the real estate during her natural life, and to one third of all the personal estate, which she shall hold in her own right, subject to alienation by her, by devise or otherwise.

Sec. 12th. No person shall be entitled to hold real estate in this Republic unless he be a citizen of the same. Nevertheless this article shall not be construed to apply to Colonization, Missionary, Educational, or other benevolent institutions, so long as the property or estate is applied to its legitimate purposes.

Sec. 13 The great object of forming these Colonies being to provide a home for the dispersed and oppressed children of Africa, and to regenerate and enlighten this benighted continent, none but persons of Color shall be admitted to citizenship in this Republic.

Sec. 14th. The purchase of any land by any citizen or citizens from the aborigines of this country for his, or their own use, or for the benefit of others, an estate or estates in fee simple, shall be considered null and void to all intents and purposes.

Sec. 15th. The improvement of the native tribes and their advancement in the arts of agriculture and husbandry being a cherished object of this government, it shall be the duty of the President to appoint in each county some discreet person whose duty it shall be to make regular and periodical tours through the country for the purpose of calling the attention of the natives to these wholesome branches of industry, and of instructing them in the same; and the legislature shall, as soon as can conveniently be done make provision for these purposes by the appropriation of money.

Sec. 16th The existing regulations of the American Colonization Society, in the Commonwealth, relative to emigrants, shall remain the same in the Republic, until regulated by compact between the Society and the Republic; nevertheless, the Legislature shall make no law prohibiting emigration. And it shall be among the first duties of the Legislature, to take measures to arrange the future relations between the American Colonization Society and this Republic.

Sec, 17. This constitution may be altered whenever two thirds of both branches of the legislature shall deem it necessary. In which case the alterations or amendments, shall first be considered and approved by the legislature, by the concurrence of two thirds of the members of each branch, and afterwards by them submitted to the people, and adopted by two thirds of all the electors at the next biennial meeting for the election of senators and representatives.

Done in CONVENTION, at Monrovia, in the County of Montserrado, by the unanimous consent of the people of the Commonwealth of Liberia, this twenty sixth day of July, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Forty-seven, and of the REPUBLIC the First. In witness whereof we have hereto set our names.

S. BENEDICT, President.
J. N. LEWIS,
H. TEAGE,
BEVERLY R. WILSON,
ELIJAH JOHNSON,
J. B. GRIPON.
JOHN DAY,
A. W. GARDNER,
AMOS HERRING,
EPHRAIM TITLER,
R. E. MURRAY,
J. W. PROUT,
Secretary of Convention.

Montserrado County.
Grand Bassa County.
County of Sinoe.

Monrovia, July 29th, 1847.

Fellow Citizens:

Having finished our labors, we now have the honor of submitting to your consideration, through the Governor, that Constitution which in our opinion will best suit the peculiar circumstances of the people of this infant Republic. That our labors will meet the full approbation of every individual citizen, is scarcely to be expected; we trust however, that a large majority of our fellow citizens, will approve our doings, and adopt the constitution herewith submitted.

In our deliberations, we endeavored to keep our minds steadily fixed upon the great objects of civil government, and have done what we conceived to be best for the general interest of this rising Republic. We endeavored carefully to arrange every subject that might possibly arise, calculated to disturb in the least the friendly feeling which now so happily subsists between the different counties of this Republic. We felt deeply the importance and magnitude of the work submitted to our hands, and have done the very best we could in order to afford general satisfaction.

In view of the peculiarity of our circumstances, the new position we have assumed, is indeed a gigantic one, and the government now calls to its support, every citizen who is at all interested or concerned for the safety, and future prosperity of this our adopted home.

Knowing however, that our cause is just, we feel encouraged, and believe that under God, by a steady perseverance, we shall fully succeed.

In publishing to the world our Independence, we have thought proper to accompany the same, with a declaration of the causes which induced us to leave the land of our nativity and to form settlements on this coast, and also an appeal to the sympathies of all civilized nations, soliciting their aid and protection and especially that they would, notwithstanding our peculiar circumstances, speedily recognize our Independence.

And that the Flag of this Republic at no distant day may be seen floating upon every breeze, and in every land respected.

It is our earnest desire that the affairs of this government may be so conducted as to merit the approbation of all christendom, and restore to Africa her long lost glory, and that Liberia under the guidance of heaven may continue a happy asylum for our long oppressed race, and a blessing to the benighted and degraded natives of this vast peninsula. To secure which is our ardent wish and prayer.

With great respect we have the honor of being your obedient and humble servants.

By the unanimous order of the convention

SAMUEL BENEDICT,
President.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

We the representatives of the people of the Commonwealth of Liberia, in Convention Assembled, invested with authority forforming a new government, relying upon the aid and protection of the Great Arbiter of human events, do hereby, in the name and on behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, publish and declare the said Commonwealth a FREE, SOVEREIGN, and INDEPENDENT STATE, by the name and title of the REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA.

While announcing to the nations of the world the new position which the people of this Republic have felt themselves called upon to assume, courtesy to their opinion seems to demand a brief accompanying statement of the causes which induced them, first to expatriate themselves from the land of their nativity and to form settlements on this barbarous coast, and now to organize their government by the assumption of a sovereign and independent character. Therefore we respectfully ask their attention to the following facts.

We recognise in all men certian natural and unalienable rights; among these are life, liberty, and the right to acquire, possess, enjoy and defend property. By the practice and consent of men in all ages, some system or form of government is proven to be necessary to exercise, enjoy and secure these rights; and every people has a right to institute a government and to choose and adopt that system or form of it, which in their opinion will most effectually accomplish these objects, and secure their happiness, which does not interfere with the just rights of others. The right therefore to institute government, and to all the powers necessary to conduct it, is, an inalienable right, and cannot be resisted without the grossest injustice.

We the people of the Republic of Liberia were originally the inhabitants of the United States of North America.

In some parts of that country, we were debarred by law from all the rights and privileges of men—in other parts, public sentiment, more powerful than law, frowned us down.

We were every where shut out from all civil office.

We were excluded from all participation in the government.

We were taxed without our consent.

We were compelled to contribute to the resources of a country, which gave us no protection.

We were made a separate and distinct class, and against us every avenue to improvement was effectually closed. Strangers from all lands of a color different from ours, were preferred before us.

We uttered our complaints, but they were unattended to, or only met by alledging the peculiar institutions of the country.

All hope of a favorable change in our country was thus wholly extinguished in our bosom, and we looked with anxiety abroad for some asylum from the deep degradation.

The Western coast of Africa was the place selected by American benevolence and philanthropy, for our future home. Removed beyond those influences which depressed us in our native land, it was hoped we would be enabled to enjoy those rights and privileges, and exercise and improve those faculties, which the God of nature has given us in common with the rest of mankind.

Under the auspices of the American Colonization Society, we established ourselves here, on land acquired by purchase from the Lords of the soil.

In an original compact with this Society, we, for important reasons delegated to it certain political powers; while this institution stipulated that whenever the people should become capable of conducting the government, or whenever the people should desire it, this institution would resign the delegated power, peaceably withdraw its supervision, and leave the people to the government of themselves.

Under the auspices and guidance of this institution, which has nobly and in perfect faith redeemed its pledges to the people, we have grown and prospered.

From time to time, our number has been increased by migration from America, and by accessions from native tribes; and from time to time, as circumstances required it, we have extended our borders by acquisition of land by honorable purchase from the natives of the country.

As our territory has extended, and our population increased, our commerce has also increased. The flags of most of the civilized nations of the earth float in our harbors, and their merchants are opening an honorable and profitable trade. Until recently, these visits have been of a uniformly harmonious character, but as they have become more frequent, and to more numerous points of our extending coast, questions have arisen, which it is supposed can be adjusted only by agreement between sovereign powers.

For years past, the American Colonization Society has virtually withdrawn from all direct and active part in the administration of the government, except in the appointment of the Governor, who is also a colonist, for the apparent purpose of testing the ability of the people to conduct the affairs of government, and no complaint of crude legislation, nor of mismanagement, nor of mal-administration has yet been heard.

In view of these facts, this institution, the American Colonization Society, with that good faith which has uniformly marked all its dealings with us, did, by a set of resolutions in January, in the Year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Forty Six, dissolve all political connexion with the people of this Republic, return the power with which it was delegated, and left the people to the goverment of themselves.

The people of the Republic of Liberia then, are of right, and in fact, a free, sovereign and independent State, possessed of all the rights, and powers, and functions of government.

In assuming the momentous responsibilities of the position they have taken, the people of this Republic, feel justified by the necessities of the case, and with this conviction they throw themselves with confidence upon the candid consideration of the civilzed world.

Liberia is not the offspring of grasping ambition, nor the tool of avaricious speculation.

No desire for territorial aggrandizement brought us to these shores; nor do we believe so sordid a motive entered into the high consideration of those who aided us in providing this asylum.

Liberia is an asylum from the most grinding oppression.

In coming to the shores of Africa, we indulged the pleasing hope that we would be permitted to exercise and improve those faculties, which impart to man his dignity—to nourish in our hearts the flame of honorable ambition, to cherish and indulge those aspirations, which a Benificent Creator hath implanted in every human heart, and to evince to all who despise, ridicule and oppress our race, that we possess with them a common nature, are with them susceptible of equal refinement, and capable of equal advancement in all that adorns and dignifies man.

We were animated with the hope, that here we should be at liberty to train up our children in the way they should go—to inspire them with the love of an honorable fame, to kindle within them, the flame of a lofty philanthropy, and to form strong within them, the principles of humanity, virtue and religion.

Among the strongest motives to leave our native land—to abandon forever the scenes of our childhood, and to sever the most endeared connexions, was the desire for a retreat where, free from the agitations of fear and molestation, we could, in composure and security approach in worship the God of our Fathers.

Thus far our highest hopes have been realized.

Liberia is already the happy home of thousands, who were once the doomed victims of oppression, and if left unmolested to go on with her natural and spontaneous growth; if her movements be left free from the paralysing intrigues of jealous ambition and unscrupulous avarice, she will throw open a wider and a wider door for thousands, who are now looking with an anxious eye for some land of rest.

Our courts of justice are open equally to the stranger and the citizen for the redress of grievances, for the remedy of injuries, and for the punishment of crime.

Our numerous and well attended schools attest our efforts, and our desire for the improvement of our children.

Our churches for the worship of our Creator, every where to be seen, bear testimony to our piety, and to our acknowledgement of His Providence.

The native African bowing down with us before the altar of the living God, declares that from us, feeble as we are, the light of christianity has gone forth, while upon that curse of curses, the slave trade, a deadly blight has fallen as far as our influence extends.

Therefore in the name of humanity, and virtue and religion—in the name of the Great God, our common Creator, and our common Judge, we appeal to the nations of christendom, and earnestly and respectfully ask of them, that they will regard us with the sympathy and friendly consideration to which the peculiarities of our condition entitle us, and to extend to us that comity which marks the friendly intercourse of civilized and independent communities.

Done in CONVENTION, at Monrovia in the County of Montserrado, by the unanimous consent of the people of the Commonwealth of Liberia, this twenty-sixth day of July, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Forty-seven, and of the REPUBLIC the First. In witness whereof we have hereto set our names

S. BENEDICT, President.
J. N. LEWIS,
H. TEAGE,
BEVERLY R. WILSON,
ELIJAH JOHNSON,
J. B. GRIPON.
JOHN DAY,
A. W. GARDNER,
AMOS HERRING,
EPHRAIM TITTLER.
R. E. MURRAY.
J. W. PROUT.
Secretary of Convention.

Montserrado County.
Grand Bassa County.
County of Sinoe.

For the Liberia Herald.

The following Flag and Seal were adopted by the Convention, as the insignia of the Republic of Liberia, and ordered to be employed to mark its nationality.

Flag: six red stripes with five white stripes alternately displayed longitudinally. In the upper angle of the flag, next to the spear, a square blu ground covering in depth five stripes. In the centre of the blue one white star.

Seal. A Dove on the wing with an open scroll in its claws. A view of the ocean with a ship under sail. The sun just emerging from the waters A Palm tree, and at its base a plow and spade. Beneath the emblems, the words REPULIC OF LIBERIA, and above the emblems, the national Motto, THE LOVE OF LIBERTY BROUGHT US HERE.

The former seal of the Commonwealth is ordered to be used until that for the Republic shall be engraved.

By order of the Convention.

S. BENEDICT,
President.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, JULY 31, 1847.

THE CONSTITUTION.

On the first page of the present number, our readers will find the Constitution of the Republic of Liberia.

Pursuant to the Act of the Legislature, the delegates met in Convention in the Council Chamber, in this place on the 5th, inst., set heartily to work, and concluded their labors on the 26th. The result of their labors we present in the constitution, which is now submitted to the consideration of the people, and which it is hoped will be acceptable to them. Should they adopt it, our government will, by the act of acceptance, be reorganized and go fairly to work a complete and ensure system.

The act upon which the people of these Colonies have been forced by stern necessity, is pregnant with weal or woe; and should be regarded as the first in a series which conducts infallibly to credit or disgrace.

Apart from the solemnity that must ever attend the act, by which a young community throws off the yoke of its vassalage, and asserts its character of political manhood, there are circumstances attendant upon our case of a most impressive character. These circumstances stand out with a striking prominence, upon every page of the history of the colony so obviously as renders it unnecessary that we should mention them. The fact will, in some measure account for the deep and undefinable sensation which ran through the hall, and almost still every bosom, when on the 26th, inst., the members in presence of a numerous assembly composed of males and females, advanced one by one to the Secretary's desk to put their names to the Declaration of Independence and appeal to the nations of Christendom. It seemed like entering upon a new era, the commencement of a new existence—the launching upon an ocean, vast in its extent, and unexplored by any whom we can call to the helm.

That man amongst us who does not feel, that by this act, he has entered upon a new career; has assumed new responsibilities and has received a new impetus and a new motive to action, is to be pitied for his blindness, rather than envied for his indifference, and to say the least, he is not yet prepared for extensive usefulness.

We would warn our people against the infatuation of supposing that because we have declared ourselves sovereign and independent, therefore have fulfilled our destiny, and attained the summit of political perfection; and we would also warn them against despondency, in view of any difficulties we may be called to encounter. Our condition affords no scope for sole enthusiasm, nor for unmanly timidity. All great undertaking are attended with difficulties, and usually demand an effort proportioned to their magnitude. It is of the last importance for us to know where, and by whom this effort is to be made. We need, and if we are wise, we will seek the sympathy and friendly countenance of foreign nations. It will be encouraging to be recognised as forming one in the great community of nations, and to receive the usual comities of that relation; still we must learn to cast off all unreasonable expectation from every foreign quarter, and be penetrated with the conviction, that the proper scene of this extraordinary effort is the Republic of Liberia, and the effort itself to be made by us.

On another page will be seen the declaration of independence, followed by a brief statement of the causes which have led to that act. The peculiarities of our condition seemed to require some little explanation which is there attempted to be given. Thus we have fairly launched upon the ocean, expanded our sails to the breeze, trusting to the merits of our cause—to the genius of justice and humanity, and to the guidance of a benignant Providence.

Directly after signing the declaration of Independence, the following resolutions having been drawn up a committee appointed for the purpose, were presented and unanimously adopted.

Whereas the people of these colonies, after a careful survey of the present exigencies of the state, have thought proper to act upon the suggestions of their friends in America, to withdraw from political relation with the American Colonization Society: We the undersigned, their representatives in Convention Assembled, deem the present a proper occasion on which to record the sentiment of the whole people of these colonies, in respect of that institution: Therefore

Resolved—That we individually and collectively cherish the liveliest gratitude for the American Colonization Society: that we repose undiminised confidence in its disinterestedness and sincere desire for our welfare.

Resolved,—That to the guiding and beneficient hand of that institution, we owe all the good which has been accomplished in us individually, and all that is cheering in the prospect which now opens before us as a people:

Resolved,—That in the past unwearied labors of its members, as well individual as combined, we have a pleasing earnest of their future regard.

Resolved,—That we are now, and will remain deeply solicitous to maintain such a friendly feeling and correspondence with the Board of Directors as will enable the society which it represents, as well as the American people at large to carry out their benevolent designs in regard to the colored people of the United States, the colony of Liberia, and the continent of Africa:

Resolved,—That the Governor be furnished with a copy of these resolutions accompanied with a request that they be forwarded to the Board of Directors of the American Colonization Society.

We regret to be compelled to appear before our subscribers again, with the language of apology. The fact is both of the editors have been busy in the convention and the compositor has had his hands full in doing the printing for that body. We have purposed within ourself to make up in the future. If not we will—apologise again.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

SNAKES IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

Every country has its blessings; and no one, besides the land of Utopia, which has never yet been discovered, is without its corresponding evils. New South Wales is infested with snakes of various kinds; many cargoes of which have been picked up in the gaols of England: but vast numbers are natives to the soil. Both species are dreadfully venimous; and perhaps it is difficult to say, of which the poison is the most deleterious.

With the general character of the British snakes, our readers are tolerably well acquainted; but respecting the poisonous qualities of the native servants, the following facts may appear both new and interesting:—

Some time in January, 1821, a grass-cutter, under government, employed in the neighbourhood of Kissing Point, was bitten by a black snake, and shortly after died. The only remarkable circumstance attached to this sad event, is, that the poor man wore at the time a pair of Parramata factory cloth trowsers, which are particularly thick and woolly, and were thought protective hitherto from the poisonous touch of the reptile's teeth; but that such a defence is no longer to be depended on, is, now incontestable proved.

More recently than the preceding, the daughter of a Mr. Reynolds, residing at Wilberforce, was bitten on the hand by a snake, and, though the affected part was immediately cut out by Dr. Parmeta, for two days she remained under the influence of the venom, during which time her life was in the utmost danger. Hapily, however, it was finally subdued, and she recovered.

Sometime in September, 1821, the following fact occurred, which may serve as a warning, in cases where serpents have no existence.

The servant of gentleman, while working on an estate in the interior, (New South Wales) was unfortunately bitten by a black snake, in one of his fingers. Aware of his danger, he, having an axe with him, without hesitation, immediately laid the wounded finger on a block and, at one stroke, lopped it off, to prevent the infection from spreading. In this condition he hastened home to his master, who approved his courage, and dressed the wound. In consequence of these decisive measures, no alarming symtoms appeared; the wound began to heal, and here the affair apparently ended. In the course of a few days, however, prompted by curiosity, he visited the spot where the accident had happened, and where, on the stumpt of the tree, he had left the amputated joint. Finding it in a putrid state, he took it up, and examined it, and not satisfied with sight and touch, he applied it to his nostrils. The consequence was, that he was immediately seized with a delirium, and very shortly afterwards died

CREDULITY.

An English traveller, witnessing a grand procession at a village near Turin, where four men, walking before the rest, carried a box which was said to contain the bones of St John, inquired of a sagacious-looking old man, "if all the saint's bones were there?" He assured him, that "not even a joint of his little finger was wanting." "Because," continued the traveller, "I have seen a considerable number of bones in different parts of Italy, which are said to be the bones of St. John." The old man smiled at the Englishman's simplicity, and said, "the world was full of imposition! but nothing could be more certain, than those in the box were the ture bones of the saint; he had remember them ever since he was a child, and his father, on his deathbed, had told him, on the word of a dying man, that they belonged to St John, and no other body."

THE MESSAGE IN ENGLAND.

We hope that Mr. Polk may be blessed with grace enough to read the following article from the London Chronicle. Not that we suppose it will do him any good, but that he may learn that one need be neither a Whig or an Abolitionist to understand the character of his message:

It seems a monstrous thing that mouth of man should run on thus: that it should parade hypocrisy in the daylight; that it should insult the understanding of a world. It seems incredible—incredible, not as a matter of principle or partisanship, as a matter of right or wrong, as a point of honesty or falsehood We lay the morality of the thing aside. We place it in the limbo of things lost on earth, and which will not be found in heaven—with the oaths of lovers, the truth of epitaphs, the ententes cordiales of Guizot, and the bonds of Pennsylvania. We deal with the exposition of such gross fallacies as those of Mr. Polk's speech, simply as a matter of advocacy, as a question of wise or foolish, or clever or stupid, of policy or of folly. To what end make statements that will deceive no one, and which will undo so much credit for the future?

The answer is, for the sake of those who want an excuse for being persuaded; for the sake of the conscience of the future Governor or California; for the tenderness of the scruples of the expectant Judge of Tamaulipas: for the Solicitor-General of New Mexico; for the religious missionaries that shall appropriate the picked lands of Coahuila for the psalm-singing riflemen that are choosing their localities in Zacatecas; for every American that has either a promise or a hope of spoil; for the bona fide speculator who has definite views of the particular Mexican that he means to rob, and for the sanguine Alnaschar that is dreaming indefinitely of an El Dorado. All these men want a justification. The demand creates the supply. So casuistry rises in the market.

To look upon the speech in question in any other light, is to judge ill of Mr. Polk; that is, to judge of him in a way disagreeable to himself. To imagine he had sufficient faith in his own defence to mistake his message for a justification of his conduct in the eyes of any part of Europe, or even in those of half America, would be to accuse him of the disreputable blindness of sincerity. He must know himself that this is not the case. He has put himself beyond the reach of credence. The best thing that can be said of him is, that he knows his position.

JUDICIAL ANECDOTE. The Tallahassee Floridian tells a rather good anecdote of a mercantile gentleman who once filled the office of judge in the new State of Florida It seems that under the old regime, that is, territorial, the judges of County Courts were appointed by the Governor and Council, and, as in some of the counties there were no legal gentleman, citizens of other professions had to be selected. In one of the sparsely settled counties, a gentleman of intelligence, who was a merchant, was persuaded to accept the commission; and soon after was called on to decide a knotty legal dispute for about seventy dollars. He gave his decision and judgement as he deemed right, but the party who lost the case was a poor man, & after the decision and payment of the debt he visited the judge, retried the case EX-PARTE, and argued it over again EX PARTE, and entirely convinced his honor that his judgement was erroneous, and that the payment of the money had distressed his family greatly

"Look here," says the judge, "my good fellow, I'll fix it. Here is the amount of the judgment and costs and may I be d—if I don't resign!" He wrote the defendant's receipt on the back of his commission, and sent both to the Governor, and vows he will never play judge again.

SCARCITY OF WOMEN.—The Wisconsin Herald says that there is a great scarcity of women in the lead mines. Any industrious girl there can earn one hundred dollars perannum, besides her board, either as a domestic assistant or at sewing. It is strange that the girls have not enterprize enough to go where they can earn a comfortable living.— Thousands of amiable, intelligent and handsome girls living in penury in the Atlantic cities, who if there, would be provided with comfortable homes. The influence of one virtuous and refined woman will subdue more ferocity than half a dozen green missionaries. The morals of those people have certainly improved with female emigration, and it is a fine, rich, improving and healthy county to live in.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile business under the firm of Samuel F. McGill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MC GILL,
R. S. MC GILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

Office of the Liberia Herald.
Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances fro them.

JOHN N. LEWIS
Gen: Agent and Treasurer

Died in this town, on the 26th, inst David son of Mr Joseph Mars, after an illness of about three days.

In this town on the 30th, inst. Mary Ann, daughter of Mr and Mrs. James Johnson, after an illness of two or three hours.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	8	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	33 1/3
Beef, cargo No. 1.	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Baftas,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	28	30
Boards,	1000*ft*	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	12 1/2	18
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12 1/2	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	13	14
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	10 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	10 00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1/3	34
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter.	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1/2	25
Romauls	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none
Sugar loaf	Lb.	12
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 00	3 75
Tobacco	1000*lbs.*	9 00	10 00
Waistband bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00	5 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	10 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	20 00

NAVAL ARRIVALS.

June 11 H. B. M. Sloop "Favorite," Commander A. Murray, from the windward—reports the capture of the Brazilian brig "Tres" by H. B. M. Sloop "Siren." The Favorite sailed on the 13th for Cape Mount—all well.

June 23. The French Schooner of war "L. Hirondelle" E. Bellignie Esq. Commander 9 days from Grand Bassa—sailed on the 30th for Cape Palmas.

July 8 U. States Brig Dolphin, Pope Esq. Commander 30 days from Loando, via Gaboon—sailed 22 for Porto Praya. Officers all well.

POETRY

From the Tribune.

CHRIST BETRAYED.

BY ANNE C. LYNCH.

Eighteen hundred years agone
Was that deed of darkness done;
Was that sacred, thorn-crowned head
To a shameful death betrayed,
And Iscariot's traitor name
Blazoned in eternal shame.
Thou, disciple of our time,
Follower of the faith sublime,
Who with high and holy scorn
Of that traitorous deed dost burn,
Though the years may never more
To our earth that form restore,
The Christ-Spirit ever lives,
Ever in thy heart He strives.
When pale Misery meekly calls,
When thy tempted brother falls
When thy gentle words may chain
Hate, and Anger, and disdain,
Or thy loving smile impart
Courage to some sinking heart;
When within thy troubled breast
Good and evil thoughts contest,
Though unconscious thou may'st be
The Christ-Spirit strives with thee

When He trod the Holy Land
With His small Disciple band,
And the fated hour had come
For that august martyrdom;
When the man, the human love,
And the God within Him strove,
As in Gethsemane He wept,
They, the faithless watchers, slept;
While for them he wept and prayed,
One denied, and one betrayed.

If to-day thou turn'st aside
In thy luxury and pride,
Wrapped within thyself, and blind
To the sorrows of thy kind,
Though a faithless watch dost keep,
Thou art one of those who sleep.
Or, if waking thou dost see
Nothing of Divinity
In our fallen, struggling race,
If in them thou seest no trace
Of a glory dimmed, not gone,
Of a Future to be won,
Of a Future, hopeful, high,
Thou, like Peter, dost deny.
But if, seeing, thou believest,
If the Evangelist thou receivest,
Yet if thou art bound to Sin,
False to the Ideal within,
Slave of Ease, or slave of Gold,
Thou the Son of God hast sold.

MISCELLANEOUS

From the Living Age.

MR. HODGSON'S "Notes need not detain us at any length, seeing that although he must have had unusual scope for observation; and enjoyed the privileges of his official position, he either has not taken advantage of his opportunities to go widely into Tunisian life and character, or has not indulged, if he possesses it, a descriptive talent, where, one would suppose, there was such an abundant field for graphic pen and pencil. On the contrary science is his department, applied to language, and the origin of races, as these presented themselves to him in Northern Africa; nor have we any doubt of his work proving a valuable contribution to this class of speculations; the numerous materials and evidences, besides which he has industriously and with skill gathered, being calculated to supply scholars with data, and, perhaps, with incontrovertible conclusions, in relation to the recondite subjects handled. The vocabularies which he has collected, are, at least, curious; and we know that language is one of the surest truest keys to history, be it social or political.

Very different is the character of Mr Blofeld's "Algeria," for it goes as far to the extreme of discursiveness, and comprehensive aim, as the "Notes" to that of limitation and confinement. The author, indeed, at once deals very fairly with purchasers and readers; for he distinctly tells us that his book contains "a description of the country, the Moors, Kabyles, Arabs, Turks, Jews, Negroes, Colouglies and other inhabitants; their habits manners, customs, &c together with notices of the animal and vegetable productions, minerals, climate &c with a review of its history from the earliest periods to the present time, the whole carefully revised and corrected from notes made during a personal visit in 1843, and from the works of ancient and modern historians, travellers, &c., official documents of the French government, the memoirs of the corps of savans, &c. &c." It must be quite manifest from the foregoing announcement, that this is a book which, in a great measure, has been made out of books, and that it must to that extent be tested according to the requirements of compilation. As such, we have to say, that it has the merit of closeness, pertinency, and condensation. We have also to state, that even the gatherings from others have that air of freshness and truth which naturally might be expected from a writer who is interested in his subject, and who strung his notes together on the very spot to which they properly belonged. But the work is not entirely compilation well executed, for a considerable portion is the result of experience, personal inquiry, and eye-sight; the whole spiced with a sufficiency of classical and antiquarian lore, to lend the richness of variety, and the learning proper for seasoning the whole. The country is sketched with a painstaking interest; the motley population are graphically described; and the natural productions are very fully enumerated and characterized. Algeria is wealthy in regard to domestic animals, and Mr. Blofeld has registered them, as well as the vegetable natives, with great care. In short, the volume in the present state of European knowledge which exists in respect of Algeria, is the completest that we know of; and whether considered as a guide, a compact history, or a traveller's notes of observation and reminiscence, is to be recommended.

It is to be remarked, however that our present state of knowledge concerning Algeria is very limited, and, indeed, as far as regards the entire territory and people of Barbary for few travellers have the courage to adventure any considerable distance beyond the southern shores of the Mediterranean, or of Morocco on the Atlantic seaboard. At the same time everybody feels, since the French attempt at conquest and occupation of Algiers has been made, that Barbary must command a consistently increasing interest' were it merely as an experiment in colonization, and as this is conducted by our gay and gallant neighbors

It has generally been held as a settled point, that the French cannot compare with the British as colonists, making the comparison merely on the score of living in harmony with the native population of a settlement. They err in rashly interfering not only with the habits and prejudices of the people among whom they sit down, but in forgetting that the prosperity of the conquering colonist is necessarily coordinate and concomitant with that of the aboriginal race, or the conquered possessor. With reference to minor matters, it would appear, for example, from Blofeld's testimony, that the French have erected buildings in the city of Algiers, of such a towering height, as to overlook the Moorish flat roof, so as to prevent the imprisoned women the enjoyment of one of their greatest recreations. There are, however, grounds for much graver charges, amounting to gross folly oppression, and cruelty. But into these we do not enter; thinking it better that our readers should bestow a glance upon many instances of British policy in our government of India, and other quarters of the globe.

A not less important theme than that of the comparative merits of systems of colonization, and indeed, one arising naturally from it, lending it its weight and depth, consists of the question of civilization. Will the retention of Algeria by France prove a point d'appui for the entrance of the paraphernalia of good? Instead of undertaking an answer, we would rather propound another query: —To whom could the French restore the Algerine territory? The Turks!—they would immediately bear war with the Moors for supremacy, and both Moors and Turks would join in oppressing the Jews. Then the Arabs would assert their independence, and there would be a universal civil war. Nay, it is doubtful whether, in the event of the French relinquishing Algiers, and even both in Europe and Africa, the Algerines would not again rebuild their pirate ships, and exact their cruelties on Christain captives.

We do not generally meet with books of the present class, from which it is so difficult to glean scattered passages that will each in itself, and within an available compass, greatly interest the reader, as in that of the case before us. Still we make few dips. And first, we merely invite attention to the fact that, although Algeria forms part of that vast territory anciently called Mauritania and Numidia, designated by the Romans "the garden of the world," yet the French entertain a disgust towards their settlement and, according to Mr. Blofeld, in almost every case, are "looking forward to accumulating a purse which would enable them to return home at some future period, and live at ease." Now, there is matter in this statement for serious speculation, were it only as regards the character and the condition of the persons and families that hasten thither, or the samples that shall remain. But, to proceed, and not to tarry with our author in his particularizing account of the city of Algiers, as it existed before the arrival of the French let us note some of the improvements which have been made by them: —

"Algiers has been greatly altered by the French; within the last ten or twelve years, entire streets have been formed or re-constructed, and buildings of several stories have been raised in the Parisian style. Private industry has made great progress, and the European shops contain an assortment of all kind of commodities; there is no want of articles of luxury or ornament: their bazaars include the fashions and novelties of Paris; bronzes, porcelain, glass rich shawls, embroideries, woollen stuff, silks, cottons, &c., while the shops are numerous, and as various as those in the generality of the best French towns. Some immense works have been made in the 'Place du Gouvernment,' in the streets 'De la Marine,' 'Bab Azoun,' and 'Bab el Oued; these have a handsome appearance with their long galleries, their shops, and the crowds which animate them In the street of Bab el Oued the passengers are more numerous than those in the Strand London. In these places, excepting in some parts of the Rue Bab el Oued, there are no longer any Moorish houses, all is changed, and were it not for the throng of turks, Moors, Arabs, Negroes, &c., &c., the stranger might fancy himself in one of the principal French cities. There are two theatres at Algiers, the 'Grand Theatre,' and the 'Theatre des petites varies;' the performances are very respectable, and the Grand Theatre; is sometimes visited by principal performers from Paris Besides having some good libraries, there are two well conducted French newspapers published here, One of them, the 'Akobar,' I have now before me. It was published on the eighth Rammadhon, 1859, that is, on Thursday, the thirty-first of August 1843. It is published twice a week, half a sheet in size, and contains four pages."

Even omnibusses ply daily between Algiers and Medea. To recur to native matters:—there is an amusing account of the Algerine mode of hot-bathing, as experienced by our author, coinciding pretty nearly with what we have read of in other Eastern parts, a portion of which we cite. Having been undressed, and afterwards covered with two napkins, the one tied round him like a petticoat, the other upon his shoulders he was led from a matted saloon, handsomely illuminated, into another chamber; which was agreeably warm, in order to prepare for the sudden excess of heat into which he was to pass. He next proceeded to the grand saloon of the bath, which was covered with a spacious dome, and paved with white marble, having several closets round it. Having been told to sit down upon a circular piece of marble, instantly he became sensible of a great increase of heat; afterwards, in the course of these multifarious preliminaries, he was conducted into a closet of a milder temperature, where, having had the napkins taken off, he was laid down upon a white cloth, and left to the operations of two naked robust negroes: —

"These men, newly brought from the interior of Africa, were ignorant of the Arabic spoken at Algiers, so I could not tell them in what way I wished to be treated, and they handled me as roughly as if I had been a Moor inured to hardship. Kneeling with one knee upon the ground each took me by the leg, and began rubbing the sole of my feet with a pumice-stone After this operation on my feet, they put their hands into a small bag, and rubed me all over with it as 'hard as they could'. The distortions of my countenance must have told them what I endured, but they rubbed on smiling at each other, and sometimes giving me an encouraging look indicating by their gestures the good it would do me. While they were thus currying me, they almost drowned me by throwing warm water upon me with large silver vessels, which were in the basin under the cock fastened in the wall. When this was over, they raised me up, putting my head under the cock, by which means the water flowed all over my body; and, as if this was not sufficient, my attendants continued plying their vessels Then having dried me with very fine white napkins, they each of them very respectfully kissed my hand. I considered this as a sign that all my torment was over, and was going out to dress myself, when one of the negroes, grimly smiling, stopped me, till the other returned with a kind of earth, which they began to rub over my body, without consulting my inclination. I was as much surprised to see it take off all the hair, as I was pained in the operation; for this earth is so quick in its effect, that it burns the skin if left upon the body. This being finished, I went through a second ablution; after which one of them seized me behind by the shoulders, and setting his two knees against the lower part of my back, made my bones crack so, that for a time, I thought they were entirely dislocated. Nor was this all; for after whirling me about like a top to the right and left, he delivered me to his comrade, who used me in the same manner: and then; to my no small satisfaction, opened the closet door. I imagined that I had been a long time under their hands, but these servants are so quick and dexterous in these operations, that on consulting my watch, I found it had lasted but half an hour."

(To be Continued.)

CONJUGAL AFFECTION.

From Brocca's Interesting Anecdotes.

DURING the time of the French revolution, when the city of Lyons became the theatre of daily executions a woman learned by chance that her husband's name was on the list of the proscribed, and instantly ran to avert the impending destruction, by securing his immediate flight. She compelled him to assume her dress, gave him her money and jewels, & had the inexpressible happiness to see him pass unsuspected. A few hours afterwards the officers of justice came to seize upon him. She had prepared herself to receive them, by putting on a suit of her husband's clothes and answering also to her husband's name. She was led before the Revolutionary Committee. In the course of the examination her disguise was discovered, and they demanded of her her husband.

"My husband," she answered, in a tone of exultation, "is out of the reach of your power. I planned his escape, and I glory in risking my own life for the preservation of his."

They displayed before her the instrument of punishment and charged her to reveal the route her husband had taken "Strike," she replied; "I am prepared." But it is the interest of your country that commands you to speak" said one of the Committee. "Barbarians!" she answered, "my country cannot command me to outrage the sacred law of nature"

Her dignity and firmness awed even the members of the Revolutionary Committee, and a noble action for once prevailed over their spirit of desolating cruelty.

HOW TO BE RICH. Nothing is more easy to grow rich. It is only to trust no one, to befriend none, to get every thing we can and save all we get; to stint ourselves and every body belonging to us; to be the friend of no man, and to have no man for our friend; to heap up interest upon cent, to remain miserable and despised, for some twenty or thirty years, and riches will come, as sure as disease and disappointment. And DEATH will come more sure than either, to take his gold, and throw it as an apple of discord into the hands of thankless heirs!

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) AUGUST 26 1847. NO. 19

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—if not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisments, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a quare, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. C. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	WM. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. WM. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

An address delivered before the second quarterly meeting of the Union Missionary Society at Bassa Cove, by Hon. S. A. Benson, on the 7th June 1847

(Concluded.)

Yes, it is the settled economy of heaven to evangelize our world through human instrumentality, however small at present the proportion of believers may bear to a rebellious world; neither will the unfaithfulness of any professing godliness, ultimately derange the purposes of God, for he can without hinderance, remove every unfaithful steward—every stumbling block, whether an individual, a county, a colony, or a nation of people; and of stones raise up faithful children unto himself. How beautifully does the poet describe it,—

> The Lord shall clear his way through all
> What'er obstructs,—obstructs in vain;
> The vale shall rise, the mountain fall,
> Crooked be straight, the rugged plain:"

But let us come to the point. The christian church in Liberia is surrounded by objects calculated to awaken the most serious, and sympathetic reflections, and feelings, that were ever exercised by Christians; such at least as influenced the prophet Jeremiah, when he said "Oh that my head were waters and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that he might more effectually weep and lament the condition of his people. On this continent, and in our vicinity, we have tribes of people who are as worldly, and intellectually wretched, as sin can well make them: and though the soul of every true observing christian among us exults in witnessing the gradual improvement that is going on in christianizing and civilizing them; yet when we look at the great bulk who are still bound in error's chain, whose understanding are locked up in darkness, while they are daily drinking down the very dregs of superstition and ignorance, being wrapped in the mantle of vice and folly; meanwhile that their ignorance is so profound that they know not their true condition, nor the way of escape, it has a tendency to eclipse our exultation, and to cause us to summon all our ransomed powers to accelerate a consumation of the design of the gospel, that is to cause light to spring up in and among those who are in the region and shadow of death—that the balm of Gilead may be speedily applied that every wound which sin has made may be effectually molified, and healed by the grace of God.

What tongue can adequately express the evils and wretchedness that are daily witnessed among the heathen; and in which they must remain, until they are again, and again, and again, visited, and instructed by the standard-bearers of King Emanuel; till the bearers of precious seed repeatedly scatter the seed of eternal life, strictly living themselves what they teach, and then most humbly, yet confidently, leave the event to Him whose ambassadors they are Hundreds, nay I say thousands on an average, are daily accused, through ignorance and maliguity, of witchcraft, in ways and forms as different, as they find ideas to invent; and scarcely a fourth of the accused escape, becoming victims to the most cruel death: for very few can throw up the poison they are made to drink; (the well known sassy-wood,) and if they show the least appearance of being overcome by it, very often is the poor innocent person executed; and how heart-rending the thought, when we remember that the aged, who have seen four score years, are often the objects of these superstitious exercies:—sometimes they are beaten to death with clubs;—or cut to pieces with knives: and on one occasion at Trade-Town, on the decease of the well known Prince West, when there were some 15 or 20 innocently accused and murdered for poisoning him, among whom there were a mother and son; the son was compelled by the superstitious concourse, to take a cutlass and sever her head from her shoulders; after which he was also executed These are merely some of the outlines: many, very many, are the moral and civil evils we might mention: so that to live in the country, and be subject to their superstitions, and laws, is confessed by the more intelligent part of them, as being in jeopardy, every hour, either to be murdered with impunity, or sold into that perfection of iniquity, slavery.

It is true some may be inclined to say, that little or no stress should be laid on slavery, among the heathen as an evil, and result of ignorance, from the fact; that it is as prevalent in the land of bibles, as it is among the heathen; nay it is in the church.

We confess it is in the church; but we further confess, that we firmly believe, that whoever wilfully holds their fellow beings in bondage, and leave this world before they repent, and put away the evil of their doings, will never see the Almighty in peace. And though they may urge while on earth, in appeasment of their consciences, that they only hold them with their consent, that they prefer slavery to freedom, yet the fact, that they do not suffer them to be taught with such books as will improve their minds, and so dignify their souls, as to enable them to discriminate between the blessings of liberty, and the degredations and curse of slavery, will be a refutation of their pitable excuse; they will be forced to see, and feel it in the day when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed; when speechless and self-condemned, they are banished from the presence and glory of that God, who has made the golden rule obligitary on all men: As we would have others do unto us, even so do unto them My audience will please pardon my digression; my only apology is, that the sound of slavery causes me to feel so indignant, and especially when the religion of my Saviour is to be disgraced by it, as that I can hardly restrain my feelings, and I sometimes fear, that I sin in my thoughts; however, when I remember that these thoughts and feelings are not malignant, but the result of an uncompromising abhorrence of the sin of slavery, in connection with all other unrighteousness, my conscience is clear.

However, these digressive remarks may serve to show, that whatever palliation the punishment of the heathen may receive from the righteous Judge of all the earth, it does not subvert the fact, that slavery is a sin and evil existing among them, in connection with thousands of others, which not only produces wretchedness and misery in time, but unfits them from entering into the inheritance of the saints in light. All of which I think when considered, justifies the sentiment advanced a few moments ago, that the christian church in Liberia is surrounded with objects, calculated to awken the most serious, and sympathetic reflections It is as clearly apparent to me, that we are in the Providence of the Almighty brought to, and established on this continent in order to constitute the medium, and instrumentality; through and by which, Africa is to be redeemed; and the dark cloud which for centuries has so obstructed her intellectual and moral sky is to be dispersed; and that light which she once imparted to the world is to be restored. In fact, if I did not firmly believe this, I should be inclined to sell off my few possessions in the Colony, and leave.

But I remember, that if we are faithful in the prosecution of kind heaven's designs in this respect, that no evil device formed against us shall prevail; our enemies, whether a nation, or set of individuals, may plan and devise to frustrate and subvert our political and religious institutions; but their counsel will be brought to nought by an all wise and overruling Providence: yes, this I as firmly believe, as I believe in my own existence.

I might go back and relate instances in the history of our colony, fully demonstrative of these assertions, but the better informed part of my audience are acquainted with them, and those who are not, may be convinced by a careful perusal of it. But as before intimated, much, if not all, depends on our faithfulness in the discharge of this our reasonable duty: the design of every one for engaging in this work should be the glory of God; and may I not in scripture language say, "cursed is every one" that is, and ultimately continues, to be influenced by other motives.

Again, it is the duty of every citizen of this Commonwealth, habitually to contribute according to his ability to the support of those who are engaged in this labor of love: but more especially is it the duty of christian churches.

It is true, there is no definite amount laid down in Holy Writ, as obligatory for christians to give, and why should there be? it was well known by the Author of life and salvation, that wherever salvable grace was possessed in the heart, there would be no backwardness in the individuals in coming up voluntarily to every christian duty, and if there happened any delinquency from ignorance of duty, that duty was only to be made known, and it was complied with. Now lest there should be any present who may plead ignorance of the duty of christians to support according to their ability, those who administer in holy things, whether as a regular stationed preacher, or a missionary of the cross, we will briefly quote two or three passages,

First Suffer me to observe; that under the preceding dispensation, it was ordered of God, that those who administer about holy things, should live of the things of the temple; and the apostle declares, that the law of this preceding dispensation was but a shawdow of good things to come. Therefore says the apostle to the Corinthians, who goeth a warfare at any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? For it is written in the law of Moses, thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn' does God take care of oxen? or saith he it for our sakes; for our sakes no doubt it is written. The same duty of supporting the ministry is enjoined, by the example of Christ while on earth.

For when he sent forth his disciples for a short excursion, in order that they might begin to be disciplined as evangenists, (as he would be shortly taken away from them, when they must wend their way among various kingdoms, nations, people, and tongues, to preach the everlasting gospel, he says as ye go, preach, saying the kingdom of heaven is at hand; provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses, nor scrip for your journey.

The Saviour could have wrought miracles for them from day to day; and supplied all their needs every moment; or he who raised money from the bottom of the sea, out of the mouth of a fish, could have filled their purses, with all their journey required But the superior wisdom of the Sovereign of the universe had determined, that those to whom they ministered, should entertain, and support them

I am aware that it is often objected, that the Apostle Paul is an exception to this rule; but the reason why the apostle made himself an exception to this general rule, the Lord had ordained, is made evident to us in the scriptures.

First Because there were some among the first churches who were ill-affected to his person, ministry and doctrine; and would gladly seize any opportunity, to charge him with sinister motives.

And for the same reasons; missionaries are either obliged to support themselves, or be supported by their friends at home, when they go bearing precious seed among the heathen; for it cannot be expected, that Idolators will contribute to the support of a religion, whose truth and value they have yet to learn. But after all, it was only at certain intervals and places that Paul laboured working with his hands, to minister to his wants; for we read most distinctly of the contributions made to his support by the disciples of Christ. Hear him in Thessalonians, "ye Phillippians sent once and again to my necessity, not that I desired a gift, but I desire fruit that may abound to your account. But I have all and abound I am full, having received of Epharoditus the things which were sent from you an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable and well pleasing to God."

It is no new theory that one or more churches have to assist in establishing others—hear the apostle to the Corinthians; "I robbed other curches taking wages of them to do you service; and when I was present with you and wanted, I was chargeable to no man, for that which I lacked the brethren from Macedonia supplied." And indeed have we not had demonstrations of the fact among ourselves, How greatly is the church in Liberia indebted to the warm-hearted people of God in the United States, for their assistance, in giving their money and lives, both for ours, and the spiritual benefit of the heathen and they are still giving. But does their liberality justify us in folding our arms and doing nothing? let him who can answer in the affirmative, respond—I pause for the responses.

Surely it is high time we had learned the truth and value of religion; and if so, and we are living in the enjoyment of it, we must doubtless feel that we have an inheritance in the kingdom represented by the ambassadors of our blessed Saviour, and that we should contribute to the support of any measures, having for their tendency, the enhancement of this kingdom, the salvation of men: and the glory of God. I am aware, that some urge the impropriety of instructing the heathen, because say they, it will make their responsibility to God greater; to whom much is given of him shall much be required &c. &c.

How meagre an excuse this, for criminal unfaithfulness: one might just as well urge the impropriety of teaching a man navigation, who is obliged to take a ship across the dangerous Atlantic, from the fact, that he would deserve more obloquy, and feel greater remorse, if the vessel should be cast away through his neglect. Brethren, sisters, and friends, the heathen have a claim upon us; a claim which will be exacted to the uttermost farthing in eternity.

I intend avoiding all exaggeration: if the plain truth does not commend itself to our understandings and conscience, I am not authorized to use any other coercing to [illegible] I therefore invite you to retrospect for a moment, and then let every one ask the question; what is my whole amount I have given to send the gospel among the heathen, since I have been here!

But says one, I am really so poor; I can spare nothing, I can barely support my family; but here let me remind you, that your poverty in some degree, may originate from the very fact, of your unfaithfulness in this your bounden duty,—you mistrust God; you fail to cast your mite into the treasury of the Lord, for the benefit of the poor heathen; notwithstanding the word of God declares, He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.

The poverty of many others (I do not wish to be understood as speaking of ordinary poverty, but that which is so extreme, as to prevent its victims from giving the least thing for the support of the ambassadors of Christ) may arise from idleness. How much of your time is employed usefully! I fear a very little in proportion to the hours, nay days, and weeks that are criminally spent in loitering about from place to place; or in the country there partly conforming to the habits of the natives, laying obstacles in the way of their conversion through the instrumentality of the missionary of the cross, and meanwhile they are church members, and complaining of poverty too.

I will venture to say, that there is not a grown person in Liberia, having tolerable health, but can give something for the support of missions, for if no more than the price of a peck of potatoes was given annually, and no more could be afforded, it would be acceptable on earth, and in heaven, would not loose its reward with him, who when upon earth declared that the widow who cast her mite into the treasury, had done more than those who had given their hundreds, yet not according to their ability.

But I do not concede the point, that poverty is the cause of such delinquency by christians in the discharge of this duty; for every one who knows the advantages of this country, and especially of the favorableness of the seasons, the production of the soil; the easy tenure on which land may be had, together with many other advantages, so that if a man works the land no more than half his time he may have enough and to spare throughout every season of the year. Who that considers these indisputable facts can plead unavoidable poverty.

So that the cause of the delinquency of the church in Liberia in the discharge of their duty in not contributing to send the gospel to our heathen brethren is ascribable to one or the other of these three things First, idleness, Second ignorance of duty in this respect—Thirdly, covetousness. Yes I fear that covetousness occupies the place of the love of God and of that love we should have to our fellow men.

Let a vessel with finery but anchor in our harbor to-morrow, and these poor, pitiable, poverty stricken, brethren and sisters will astonish you by their large purchases, and oftimes too, for things almost useless, —quite nonsensical; —how strongly such doings remind us of Ananias and Sapphira,—may the good

Lord save us from their end! Remember, their sin did not lay, seemingly in their not giving all, but in a falsehood; declaring they had done what they really had not.

And would it not be better for such persons amongst us to confess they have it, but that they dont feel inclined to give, than to say they have not, what they really have? I really would not like to have many of our benefactors in the U. States enjoy the privilege of once taking a survey of the attire of our congregations, at special meetings on the Sabbath.

And now in conclusion suffer me to say, let our delinquency have arisen from whatever cause it may,—the Lord help us to consider, and amend from this night; and that as an earnest of our amendment we will this evening give liberally, and cheerfully, as faithful stewards of the Lord.

Brethren, sisters, and friends, I can but have a very poor opinion of Liberia, until they begin to act both in church and state, just as if they had, and expected no foreign aid. While we receive with joy and gratitude the contributions of our foreign brethren, we should not depend on them.—Remember these heathen are our brethren; peculiarly so: we should feel a stronger connection with them if possible than those of another cast. You see how the paler cast hold together, consult each other's interest, and their sympathies are stronger for each other than for those of another cast. Did you read some years ago what interest was manifested, and large contributions made by the paler nations of the earth, when Greece was so wretchedly conditioned by reason of the Turkish invasions? Do you read in the news papers published only a few months ago in the U. States, what large contributions are made; by church, by the different states, and by the general Government for the relief of Ireland? amounting to about $100,000, if I mistake not. The U. S. Government voted more in one day for the relief of the Irish who are of the same cast of themselves, than she has ever given altogether to a poor injured people; (notwithstanding they be of another cast) whose sweat has watered, and blood enriched the soil, upon which their government and all its happy institutions are formed; I do not mention this to produce or discover a spirit of ingratitude, far from it, we are thankful for what our friends abroad have been and are still doing for us, and are willing to do any thing reasonable, as a mark of gratitude; but when we consider the amount of prejudice that exists towards us in consequence of our colour, a prejudice which the religion of a vast majority does not effectually reach, we cannot wonder that more is not done, but that any thing at all is done. We should learn also, to feel more effectually for our own cast, and I trust, if there be a spark of ambition remaining in any of your breasts, it will be enkindled to activity, in this respect for the future.

Don't let us once entertain the thought that we shall be losers by so doing, for the Word declares He that giveth to the poor (the poor heathen doubtless in connection with other poor) leadeth to the Lord.—He who caused the widow's cruise and meal to be inexhaustible, in the days of Elijah, will in abundantly more to come unto us, than we expend in this way; for the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. If he takes care of sparrows, will he not be mindful of his obedient children?

Oh dear friends! if we are faithful in this duty, we will leave a sure foundation for the rising generation to build upon, a good example for them to follow: this is our national safety; this our salvation; for as long as we strictly adhere to this, the salvation of God will be our bulwark; the everlasting arms will be underneath us; and no enemy rising up against us, shall prevail. So shall Ethiopia shortly stretch out her hands unto God, through our instrumentality; the wilderness and solitary places will bud and blossom as the rose; the trees of the woods will clap their hands for joy; and Africa even bleeding, and long neglected Africa; the land of our fathers, will be redeemed, and become as a garden spot to our God; to whom be ascribed glory, honor, might, and dominion, by all the inhabitants of heaven and earth now and ever more. Amen.

From the memorial of Martha an only and Beloved Sister.

DISCRETION.

"There are some members of a community," said the sagacious and witty Thomas Bradbury, "that are like a crumb in the throat: if they go the right way, they afford but little nourishment; but if they happen to go the wrong way, they give a great deal of trouble." There are others it may be added, who have the inclination and ability to do much good, who yet, by their rashness or ill-humour, produce such a ferrul proportion of mischief as to make it at least doubtful whether we are better with or without their exertions. Those are the truly estimable characters in every community of every scale who, in doing good, do no evil; who have energy, but whose energy is reined and regulated by discretion.

Martha, as the sister of an unmarried minister, became a centre to the female portion of a considerable congregation. This was a situation of usefulness, but it was also one of difficulty; and, at her age, and with her susceptibilities, it was not so surprising that she should be zealous to do good herself, and promote good works in others, as that her zeal should be attempered by prudence, and according to knowledge. Yet this excellence was hers in a high degree. She was the friend of the young, the comforter of the aged, a favorite with all. The fresh and kindly impression formed by her first introduction to new connexions were never effaced; they were improved and strengthened by increasing intercourse. It may be said of her, through the whole term of her communion with a circle made up of such different ages, habits, and tempers, that she never lost a friend or made an enemy. Now, though undoubtedly friends may be lost, and enemies formed, not only without a fault, but by the very excellences, of an individual; yet, in the absence of these evils, there may surely be found a presumptive argument in favour of discreet deportment. As no subject enters more completely into the happiness of every-day existence, it may be profitable to descend to particulars.

Martha was guided in forming her friendships by the perception of real piety. This arose not merely from a persuasion that the heart which is not true to God could not be true to her, but chiefly from her inability to participate in a mutual sympathy where piety was wanting. Pious herself, she could not have free and intimate communion with those who were otherwise minded. With all her young companions she was kind, courteous, and communicative, hoping to win them to better thoughts and feelings; but it was only with those who were under a powerful religious influence that she could feel entirely happy, because they only were prepared to understand the value the predominant desires, hopes, and fears of her spirit.

In other society, too, she was jealous of her safety. She had seen many hopeful young characters fatally blighted by vain, trifling, ill-chosen companions; and she had too lowly an opinion of herself to suppose that she might stand securely where others had fallen. She always considered that, with such persons, there was even more likelihood of her receiving an injury than bestowing a benefit; and this made her circumspect over herself in the very act of doing good to others, while she sought repose only on the bosom of those who, with herself, were seeking and exercising confidence beneath the shadow of the Almighty's wings.

Martha always entered into society with the serious desire of promoting her own and others' improvement. Friendship with her was not a selfish compact, by which she sought the gratification of selfish passions, without pausing to inquire whether it was right or delicate to do so; it was a talent put into her hand, which was to be justly appreciated and used, lest the trust should be violated. Her intercourse, therefore, never degenerated into idle gossiping or mysterious confidence. She never attempted to bind others to herself by tempting them to foolish confession, which would never have been imagined if they had not been suggested; and which, if they had passed through the mind, ought never to have been adopted by the lips.

Yet Martha's youthful friendships were any thing rather than dull. In her presence, the trifling titter, the vacant giggle, and the noisy rattle were not found; but the smile of benevolence, the look of innocence, and those elevated and beautiful expressions which beam on the countenance of youth, when raised by great and serious objects, richly supplied their place. She was cheerful without lightness, and serious without sadness. She was not always talking of religion in a few set threadbare phrases; but religion always influenced her conversation, whatever might be its object: and her deep [illegible] was rather perceived in the temper with which she treated of common and temporal things, than by any wordy declarations of its pre-eminent excellence.

She was slow to take offence. She never made a friend an offender for a hasty word, or a dubious expression of countenance or conduct. She was not ready to misconstrue motive, or to watch for the frailties of others. She was sensible of the variations of friendly feeling, but she did not allow herself to be governed by them. Trifles light as air were never allowed to come between her and her companions, to distress her by feverish jealousies, and her friends by endless explanations. She looked not to the single word, or look, or act, but to the uniform character; she dwelt not on the momentary feeling, which the individual might regret as deeply as herself; she considered the acknowledged and ruling principle of conduct. She always put the best construction on doubtful actions; and became the apologist of an accused party, where it was not evident that the conduct had been intentionally and morally wrong. So far as she was personally concerned, it may truly be said that she never took offence except where offence was intended; and then, while she retired from one who was unfit for friendship, it was done with reluctance and pity, not with resentment.

If cause for offence arose, as more or less it will, Martha always sought a prompt and candid explanation. If, on the one hand, she did not permit her friendship to be affected by those infirmities which are discovered by the best and wisest; on the other hand, she would not allow her affections to canker and decline under wounds which, though not acknowledged, were deeply felt. If she could conquer an unfavorable impression, she did; if she could not, she revealed her thoughts to her friend. In this delicate act she was entirely governed by the Scriptural directions—she spoke to the person concerned—alone—and in confidence. Her opinion of the impropriety of another never reached the individual secondhanded; she never debilitated the best motives to candid acknowledgment by exposing the wrong before the witnesses, and the party knew that what was said would not be afterwards ungenerously repeated to uninterested auditors.

In these exercises of the heart the spirit was in harmony with the act itself. It was most kind, and meek and modest. She was the most gentle of reprovers. If ever any had occasion feelingly to adopt the words of the Psalmist on the subject, it must have been those who received admonition from her lips:—"Let the righteous smite me, and it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me, and it shall be an excellent oil which shall not break my head."

[To be Continued.]

The whole world it is estimated, consumes yearly 840,000 tons of sugar; of which the United kingdom takes 250,000—the rest of Europe 450,000; the U. S. of America 150,000. Cuba formerly yielded 200 000 tons. The U. States does not exceed 100,000

THE DYING DRUNKARD.

It is a truth, which we have often repeated in the numbers of the Harbinger, that "all vices have a natural connection." War and Intemperance have a mutual reaction on each other—they are, at once, cause and effect. Put an end to intemperance; and you cut off one of the main roots of war. Abolish war; and you dry up the chief source of intemperance. Hence we have frequently united these two subjects. War is often the beginning and the end of the drunkard. Thousands learn the first steps to intemperance at the muster-field, the rendezvous, and the camp; and having become unfit for civil life, they furnish the apologists of war with an argument in its favour, when they say, that "war is a benefit, as it kills off the refuse of society."

The following "deathbed confession of a drunkard," was made to a minister who visited him in his last sickness; and was published, from the minister's journal, in the Temperance Herald.

"December 27, 1828.—Visited a poor man in the Alms-house, aged 44 years, rapidly declining with consumption. He said; —'My mind is burdened; I wish to speak a few words to you.' I leaned over his bed, and listened while he proceeded in a low voice, frequently choked for utterance, and his eyes all the while suffused with tears. 'I entered the army' said he 'in the year 1808. There I took to strong drink; and the habit is what, as you now see, has ruined me. I was well brought up—had good instructions; but, I disregarded them all and now I am dying—without any hope! When I left the army, instead of reforming, I grew worse. With six companions, I used to go every morning before breakfast to a store; for rum,—and that store was kept by a professor of religion! Oh! shocking way of getting rich! Those companions are now all dead; and soon I shall be, too. I have had many narrow escapes. In my drunken fits, I have fallen down steep places among rocks—and into ditches, and have been drawn out of the road when I was liable to be run over; I have slept in barns, and by the side of fences, and now, in consequence of drinking I am about to die. Oh! give warning to young men for me. Tell them of———, and try to save them from such a dreadful end. I have had a great many checks of conscience, and convictions of my sin. I have resolved to break off, and have sometime done so for a month or two at a time: yet, for rum I broke my resolution,—stifled my convictions—gave up my attempt at reformation; and now for rum I die in despair.' Here the poor man was so overcome that I begged him to desist from speaking, as he evidently could not sustain the effort. 'Well,' said he, 'I've told you my dreadful story; I hope you will pray for me, and warn others against strong drink.'"

This is but one of the many thousands—nay, millions, of instances, in which war has destroyed the soul and body of its victim, without powder and ball. From the beginning to the end—from the rendezvous to the battle-ground—from the militia training to the deathbed of the drunkard; war is one constant school of intemperance. And yet how many professors of religion are there, who deal in rum and war! "Oh! shocking way of getting rich!" How many are there now, who seem to be fully apprised of the evils of intemparance; and who nevertheless, are advocates for war. But the War department knows better, for "the children of the world are wiser, in their generation, than the children of light." The Secretary knows, that without intemperance, armies, in these enlightened days, could neither be raised nor kept together. An army is generally a congregation of drunkards, as may be seen from the following newspaper paragraph:

"A chance for Distillers.—The United States government advertise for eighty seven thousand six hundred gallons of whiskey, wherewithal to bathe the throats of our soldiers—what will temperance societies say to this? Ten times the quantity would be sufficient to float our whole Navy."

The allowance in the navy is, we believe, half a pint of whiskey a day, and this we were lately informed, by an officer in the navy, even the boys were compelled to drink, or throw away.—What a school for intemperance! A pious officer in the army told us, a few days ago, that application had been made to the department, to stop the issuing of rations of ardent spirits, but without effect.

BENEFICIAL EFFECTS OF PICTURES.

A little boy, the subject of the following anecdote, being six years of age, and forward in his learning, I considered him fit to be sent to another school, and sent word to the parents accordingly. The father came immediately, and said, he hoped I would keep him until he was seven years of age; adding, that he had many reasons for making the request. I told him, that the design of the Institution was to take such children as no other school would admit, and as his child had arrived at the age of six, he would be received into the National School; moreover, as we had a number of applications for the admission of children much younger, I could not grant his request. He then said, "I understand that you make use of pictures in the school, and I have good reason to approve of them; for," said he, "you must know that I have a large bible in the house, Matthew Henry's, which was left me by my deceased mother; like many more, I never looked into it, but kept it merely for show. The child, of course, was forbidden to open it, for fear of its being spoiled; but still he was continually asking me to read in it, and I as continually denied him: indeed, I had imbibed many unfavourable impressions concerning this book, and had no inclination to read it, and was not very anxious that the child should. However, the child was not to be put off, although several times I gave him a box on the ear for worrying me; for notwithstanding this usage, the child would frequently ask me to read it, when he thought I was in a good humour; and at last I complied with his wishes. 'Please, father,' said the child, 'will you read about Solomon's wise judgment,' 'I don't know where to find it,' was the reply. 'Then,' says the child, 'I will tell you; it is in the third chapter of the first book of Kings.' I looked as the child directed, and finding it I read it to him. Having done so, I was about to shut up the book; which the child perceiving, said, 'Now, please father, will you read about Lazarus raised from the dead;' which was done; and in short, said the father, he kept me at it for at least two hours that night, and completely tired me out, for there was no getting rid of him. The next night he renewed the application, with, 'Please, father, will you read about Joseph and his brethren!' and so could always tell me where these stories were to be found. Indeed, he was not contented with my reading it, but would get me into many difficulties, by asking me to explain that which I knew nothing about; and if I said I could not tell him, he would tell me that I ought to go to church, for his master had told him, that that was the place to learn more about it, adding, 'and I will go with you, father.' In short, he told me every picture you had in your school, and kept me so well at it, that I at last got into the habit of reading for myself, with some degree of delight; this, therefore, is one reason why I wish the child to remain in the school." A short time afterwards, the mother called on me, and told me that no one could be happier than she was, for there was so much alteration in her husband for the better, that she could scarcely believe him to be the same man: instead of being in the skittle-ground, in the evening, spending his money, and getting tipsy, he was reading at home to her and his children, and the money that used to go for gambling, was now going to buy books, with which, in conjunction with the Bible, they were greatly delighted, and afforded both him and them a great deal of pleasure and profit; her object in calling, she said, was once more to return thanks to Mr. Wilson, and myself, for the great benefit that had accrued to the family through the child being in the Infant School.

Here we see a whole family were made comfortable, and called to a sense of religion and duty, by the instrumentality of a child of six years of age. I subsequently made inquires, and found that the whole family attended a place of worship, and that their character would bear the strictest investigation.

Power.—I do not look upon power as a thing to be envied by any wise or good man. Power in itself—mere power—is any thing rather than (I fear) a friend to virtue, or a test to merit. It is enjoyed by right of birth; it is inherited by bloated despots; it is purchased through blood and slaughter by ferocious warriors and pestilential conquerors: it is held up by the tenure of the very defects that reduce men lower then their kind; by the miserable inmates of an eastern seraglio; but power to be of use to mankind—the power of doing good to our country—the opportunity of scattering blessings over the land of our birth or of our adoption—the power to enable you to root out ignorance, to diffuse the lights of knowledge, to break the chains of enslaved men, of whatever color, or whatever sect they may be—power to benefit our land, and to illustrate our country and to ennoble our age, and to amend our race—this is a power which man, which an angel might stoop from his height to take up.—Mr. Brougham.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA LIBERIA, AUGUST 26th, 1847.

The Twenty Fourth.

The dawn of this day was announced to the inhabitants by the thundering of a cannon from Central Fort. At sunrise the staff intended to bear the testimony of female patriotism and ardor in the cause of Liberia's independence rose and towered proudly in the air, ready to receive the stripes and the star, which, in the language of one of Liberia's sons, "after ages of wandering, has at length found its orbit." A little afterward, the unusual activity and bustle in the streets—the rattling of drums, and the Huzzahs of boys testified how heartily all classes and descriptions of people entered into the business for which the day had been set apart. All business was suspended and all appeared animated by a common sentiment

At 9 o'clock A. M., the Governor with the Commissioned and Non-commissioned officers of the first regiment assembled at the Court House, and at the same hour Captain Mc Gill's company of Light Infantry, and Captain Barbour's of State Fencibles, formed in Broad Street. By this time the people were pouring from all quarters in the direction of Government square, and the Government House and piazzas were already crowded to overflowing with ladies. At 11 the companies escorting the Govetor and other officiers marched up, and formed a line in front of Governmen House, and soon afterward a message was sent to the ladies that His Excellency was ready to receive them. The committee appointed by the ladies to represent them on the occasion, consisting of Mrs. S. E. Lewis Mrs. M. L. Hunter, Mrs R. Johnson, Mrs. C. Hazel, Mrs. E. M. Teage, Mrs. C. Ellis, and Mrs. W. N. Yates descended, bearing the flag, and advanced towards the Governor, who met them a few paces in front of the troops. As soon as the ladies appeared issuing from the door, the line presented arms Mrs. Lewis presented the flag, accompanied by a neat patriotic speech. At the conclusion of the speech, three cheers went up from the troops, and the assembled multitude, which made the welkin ring, while the waving of hats in the streets, and Handkerciefs from the piazzas and windows, testified how heartily every one was pleased. The Governor received the flag with his accustomed gallantry, unfurled it, and handed it to the standard bearer, who, on the present occasion, was Captain F Payne of the Monrovia Militia. He then replied in the best speech, we ever heard him make. He briefly adverted to the past history of the colony—noticed the rapidity with which it had advanced and its present position; acknowledged the pride he felt as representative of the Republic of Liberia, in receiving the flag at the hands of the ladies of Monrovia; assured them on his behalf, and on behalf of his fellow soldiers it will never be disgraced by cowardice or treachery; and that it shall be preserved among the archives of the Republic, as a testimony of their patriotism to rising generations. Three lusty cheers announced the conclusion of the ceremony—the ladies retired, and the flag with the guards took the centre of the line.

The flag is made of silk. On one side in the blue field, it bears the Motto of the Republic in large letters, thus!—over the star "The love of liberty"—under it "Brought us here." On the other side, is "Republic of Liberia." The staff is of rose wood, with a gilt head in form of a spear.

At half past 11, the troops marched up to Central Fort and formed on the right of the flag staff. The staff is about 30 feet high, and erected on the most elevated spot in the centre of the town. The flag was then detached from the spear, and bent on to the halliards. At 12 the first gun of the national salute sent forth its thunder, when the flag rapidly ascended to its place, and floated on the breeze. At the same moment a responsive gun was heard from signal hill, and the flag displayed there. A salute of Twenty One guns was then fired—every alternate gun being from signal hill.

As soon as the salute was over this flag was lowered and one of Bunting, raised in its place. The flag was then attached to the spear—took its place in the line, and the whole marched off and halted in front of the Government House. After a halt of a few minutes, the troops marched off escorting the Governor—other officers, and a number of citizens to the Methodist Church. When they arrived they found the Church already filled to overflowing. The flag of the Republic was stattoned on the right of the altar, near Mr. E. Johnson, the Marshall of the day: the left was occupied by a flag and Banner of Mr. James' school. These also bore appropriate mottoes. The exercises in Church were conducted in the following order. First, singing. Second, Prayer of supplication, by Rev. Mr. Ellis, of the Presbyterian Church. Third, singing. Fourth, Reading of the declaration of Independence by Hon. J. B. Gripon.—Fifth, singing. Sixth, oration by Rev. J. S. Payne, of the M. E. Church. Seventh, singing. Eighth, Prayer of thanksgiving by H. Teage of the Baptist Church.—Ninth, Doxology. Tenth, Benediction by Rev. A. D. Williams.

In regard to the oration, as it will be published, we will now merely say, it is a production highly creditable to Liberia, and honorable to the young man who brought it out; and we will all do well to listen to its advice, and act upon its suggestions.

The services in Church over, the line was again formed and marched to government house, when the companies were dismissed.

At 2 P M., a number of gentlemen sat down to dinner at Colonel Hicks'. Considering the great dearth of all foreign edibles, the dinner was a good one; and if any thing were wanting in the way of table supply, it was more than made good by the determination on all hands to be pleased. About 4, the party retired to gossip and prepare for an envening's entertainment, which the indefatigable Mr. Cary, was getting up in the Governor's new building. At half past seven, about ninety persons—gentlemen and ladies sat down to supper. Many patriotic toasts were given, and many gallant sentiments were offered, but, be it remembered, they were drank in the very best and purest water, which Monrovia affords. The amusements of the evening were increased by a band of music; and after the tables were removed, the guests entertained themselves in conversation until one in the morning, when they retired well pleased no doubt, each with himself, and every other. We should not omit to mention that there were other entertainments on that day, but we can mention the particulars, only of those at which we had the good fortune to be present.

In concluding, we feel bold to assert that nothing could exceed the good order, decorum and regularity of the proceedings of the day. Every thing was conducted in the most admirable order. It was a day which will be long remembered. During the ceremony of presenting the flag, many eyes were suffused with tears. And indeed who that rembered the past could forbear to weep? Who that looked back to America and remembered what he saw and felt there, could be otherwise than agitated! It is indeed a great undertaking; but that Almighty Being who hath conducted us thus far, can and will conduct us to the goal at which we aim.

Beef.

Recently the supply of fresh beef has been abundant. It is to be found every day in the market; and occasionally the supply exceeds the demand; besides supplying ships of war and merchant vessels.

One Good Turn Deserves Another.

In the life time of old "Boson," the Kondahs were the scourge of the whole country, and Bo-Porah was but another name for Depot, for victims from the various tribes. They were Ishmaelites in the fact, that their hand was against, and to successfully, all other men. Then there were harmonoy in council, and unity and promptitude in action. Boson resolved—ordered, and his men marched Now they are divided--many petty chieftians have set up kings, and warriors have gone to merchandize. The Gorahs have taken advantage of this state of things, and are feeding their former oppressors with the same spoon, out of which they were once forced to swallow so many bitter draughts. Yes the Gorahs are beating the Kondahs, and are preparing to push their way to Bo-Porah.

Expects to be King.

We had occasion a few days ago to send a rather sharp message to a native somewhere up the river, in relation to that, the love of that, which is the root of all evil. He returned as answer: Wait little bit, King Brumly done die now, and da want for make me king.—I beg you wait tell dis palaver set.

Quite Liberal.

When the natives made the last and most formidable attack on this settlement, on the morning of December 1st, 1822, the soldiery received permission from their Kings, to plunder all private houses for their own benefit, and to put to death every 'Merica man and boy you ketch: but they were forbidden under the heaviest penalties to interfere with the public stores and dem oomen. These were for the especial benefit of the kings and chiefs;—who remained during the encounter, at a respectable distance—at least beyond the reach of shot—for the purpose perhaps, of allowing the soldiers to appropriate the whole honor of victory.—Victory however, declared for the Americans, whom the natives declared were devils, and the kings who had the place of less honor during the fight, were found to have the position of greater safety in retreat.

The Deys' had invited the Bass to share in the Battle and the Booty. The latter having no very strong inclination to fight, measured the advancing pace, so as to be in just at the death. They met the retreating Deys just at False-Cape, and enquired whar da money? The renagados were not much disposed for talk, but hurried past with, Dem 'Merica man all be debil.

Independence.

It would seem that Foreigners are determined we shall be independent, at least so far as supplies are concerned. We have now been nearly four months without any considerable supply from either Europe or America. We are not exactly in the condition of an American Editor, who said he had not seen a half dollar for so long a time, it made his head ache dreadfully trying to think how it looked. We should like a little good flour, ham, &c., &c., because we have not forgotten the taste; but we can't get them. Still we weigh as much, and talk as much, yea, and eat as much as we did when vessels came in here constantly; and perhaps of more wholesome food. To be honest, we are not anxious that vessels should bring provisions—for the simple reason that we should be doomed to see others more favoured than we, lay in ample stores, while we could purchase only the supply of a day. But we have Rice, Casrado and Potatoes, and while these last, we will never get under the table, and when the present supply fails, we will plant another. 'Tis no use; we are determined to live out our days;—and that cheerfully.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

INFANT CRITICS: THE BOY AND TRIANGLE—THE DEAD FLY.

One day some visitors requested I would call out a class of the children to be examined. Having done so, I asked the visitors in what they, would wish the children to be examined; at the same time stating that they might hear the children examined in Natural History, Scriptural History, Arithmetic, Spelling, Geography, or Geometry. They choose the latter, and I proceeded to examine the children accordingly; beginning with straight lines. Having continued this examination for about half an hour, we proceeded to enter into particulars respecting triangles; and having discoursed on the difference between isoceles triangles and scalene triangles I observed that an accute isoceles triangle had all its angles acute, and proceeded to observe that a right-angled scalene triangle had all its angles acute. The children immediately began to laugh, for which I was at a loss to account, and told them of the impropriety of laughing at me. One of the children immediately replied, "please, sir, do you know what we were laughing at?" I replied in the negative. "Then, sir," says the boy, "I will tell you. Please, sir, you have made a blunder." I, thinking I had not, proceeded to defend myself, when the children replied, "Please, sir, you convict yourself." I replied, "How so!" "Why," says the children, "you said a right-angled triangle had one right angle and that all its angles are acute. If it has one right angle, how can all its angles be acute. If it has one right angle, how can all its angles be acute!" I soon perceived the children were right, and that I was wrong. Here, then, the reader may perceive the fruits of teaching the children to think, inasmuch as it is shewn that the children of six years of age and under were able to refute their tutor. If children had been taught to think many years ago, error would have been much easier detected, and its baneful influence would not have had that effect upon society which at this day unfortunately we are obliged to witness.

At another time I was lecturing the children in the gallery on the subject of cruelty to animals; when one of the little children observed; "Please, sir, my big brother catches the poor flies and then sticks a pin through them, and makes them draw the pin along the table," This affords me an excellent opportunity of appealing to their feelings on the enormity of this offence, and among other things I observed that if the poor fly had been gifted with powers of speech like their own, it probably would have exclaimed, while dead, as follows:—"You naughty child, how can you think of torturing me so? Is there not room enough in the world for you and me? Did I ever do you any harm? Does it do you any good to put me in such pain? Why do you do it, you are big enough to know better! How would you like a man to run a piece of wire through your body, and make you draw things about! Would you not cry at the pain? Go, then, you wicked boy, and learn to leave off such cruel actions." Having finished, one of the children replied, "How can any thing speak if it is dead!" "Why," said I, "supposing it could speak. "You mean to say, sir, dying, instead of dead."

It will of course be understood that in this case I purposely misused a word, and the children, being taught to think easily detected it.

Wolf Fight.—About a fortnight ago a young man named William Jackson, in one of the settlements, was returning from the woods, where he had spent part of the day shooting pigeons. When within about a mile of home he heard a crackling in the underwood behind him, and turning to learn the cause of the noise he beheld three enormous wolves coming directly toward him. He saw no chance of escape, and determined to fight it out as his only hope of safety. He threw down his game, placed his back against a large tree, and silently awaited the attack of the ferocious animals. The wolves approached and walk around him two or three times at a short distance, but seeing no chance of attack behind, they advenced in front.

When they were within a few feet, he levelled his gun, and fired the two barrels in succession, and two of the wolves fell mortally wounded; the third sprang at him, and was saluted on the head with a stunning blow from the butt end of the piece, but the animal recovering seized the young man by he leg and both fell to the ground together in a deadly struggle, in which the wolf tore his antagonist severely in different parts of the body. Feeling himself growing weak from loss of blood, the youth with some difficulty drew a knife from his pocket, made one desperate plunge at the savage animal, and immediately fell exhausted and senseless at the foot of the tree, awfully mangled in the conflict and covered with blood.

When consciousness returned, the sight of his three enemies lying dead beside him, awakened his wandering senses to the reality, and his almost miraculous escape from death. His knife he found sticking firmly to the handle in the heart of his latest foe. With great difficulty he reached home and alarmed his friends, who repaired to the spot with lights, and brought home the skins of the dead wolves as trophies of what we may justly call an extraordinary exploit. The hero of the fight, as we may call him has nearly recovered from his wounds, although he will bear to his grave the broad scars of his triumphant and deadly struggle with the three wolves.—Bytown (Canada) Gazette.

Office of the Liberia Herald.

Monrovia Sept. 30th, 1846.

The undersigned takes this method of calling the attention of the subscribers to their accounts with the "Herald."—It is hoped that they will not wait to be personally called on, for their several amounts.

Agents in Africa and in the United States will please bear in mind that we are patiently waiting for remittances from them.

JOHN N. LEWIS

Gen: Agent and Treasurer

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile business under the firm of Samuel F. Mc Gill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MC GILL,
R. S. MC GILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon.	Lb.	8	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	33 1-3
Beef, cargo No. 1.	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Bafts,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	25	30
Boards,	1000/t	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	12 1-2	18 2.
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12 1-2	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 12
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	1 00
Nails	Keg	3 00	00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1-3	34
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	9 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter.	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2
Romauls	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none	16@25
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps	3 00
Tobacco	1000lbs.	9 00	3 75
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00	10 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	5 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	10 00
			20 00

Excuses for not Volunteering —The Transcript, published at Worcester, Mass., says that the rheumatiz, mumps, and other conscientious scruples, are all the rage with those who are not so particularly anxious about leaving their carcases in Mexico.

POETRY.

Hymn sung at the celebration on the twenty fourth.

Tune Bermondsy

Paraphrased by B. F. Yates.

Liberia 'tis of thee
Sweet land of liberty
Of thee I sing;
Land where my fathers died,
Land for our children's pride
From all that on our side
Let freedom ring.

Adopted country thee,
Land of the feeble free,
Thy name I love;
I love thy rocks and rills,
Thy wild and scattered hills,
My heart with rapture fills,
Where'er I rove.

Let music swell the breeze
Ring from the wild wood trees
Sweet freedom's song,
Let every tongue awake,
Let all that breathe partake,
Let hills their silence break;
The song prolong.

Our nations, God to thee
Giver of liberty--
To Thee we sing.
O let our land be bright
With liberty and light,
Protect us by thy might
Great God our King.

Oh may our rulers be
Men that will worship Thee
With hearts sincere;
Our land and cause defend
Our Father and our friend:
Let us believe Thee bend
Lord hear our prayer.

Tune Coronation.

Lines by Mrs. C. Ellis.

Lord of the nations raw to Thee
Liberia we commend;
Be Thou her keeper, ever be
Her guardian and her Friend.

We bless Thee that our eyes have seen
The day star on us rise:
Our fathers' prayers and toils have been
As incense in the skies.

O guard us Lord from every foe:
With peace and plenty bless:
That all our race indeed may know
This is a land of rest.

Unite us in a band of love—
Of wisdom, truth and Thee;
And let Liberia ever prove Worthy of Liberty.

Tune Olivet.

Lines by H. Teage.

Wake every tuneful string,
To God loud praises bring;
Wake heart and tongue!
In strains of melody,
And choral harmony,
Sing for the oppress'd are free!
Wake cheerful song.

See Mesurado's height!
Illumed with new-born light
To the lone shore:
Now it ascends the skies,
Lo the deep darkness flies!
While new born glories rise
And shine afar.

Shine life creating ray!
Proclaim approaching day;
Throw wide thy blaze;
Let savage Hottentot—
Bosjesman from his cot—
And nations long forgot
Astonish'd gaze.

Shout the loud Jubilee'
Afric once more is free
Break forth with joy;
Let Ninus' fettered tongue,
Let Niger's join the song,
And Congo's loud and long
Glad strains employ.

Star in the east shine forth!
Proclaim a nation's birth:
Ye nations hear!
This is our natal day;
And we our homage pay,
To Thee O Lord we pray—
Lord hear our prayer.

All hail Liberia! hail!
Favour'd of God all hail!
Hail happy Land!
From virtue ne'er remove:
By peace, and truth, and love—
And wisdom from above
So shalt thou stand.

Tune Sabbath.

Lines by James S. Payne.

'Tis but right that we should bring
Our best praises to our King,
To the God of equal love,
Who hath call'd us from above
None besides Him have we here.
With Him none to us so dear
He hath seen our helpless state
In his time vouchsafed us aid.

By his guidance we have come
To the land of freedom's sons,
Land where our ancestors lie,
Land bequeathed us from on high.
Here with ease and joy we meet
Worship at our Saviour's feet:
Give we him the tribute due
And devote our hearts anew.

Love of liberty brought us here—
Nothing to our hearts so dear:
Here thank God we find the Gem,
None for it with us contend.
Hence O Lord we Thee adore.
It becomes us to do so:
May we ne'er unfaithful be
Never turn our hearts from Thee.

O thou God of nations all,
Here when'er we on thee call:
May this young Republic we
Mindful of her trust in Thee.
Bless, preserve and her defend;
Knowledge skill and virtue send;
Let from her the gospel light
Pierce the gloom of Afric's night

Doxology.

Glory be to the Father, Glory be to the Son,
Glory be to the Holy Ghost.
As it was in the beginning, is now,
And ever shall be; world without end. Amen

MISCELLANEOUS

THE SOCIETY OF FOUR.

BY GRACE GREENWOOD.

Somewhere in——state, and in a school that shall be nameless, where my young ideas taught to shoot. I will say, in justice to my teachers, all of whom are exemplary and respectable ladies, that if in this present time, and in the dim future, said ideas do not take right aim, or in any way fail to hit the mark, the faulties of my own door.

Our seminary was in "a perfect love" of a situation—in the midst of beautiful and extensive grounds, near a silvery stream, and overlooked by towering hills. I am sure no one can fail to recognize it by this graphic description.

We were very happy there, we girls; for Providence blessed us with teachers almost wholly exempt from the too common faults of persons in their exalted station. I, of course, mean severity—principles sternly upright, and those mistaken and unreasonable ideas, that the freeborn spirit of young ladies in their teens, must be curbed by the sober hum-drum rules of propriety. We had pretty much our own way, until our parents or guardians found it out, and then, alien to the classic shades of——seminary! By the way, it is my private opinion, that the system of subduing the wills, and making mental machines of the intellects of faire maydens, in our pattern seminaries, is the great, lamentable cause of their being such spiritless, submissive wives, in after years. I am convinced that there is an alarming conspiracy formed by fathers and guardians, to patronize only such institutions. Kate Richmond, the liveliest and most charming of brunnettes, secretary; Mag Melton, a rich southron's daughter, treasurer; and Grace Greenwood, whose beauties and excellencies, are they not written in the heart-book of those who knew her? private member; for being of a modest turn myself, I felt a blushing unwillingness to be honored with any office.

We had a constitution, which stated that the objects of the society should be fun first, fun last, fun always. We bound ourselves to keep nothing in the least degree laughable from one another; and that in order to have every joke or amusing occurrence, new, we would be close to all the world, but open as day to the society. A heavy fine was the penalty for a stale piece of pleasantry. The funds of the Society were to be appropriated to buying presents to bribe monitresses, to connive at egresses and ingresses and to purchase nice things of the cook, (a most obliging woman,) for refreshment, after our arduous labours. The times of meeting were to be as often as we had opportunity; and last, we pledged ourselves over a glass of lemonade never to betray one another, but to assist in any piece of practical witchcraft, where assistance was required; and to avenge singly or collectively, any affront offered to either of us.

Immense capabilities for all sorts of fun and nonsense, we found this secret society to possess. As just the right spirits were first engaged in it, those who were impressed with its value, and devoted to its interests, it succeeded admirably for one entire term; but a vote having been passed to admit some three or four others to its honours and privileges, it happened mysteriously that soon after they were let in, the important sayings and doings of the society were let out; and it fell, and "what a fall was there, my country" women!

Our principal was a widow, with one fair son, a promising youth of nineteen or twenty. Well, in the palmiest days of the society, young Hal came to spend a college vacation with his "ma." He showed himself to be, from the first, that sad creature, that pitiable piece of unfinished manhood—a dandy! But the partial mother evidently doated on the lad. She made a grand party for him and introduced him to all her pupils who were beauties or heiresses. When he had honoured our seminary with his ethereal presence three weeks, one of our number being monitress, the society met in my room.

While Secretary Richmond was reading her report, I, who had just commenced Euclid was puzzling over my lesson for the morning, the never to be-forgotten "fifth proposition." The report ceased, and still I kept at my book, stumbling along over the 'dunce bridge," when I was roused by hearing the silver voice of Mag Melton, addressing the presidentess thus—"I beg leave to state, in the way of fun and business, that I have received a bona fide offer of marriage.' Love before mathematics, for ever! Away to one of the right angles of the room sped Euclid cutting the air in a horizontal line, and springing up with a you-don't-say-so! sort of expression of face, I drew my chair into the semicircle by the window.

Mag then made known that Master Hal had proposed, in form professing the warmest admiration of her, but, oddly enough, not mentioning her fortune. As the young gentleman was what Kate Richmond called "a little softy," we guessed his declaration was something quite laughable" but were sadly disappointed when Mag averred that he really woed in such elegant and poetical language, that he had not been guilty of burlesquing the tender delicacy of our sex, by dandyism she could never have pierced his heart with the cruel "no!" which flew from her lips like a bullet from a rose-bud!"

In less than a week, the learned society again met, and we were electrified to receive a similar announcement from our presidentess! Ay, from the Honorable Sal Stevens herself! The indomitable Hal had made her a declaration which, as well as she was able to judge, was the same verbatim et tucratim, which he had before made to our little treasurer. Alas! bullet the second had whizzed through his devoted heart!

A few evenings from this, I was sitting rather late, in my little dove house of a room penning an examination composition, on "the sublime and beautiful," ever and anon threading my fingers through my curls, and gently irritating the organ of ideality, when my door opened, softly, and the officers of the society entered, in pursuance of a call for a special meeting.

"Monsieur Tonson come again!" Kate Richmond reported that the declaration of love which the presidentess stated she had received, sounded to her, Kate Richmond, rather familiar, she, on reaching her room, drew Bulwer's last novel from under her pillow, and found said declaration in a certain love speech of the gallant hero. Kate has presentments sometimes, and put the book, which was in pamphlet form, in her pocket. On the fourth day, while walking in the seminary grounds, she was joined by the great rejected, who then and there made her an offer of his hand, and what heart he had left. He went on with his set speech, smoothly and glibly for a while, but getting lightly embarrassed towards the end, by the fixed gaze of the lady's round black eyes, Kate leisurely drew forth the novel, and opening at the declaration scene with a half arch, half innocent smile playing around her lips, said demurely, "suffer me to prompt you sir!"

He bowed and vanished! No, I am not sure he stayed to bow, but I am sure he vanished—for the first things we saw on our way down to breakfast the next morning were his travelling trunks in the hall, and the stage rumbled away from the door soon after.

Ah Hylas! sweet youth! He had been borne down the tide of love, by two mischievous nymphs, and then left to float round. The last was evidently "the unkindest shot of all;" his poor little heart was quite riddled. The thanks of the society were voted to Kate Richmond for furnishing the best joke on its annals. I of course did not refuse my vote, though, to tell the truth, slightly provoked at Kate, for exposing the fellow so soon, and thus preventing me from sharing in the triumph of my roguish friends a triumph seldom exactly displeasing to the heart feminine-and thereby capping the climax to the discomfiture of a vain and assuming coxcomb.

YOUTH.

IT has been often said, that the season of youth is the season of pleasure; but this can only be true in savage countries, where but little preparation is made for the perfection of human nature, and where the mind has but a very small part in the enjoyment. It is otherwise in those places where nature is carried to the highest pitch of refinement, in which this season of the greatest sensual delight is wisely made subservient to the succeeding, and more rational one of manhood. Youth, with us, is but a scene of preparation; a drama, upon the right conduct of which all future happiness is to depend. The youth who follows his appetites, too soon seizes the cup, before it has received its best ingredients; and, by anticipating his pleasures, robs the remaining parts of life of their share; so that his eagerness only produces a manhood of imbecility, and an age of pain.

ACCIDENTAL MEETINGS

ACCIDENTAL meetings, though they happen every day seldom excite our surprise but upon some extraordinary occasion. To what a fortuitous concurrence do we not owe every pleasure and convenience of our lives! How many seeming accidents must unite, before we can be clothed or fed! The peasant must be disposed to labour, the shower must fall, the wind fill the merchant's sail, or numbers must want the usual supply, SLAVERY.—At the recent Loco-Foco Convention in the First Congressional District of New Hampshire, Mr. Winthrop T. Marston, a delegate from Somersworth introduced a set of resolutions concerning Slavery, &c. similar to those offered by Mr. Barstow, to the State Convention. They were unceremoniously dismissed, and the mover was told to take them elsewhere.

ANECDOTE.

In the relation which the much lamented traveller Park gives of his first journey to Africa, he has exhibited a striking example of the good effect of Christian forbearance even among uncivilized men, in the following anecdote:—"After having passed through the greatest distresses he arrived at the village of Song, where the people refused to receive him within the gate, though the country was infested with lions. Here Mungo Park with much difficulty; as it is related, collected grass for his horse and lay down under a tree near the gate; but being soon roused by the roar of a lion, which advanced so near to him that he heard him rustling among the grass, he immediately climbed the tree for safety. The inhabitants, who having believed him to be a Moor, would not admit him, notwithstanding the danger that threatened him, till midnight, when convinced of the error they opened the gates declaring that no Moor ever waited long at the gate of a city without cursing its inhabitants."

ANECDOTE OF CROMWELL

When told by some of his friends, that the sacrifice of a few lives would insure him stability in his high office of Protector "If," said he, "a single life is a requisite for the purchase, I would rather relinquish it." A more honourable trait does not exist in the fertile page of history, yet the historian is disposed to consider it rather as a mark of weakness than of magnanimity.

Pictures of War, 296.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) SEPTEMBER 3 1847. NO. 20

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months, Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Basa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr A. F. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

An Oration delivered on the Celebration of the 24th of August, at the Methodist Episcopal Church by Rev. J. B. Payne.

My Fellow Citizens:

Having been requested to address you on this day, and being desirous of doing any thing that lies in my power, for the good of my countrymen, I have come to attempt a compliance: and while I acknowledge it a great honor conferred upon me, I regret my inability to comply with your wish, in a manner corresponding with the importance and interesting character of this auspicious day; however, as a citizen, and as one that holds the doctrine that true religion is intimately connected with the love of country, I cannot be backward to do whatever lies in my power, for the edification of those with whom I am associated; with this assertion I hope you will bear with me, while I endeavour to comply with your request, as best I can

In order to call into exercise that gratitude and those patriotic feelings which should on this day fill every bosom, it becomes necessary to "call to mind the former days"—to compare the past with the present, and infers as far as human foresight is capable of doing so from certain irrefragable and all important considerations, what the future will be. In casting the eye back upon the history of our race, and tracing its annals to the present, a dark spot, which fills the whole retina, immediately arrests our attention;—a spot that has been in historical existence for centuries; augmenting with scarcely an opposition to the nineteenth, and biding fair, to all human appearance, to increase its blackness and criminality unto the twentieth century. If the prophetic denunciation of Noah, involved the whole of Ham's descendants, effecting his youngest son, almost immediately, but the other members of his family remotely, as some believe, we have a clear and certain fulfillment of that denunciation in the entire subjugation of the descendants of Canaan, and in the miseries and barbarities inflicted for centuries upon the Africans; which, in their duration, are unparalleled in the history of any nation. History informs us of the sufferings of many nations, but in few instances have they been otherwise than short-lived:—The Canaanites were, shortly after the introduction of the Israelites into Palestine, subdued and lost in the mass of other barbarous nations. The punic wars which terminated with the destruction of the Carthagenian empire were, compared with the duration of African suffering, momentary; The sufferings of the descendants of Abraham, though compelled to abandon their former and delightful land and in great numbers sold into foreign countries, are mitigated by the privileges they here of late enjoy in all civilized governments. But it is to Africa, that troubles and unheard-of atrocities have found their way and brought about its fall, from which, it has not yet risen. Long has it lain in its fallen condition, as if by that fall it had been deprived of all life, and broken to pieces. And indeed, it cannot be said that the evils that have come upon it, have not had a powerfully enervating effect

The faculties of the soul by oppression, had sunk into a state of dormancy: no longer did the mind work as once it did, when it sent forth from their own resources, exhibitions of its powers which quickened in its progress remote nations: Its mental and moral powers had become so stunned by the fall, that it has become a problem of difficult solution, whether minds of the same stock, with those that originated and sent forth the arts and sciences to bless and aid mankind in their toils, be capacitated for equal attainments with the caucassians. So truly had they lost their ancient energy, so oppressed were their souls within, that the consideration of their former glory, of the attainments of their ancestry, and of the once polished state of society and the flourishing of the christian principles, in their fathers' land, was not sufficient, while they remained under the weight of the intolerable incubus, to quicken and resuscitate them. In a word, the humilinting and deplorable condition of the African race, especially in America, is too obvious to all who may have traveled there, or read of their unhappy situation, to be dwelt upon here because, being generally known a rehearsal of it is unproductive of the nobler feelings But it should not be forgotton that amidst this general oppression, there were honorable exceptions; there were some of the pious of all christian denominations, and there were those who, though they made no christian profession, were nevertheless friends to humanity. These individuals looked upon, and sighed over the lamentable condition of beings differing from them in caste, but of the same nature, and having with them a common destiny. Great as was the prejudice in the generality, that there were some who waited only an opportunity to vent their noble feelings in the amelioration of the condition of the colored population. Evident in this; for, as soon as away was opened to accomplish the deliverance of some, by procuring an asylum in the land of their fathers, it was eagerly embraced, and with a degree of energy, that has ever since accompanied their labors, they began the great work of deliverance. The Colonization Society thus took its rise. It arose to relieve and to bless. From a popular sentiment, and the cause of this general oppression, it was ascertained by the humane that the only way in which they could be a blessing to this unhappy race, would be in their removal beyond the reach of oppression, and those influences which opposed all their efforts to resuscitate. This entire work was undertaken by a Society; and we are witnesses this day of its success. It was not only begun, for the God of mercy was continually prompting to its execution, and thereby actually disposing the hearts of his servants to contribute their means and energies to the gigantic undertaking, until, lo! we see it approximating to a glorious completion.

This Society cannot be impeached; nothing unholy or sordid can be brought to impugn its motives. It aimed at the accomplishment of a great object. It was fraught with immense good to the oppressed in the U. States, and the degraded beings of this peninsula. Very easily can one arrive at this conclusion, if he will be at the pains to examine the statistics of these colonies, and of the Colonization Society. It may be enquired what has that society received as a remuneration from the colonists? Naught but their gratitude; it asked no more: no more was expected: for could a remuneration of a pecuniary kind have been made, on no principle of justice could that society have received it, without going to the trouble of making a dividend thereof, between all the contributors to this great and humane scheme; hence that society never anticipated any thing of the kind. It is true, remittances of African produce, in small quantities have been made to it by its agents, but we apprehend they were never turned to personal benefit, but to the augmentation of its funds, the better to enable it to continue the prosecution of its great work. Nor was it to acquire territory on this extended coast for the U. States, that the Colonization Society exerted itself. This has been amply and authoritatively declared to the world, in the diplomatic correspondence of the governments of the U. States and Great Britian Here let all such surmisings terminate, and let us come to the conclusion that, the Colonization Society is purely benevolent and uncontaminated in its motives. This society was not local in its operations; its resources were not to be spent upon the accomplishment of only one object; they were to diffuse themselves, that their healing influences might extend to other than the immediately benefited: therefore while it contemplated the amelioration of the oppressed of the U. States, it planned the bestowment of the blessing so that the wretched of this land might ultimately partake of the effects emanating from it. The society knew that as there was in Holy Writ, a denunciation upon the descendants of the unfortunate Ham, there was also a prophetical declaration, that signified the termination of the miseries and barbarities, which were looked upon as a vivid fulfillment of that curse.

Now the great question was, how shall these two great works be started? How can the condition of the degraded of the U. States be so relieved, that they may in time be the instruments in the hand of the Lord, of bringing about the fulfillment of the prophesy—"Ethiophia shall stretch forth her hands unto God." We have seen that a removal of the first unhappy class was indispensably necessary to their elevation to the dignity of men; we have admitted the truth of the sentiment that it is impossible, under existing prejudices and humiliating considerations, for the two races to live together on equal terms in peace And now we ask, where were they to be sent?—in what land could they find a home?—in what part of the globe could a spot be found on which they might stand "self-poised and erect?" Where on the whole globe had they a better right to come, than to the land of their fathers?

> "God drave asunder and assigned their lot,
> To all the nations. Ample was the bound
> He gave them, in its distributions fair,
> And equal; and bade them dwell in peace."

Here it was thought very properly they could find a home, an asylum from all oppression;—here also it was justly supposed that the blessings of christianity and civilization, emanating as it were from a focus, would irradiate this benighted waste, and, in God's own time, be instrumental in approximating the fulfillment of that remarkable prophecy. Whether this consideration entered distinctly into the plans of the Colonization Society, or was only ranked among the things that might possibly take place, we would not say, though some of them must have had some distinct recognition of the idea from the ready encouragement given to all missionaries of the methodox faith; however, it can be safely concluded that it entered into the providential arrangement of the God of nations, without whom, nothing comes to pass; It accords with what was His manner of accomplishing this kind of good in past ages. If we carry our minds back, we shall notice in the annals of history, that colonizing was early practised with great advantage to both parties, and, if we admit the supreme rule of Him who orders the the affairs of the children of men, we must conclude that it was not fallen into by chance or at the dictates of fate, but by a remarkable providence of God We are informed by history that Greece was colonized by a band of Egytians under Cecrops, who found them, polished and enlightened as they afterwards became, in the lowest state of degradation, living not in holy wedlock and in societies, but like brute, in the forest, in dens and trees Among them he established laws and introduced the worship of the gods; he divided them into cities and began a reformation that raised them to the most polished and scientific of the ancient nations. Now, we ask, what would have been the condition of this nation, so famous in history, but for the introduction of these among them, who, according to Herodotus the historian, had black skins and frizzled hair?—what would have been their literature had not the Phenician characters, originally from Egypt, been introduced among them? While in this way the colonized were untrammeled, and upon an arena on which they could exert themselves to the development of those faculties with which God has endowed man; the individals with whom they united, became immediate beneficiaries. It is known that this is not the only instance of colonizing among the ancients; numbers found their way into Europe at the down-fall of Troy, and from Phenicia behold the celebrated Princess Elissa or Dido, and a colony of her countrymen pursuing their way until they landed in Africa, located near the spot where Tunis now stands, and thereupon founded the powerful Carthagenian empire. Can any one say that these things transpired without the intervention of Him who orders the affairs of the children of men in all their generations? It appears Providence designed that this heathen and barbarous country should be enlightened in the same way. It is not enough that missionaries should spend among them a few years; this may be attended with infinite good, but it may not be as permanent as if enforced continually by the precept and example of those domiciled among them. In no other way do we believe the Most High, intends the enlightenment of this dark land; nor are we singular in this belief; circumstances are continually transpiring which convince the world that this is the case. We are here then for the amelioration of our condition—for the reformation and ultimate elevation of those that "sit in darkness? For these purposes we have been conducted by the providential hand of the God of nations, to this our ancient patrimonial possession.

We realize a great blessing from the active and philanthropic exertions of the Colonization Society, a blessing which we hope will not lose its proper effect upon, nor be limited only to us; the effects of which begin already to exhibit themselves amid the general darkness and wretchedness of this miserable country. But it may be inquired why this separation from this disinterested and philanthropic society? Not for any evil they have done to us,—not for any discontinuance of their efforts to accomplish their humane purposes, but because it is now ascertained that the great good contemplated for our race, cannot be secured to it without the assumption of independent perogatives. It has been made known officially that these colonies sustain relation to no government. From this information it became a question, how it was that colonies under a society, should be exercising national powers without having acquired them in the manner in which they are usually possessed? Considering the short period of the settlement of these colonies, it must be acknowledged that an unusual degree of interest has been awakened by them; yet, the privileges and powers necessary to consummate the great design of their benefactors were denied them. Their laws could be violated and advantages taken of them, because neither they nor their benefactors could treat with sovereign powers on these subjects.—They had no national flag, that signalized them as one of the nations. It is a universal custom that laws to which other nations or individuals of sovereign powers are required to conform, must have been enacted by similar powers; that treaties of friendship and commerce are the productions of only similarly independent powers. The weight of these reasonable arguments was felt, and has impelled these colonies to assert to the world, that their object is not to make additions to the U. States, nor the establishment of trading markets to monopolize the products of this country, but to obtain and enjoy in quiet possession a home, an only asylum, and equal rights and privileges, to take a stand in the world, and by laudable and just conduct to arrive to manly dignity and honor—to lay the foundation and rear up a government that our children may call their own, and where they may dwell safely. But these privileges we have been denied, unless we signalize and declared unto the world who we are. Nor it is enough that we give the world to understand that we have come in possession of this territory by lawful and honorable purchase, and that therein we have become possessed of the sovereignty of its original owners, for while this might be acceeded to, it would only place us upon a level with the native tribes of whom we acquired it; no more would be acceeded to us unless nations in their urbanity, saw proper to do so: but we wanted more; though our ancestors were certainly of this land. We claimed to be civilized and christain people and desired to be treated as such. Again, it is not the policy of the civilized world to accede to any people what they have not claimed; too great is the thirst for territory, to accede one point likely to prove a national benefit, or a valuable accession, or to allow the quiet possession of that, the claim to which has not been asserted. Therefore, it became necessary, if these colonies were sovereign and independent, to declare the same to the world, and set up those claims, without which no prosperity can attend them; a step it was agreed by the Colonization Society, we should take as soon as we attained unto a proper condition, and were possessed of ability to conduct the work. It is true there has been some opposition to it, but it arose from groundless apprehensions, not from a carelessness about the position, if it could be assumed and maintained without destruction to the government; but when all learned that there was no other alternative than to answer the question, "who are you?" they united to give the hearty Declaration that Liberia is a Sovereign and Independent Government. It is done; the step is taken; the position is assumed, and we have passed the Rubicon: not to engage in hostilities, not to encroach upon another's dominions, but to take a stand upon the field of nationality,—to exercise those privileges and national prerogatives peculiar to independent and sovereign powers. We congratulate the Republic of Liberia. But we would not tender this congratulation to the citizens of Liberia, were we not firm in the belief that it is the only course that can be pursued by this governernment, No, too dear is to us, too deeply interested are we in it, to hail its entrance upon a career which we believed untenable. However, far short we are of equaling some of its citizens, in love for it and strong and enduring interest in its prosperity, we presume to vie with the greatest; we would not have engaged in this undertaking, we would raise our voice in its defence—nor participate in this celebration, but from the belief we entertain of the propriety and practicability of the position we have this day assumed.

And we would enquire of any that may oppose it,—whether they have thought upon it in all its bearings, whether they have dispassionately considered the subject—whether they would have us remain in a condition in which, when necessity requires us to speak for ourselves, neither we nor our benefactors could with propriety! Would such persons have the great scheme of colonization approximate to a consummation devoutly wished by all its friends! and can this be done in any other way than by entering upon a national career—and sending forth upon the wings of the wind, the Declaration of our Sovereignty and Independence! What can we loose by doing so? in the condition in which we were, we had all to lose, and had lost considerable, without the privilege to speak for our rights. We could as individuals speak and write; but there was none to treat officially. This power was possessed neither by the society nor our chief executive officer; and to have remained in that condition was to throw back for years the revival of our race, to thwart to an indefinite period the completion of the national fabric.

Do we loose the aid of the society? do they, after having recommended this government to take this step, discontinue their humane operations? Have they not in strong language, assured us of their communance? and how can we disbelieve them, have they ever deceived us? have they ever advised us to do that which they at the same time knew we could not safely undertake? we have more confidence in that society: they, with all other well-wishers to the cause, see it is the only plan that can be adopted. There is no reason to apprehend a cessation of the principles and form of a republican government; these are too highly appreciated, and too long have Liberians been accustomed to their enjoyment, to sacrifice them for any consideration whatever. We have no desire to unite with any government or national power, any farther than friendly and commercial treaties will unite us. We have not taken this step for any purpose of the kind, in this we know we echo the sentiments of all Liberians; it is our joy to remain as we are; While no sacrifice will be to dear to maintain existing friendship, and secure it where it does not exist, we wish to be an adjunct to no government: These things all have learned that we are acquainted with the discussions, to which this subject has given rise; therethere, because Liberia has this day placed herself in a condition, in which while her friends are doing what their friendship and humanity prompt them to, she can act for herself; we congratulate her. We hail with feelings of delight the expiration of her nonage—we behold the birth day of her nationality: the thundering of canon, the unfurling of yon flag, the unusual delight felt by all Liberians, the smiling countenances of the citizens of this Republic, tell us that the long oppressed and fallen are about to resuscitate and breath the breath of nationality once more. Hear it ye nations of Africa—hear it ye descendants of our fathers—bear it in your migrations, talk of it in your wretched huts, until it becomes greatly known, throughout the length and breadth of this devoted land. Not for ourselves only, but we return from oppression and degradation, with the great blessings of christianity and civilization, to circulate among you. O! ye spirits of once broken hearted parents, whose animated hearts wept blood, when your sons and daughters were by ruthless hands torn from you, God permitted it thus to be for your good; and lo! we come laded with good for your wretched posterity. And may it not be told to them who are not of our race! are there not come who, having heard of our once miserable condition, are disposed to sympathize with us? will not the trouble through which we have come enlist their sympathy? When we tell the nations of the earth why we are here, when we refer them to the impossibility of our becoming any thing like men, in the land from which we come, when we tell them, if they need be told, of the obstacles and oppositions that lay in our way, preventing us from arising to the dignity of men, and enjoying the privileges peculiar to such beings, will they retain their suspicions? When the christian religion ceases to exert its sanctifying influenes, when it ceases to kindle and refine humanity, we may tell our talo of wo and not be heard; but from the pure benevolence and christiany that exist now, we feel sanguine that none will object to our position; if they do, they have only to object; they can meet nothing from us but the appeals of helpless infants, praying for the privilege to live and enjoy themselves in the land of their fathers.

Encouraging ourselves with these reasonable anticipations, we can hardly restrain our feelings, when we think of the day we celebrate:—the birth day of Liberia's national existence! the day on which she breaks the long silence in this land and tells who she is. The difficulties encountered, and borne down by this modern phenix—the wars in which we have been constrained to engage in this land,—all conspired to fill our hearts with gratitude and ambition: gratitude, to the God of hosts, whose wisdom directed and whose power preserved us; and to that body of American philanthropists whom He made his instruments. Ambition, to prove to the world the colored man's susceptibility of equal improvement and refinement with the white, is no longer a problem; and ambition to preserve unarnished the memories of those veterans, who, by their bravery and patriotism bequeathed us this isolated government, when they took their departure from among us. It would afforod them uncontaminated pleasure were they yet with us, to join in celebration of this auspicious day. They longed for the arrival of the time when it would be proclaimed unto the world that Liberia is a sovereign and independent Republic; but they never anticipated the arrival of the period so soon, when thus there would be hoisted on Montserrado a national flag, with a lone star, which after ages of wandering, has at length found its own orbit; and probably it would not but for the almost providential circumstances which have impelled us to the assumption of this position.

Were these veterans with us to rehearse on this day, their toils and difficulties in maintaining this position; were they here to speak of their signal victory over their foes; how would it augment our gratitude but while theirs is a nobler celebration we will hand down their names and deeds to unborn generations.

Fellow citizens: we have arrived at an important crisis.—We have assumed a position which, if properly maintained, is only the beginning of a more glorious and prosperous era in the history of this Republic; but it is a position requiring for its new responsibilities and important departments, suitable men to give it that efficiency so heartily desired by all its friends. It cannot be expected that this great undertaking will proceed well without proper management. Difficulties peculiar to all works of importance will arise; and firm men of firm principles will be required to contend with them, others, especially set apart and qualified, will be required at all times to direct in our national affairs.

"We cannot all be masters, nor all masters Cannot be truly followed"

It is true, in a Republican form of government all the citizens are eligible to office but all are not qualified or otherwise suitable for all offices, therefore it is hoped that our republican principles will not be abused by a carelessness to the dignity and prosperity of that government, with which Providence has provided us. Let the whole republic then be cautious and alive to her interest; then will her most important offices be filled with men competent for the duties assigned them, and upon whose faithfulness she can rely. It is to such men that we look, (not for deviations from justice and the constitution of the Republic, but,) to honor the former, and by watchfulness see that the latter, in the integrity of its principles, is adhered to by all who have sworn allegiance thereto, and hold offices under it. Painful must it be to every patriot to behold at any time the perversion of those principles upon which the stability and prosperity of the government hang, impossible as it is for such deviations and corruptions to pass without leaving a blighting effect; and if in a few years the Republic of Liberia is not seen sculking back into the darkness from which she has just emerged, it will be owing to her strict adherance to those principles, so intimately connected with her political existence. The power with which your officers are endowed, emanates from you, and yours is the duty to see that it is not perverted to the injury of the Republic. But fellow citizens, great privileges usually involve corresponding duties: such is the fact in your case; and, if all the power with which your officers are invested, emanated from you, yours is the duty to harmonize with them, and obey those laws and political regulations, enacted and adopted from time to time by them. It is indespensably necessary that you support your officers and your government by obedience to its laws. Your officers cannot carry into execution any law without the support of the people, especially if its execution be contested. This duty is not peculiar to a few, but to all that are citizens; and I presume it is thus felt by all, unless there should be among us, some who would leave these shores; such characters have lived in Liberia, and may again, who, it cannot be expected will be otherwise than careless about the prosperity of the Republic, and disobedient whenever an opportunity offers But you, who consider this your home, who are resolved here to leave [illegible] laying the foundation of a government [illegible] perpetuated and enjoyed to your latest generation, must feel the importance of obedience to the laws of your country. The consequences of national disobedience, have been felt by different parts of the world to their great injury; and we would admonish you to let the past warn you of what your condition will be, if you countenance an irregular course in any tending to mar the peace of the public. Consider, that all the benefits of the proper management of this Republic, accrue alike to all; protecting their rights and securing to them their civil and religious liberty, and when the laws are energetically enforced, there will be no murmur. Hitherto, to some extent, it would appear that laws were enacted for no purpose, —but the change in your government requires that the subsequent administration of the laws be marked with efficiency and energy; therfore, Liberians prepare yourselves for the great duties, and responsibilities which are imposed upon you by the new position you have this day assumed. Call up the spirit of the American patriots and let similar feelings possess your bosoms, and break forth into manly exertion, and yours will be the honor of having founded and reared up a Republican government for the oppressed of our race. The vastness of the undertaking makes it too much for any portion less than the whole community, to sustain and conduct prosperously,—therefore, it is highly important that we be united. Great evils have been entailed upon nations,—mighty kingdoms and empires have fallen to rise no more, by discord which ultimately genders into anarchy and bloodshed and destruction. The sagacious politician, having an eye upon what is the dreadful consequent of the want of union, was enabled to predict, as if he caught the true spirit of prophecy,—"United we stand, divided we fall." This principle may well be denominated the national pulse;—the regular beatidgs of which are indispensably necessary to the vitality of a nation. "If a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand;" and as sure as these words are true, so will the destruction of this Republic be, if union be not maintained among us. Be united Liberians; understand one another; know your common object; let all animosities fall this day at the foot of yon staff; and declare hence forward, we be brethren aiming at the common good. These are not the only premises from which we would infer the future prosperity or indestructibility of this Republic;—for the history of nations teaches us there are other indispensable virtues, from among which we will extract only two more.

One is industry:—the origin of all physical, mental, and political advancement; the foundation of all national grandeur;—forgetfulness of which is an impassible barrier to all personal or national prosperity and happiness. It is utterly inconsistant with the course of Providence, to expect these without the employment of the means ordained for their production—and accordingly attended to by all, thriving nations. I need not remind you of the importance of agriculture to a nation's prosperity, you have only to cast your eye whence you came, and contemplate the riches extracted, by the industrious from a soil in few respects better than yours. With a country capacious and fertile, abounding with products much demanded by some nations, what can hinder you from becoming prosperous and happy but idleness, the bane of society and fruitful cause of many evils?

Mental improvement is also absolutely necessary; "knowledge is power,"—is an axiom worthy of attention. The enlightened of all ages have paid becoming attention to it and even to this day, we behold them offering their petitions and adorations at the shrine of wisdom, acknowledging their indebtedness to her for all that is good and virtuous in the transactions of the affairs of life. While all nations thus know their estimate of knowledge, shall we be dormant?

Shall we enter the political world without the qualifications, necessary to maintain our national existence? Shall we, if we ever gain a footing in that world, remain where we are at, when all nations are moving forward in this respect! Was ever there a time in the history of Liberia, when men of intellectual stamp were more needed! It requires no small portion of knowledge to conduct the affairs of a people. Here, then, is room for improvements, and for the exercise of laudable ambition; here is an adequate stimulus to apply to ourselves and our children.

In reflecting upon our present condition and the new career just entered upon, it would not be improper to enquire by whose aid and protection, we have been sustained and delivered from the imminent dangers that have at different times, gathered around and threatened us with destruction? We feel it just to acknowledge that it is not owing to any skill or might in us, that we have succeeded, notwithstanding these oppositions, but to the protection and aid of that Being, that rules the nations, and holds the destiny of each in his hand: and, if, when we look back, we are led to exclaim "what hath God wrought," we see every reason that induced us to trust in Him, occupying the same place and teaching us it is our duty to do so in future.

I can do nothing better in concluding this address, than to direct your attention to the propriety of depending upon the Omnipotent arm of the Amighty. Remember that He hath said, and what he says is true, "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." A tenacious adherance to the principles of the christian religion;—obedience to its precepts, encouragement to its institutions and ordinances, among ourselves and children, will, with the other indispensables mentioned above, insure stability and prosperity to this Republic, while its happy influences will ooze out to water and make glad the moral Sahara around us. But, fellow citizens, the reverse of these things and an indulgence in national sins, will not only disgrace us in the estimation of the good and virtuous of the world, but bring down upon us the judgments of the God of holiness. We have only to enquire of you, Liberians, shall this Republic be prosperous and advance in national importance! Doubtless it is destined to do so; but may we not retard and make it a reproach unto the world! Naught should insure us with a greater resolution to advance this arduous but glorious work, than the consideration of the rising and future generations. Shall they be cast out and oppressed in future, when we have it in our power to hand down to them a government well founded and built upon sanctified principles! Shall they have cause to lament that their fathers were so base and inconsiderate, having had it in theirr power to bequeath them inestimable blessings, yet through sunmeness and degrading carelessness, failed to do so! Eternal and merited infamy will be attached to our names. Again, will you not endeavour to wipe away the opprobrium from the colored race, and prove to the world that it is equally susceptible, with any other of mental culture and good government? If Liberia have enemies, if prejudice would prompt to laughter, at the non-success of this Republic, how would the joy of such be augmented, to hear of a failure in this undertaking! O! Liberians, think of these considerations; and let the thought inspire your hearts with a holy and indomitable resolution to advance your cause, that the Republic may be safe and respected by the world, that the light of that lone star, may illuminate this benighted land: AND, as you fade away from among the living, yours will be the great satisfaction of seeing your descendants established and happily situated, in a government founded and reared with great exertion and rendered permanent by the strict observance of the principles of good government, by your, their parents whose memories will be an encircled in their estimation with a halo of never fading glory.

For the Liberia Herald.

MESSRS EDITORS:—Having seen a queer publication in the Liberia Herald, of the 6th August, Headed "Wonderful trial and virdict," in the case of Tobias Outland, for the alleged murder of J. H. Stevens, purporting too to be the true proceedings of that very interesting and excited trial which was so recently decided in the court of this county and town, And in which my name and that of the Rev. B. R. Wilson's appearing as Attorneys for the accused, Seeing this, I expected to have read a true and fair statement, of the proceedings at the trial, as is very common throughout the world; but instead of that, I found on perusal, a great part of this novel publication to be defective, and in many parts basely untrue. Therefore do pronounce the same to be such, as well as rediculous in the extreme, for no set of men postessing common sense, would attempt to publish a trial at law of any kind, commencing and ending as this is done. It shows as by their own words, that they were thrown into such a phrenzy from the disappointment of their expected victim, that their senses left them, or they would not have stated the doings of the court, the verdict of the jury, with decission of the Judges &c., before any of the numerous depositions were brought in, then, putting in the old exploded depositions, of Fanny Belton, and Venus Hall, which were taken at Sinoe, leaving out that which they gave here at the trial, because they were more in favor of the accused. The greater part of the depositions, are differently put from that of the original, which were before the court, many words changed, others omitted, and several intire depositions not published, that of Samuel Parsons, which is the 8th in order, is not in this inglorious publication as first. What is said here respecting the part I performed as one of the Attorneys for T. Outland, I assure them I feel neither afraid or ashamed of, therefore I care nothing of the sarcastic attempts of this clan to try and belittle me, by saying that my time, signifying my whole time, was spent in reading, in order to invandate the evidences produced at court, and to destroy that of Fanny Belton, the most positive evidence, so considered which was before the court. The same petty attempt is made against Mr. B. R. Wilson, endeavoring thereby, to enlist the feelings of the Superintendant of the M. E. Mission against him, by putting the words that he did not intend to put himself under any man &c. But these petty attempts at villifying myself and colleague, can do us no harm, in any place where we are known. Neither myself or Mr. Wilson presumes that we possesse the qualifications of a Cicero, a Brougham, Erskine, Webster or a Berrian, yet according to the circumstances of Liberia, we had to perform the part of the Lawyers, and have been instrumental in saving the life of a fellow citizen; the best could do no more. It's true I employed much of my time in the reading of several cases, where from circumstantial evidences which seems almost amounting to positive, inasmuch that, both in England, Germany, Scotland, and in the United States, the decisions of the courts, being given against the accused, they were executed, but after their deaths proofs have been adduced of their innocency; but what remedy could then be afforded! I say some, therefore I endeavored to give all caution to the jury which I possible could think of. Reminding them in the language of the immortal Breckinridge, never to bring in a verdict, so as to take the life of man, woman, or child when there remains any donbt whatever, respecting the empannelling of the Jury, the Attorneys had to keep very bright eyes upon the men as called up; here I might say much, but suffice it by saying, that with the rejection of ten, the country fell upon twelve good and honest men, principally from among our best and most independent Farmers; men who true to their oaths, considered well on the case of which they were to decide, who, after investigating the evidences for nearly 24 hours, returned with their verdict, which read as follows. "We the Jurors after due consideration of the case now pending between the prisoner T. Outland, and the Commonwealth of Liberia, do to the best of our judgment declare that the said T. Outland according to the evidences, presented to us, is not guilty of the crime" "Having acknowledged their agreement upon their verdict they were discharged, the prisoner was accordingly released."

Now I appeal to the whole civilized world, could anything be more fair! Are we not constitutionary bound to be tried by our peers according to the laws of the land. Where then is this great sin, Myself and the Rev. B. R. Wilson have committed. For which, after serving our country for years, and recently too, in giving it a wholesome Constitution, and in less than two weeks after signing the same, to have our names put in print by a Mob gang so as to be defamed through the world at large as enemies, to the peace, prosperity, and dignity of Liberia, and that we should be watched by every good citizen, therefore should be intrusted with little or no power, and should be avoided by all that expect the prosperity of this Republic. But the greater inconsistency in this mischievous intentioned affair, is that this should be sanctioned by any man professing to be a follower of Jesus, or even supposed to be deserving a seat either in our council or courts. "O shame where is thy blush, O inconsistency, can thou not hide thy deformed face. But for the credit of Liberia, be it said that the people generally knows how to appreciate the value of its citizens, for both S. Benedict, and B. R. Wilson, have often been tried in the balance and never yet been found wanting: no they have often as in this late Law case, come out triumphant. To the sad discomfiture of thier oppo-ments, and pleasure of their friends. But citizens here of mind see through the whole of this designing, but foolish meeting, and are convinced that it is no more than an electioneering trick.

I feel truly ashamed for such productions to go abroad, not that either myself or Mr. Wilson, fears in the least of any harm that it can do us, for I know that it will only serve to raise us higher in the estimation of the good and great of the earth, for having when others who were engaged in behalf of the accused, finding the same to be unpopular among their relations had forsaken him, and that too almost on the day of trial. When this was made known to us, we tremblingly cast off every other consideration, and fearlessly rescued the poor unfortunate prisoner from the jaws of his devouring enemies, who appeared to be fully as anxious of seeing the last drop of his heart's blood, as the most cruel Jews were to see that of our blessed Saviour.

I will here stop with this heart sickening account of the trial. I assure my readers that I take no pleasure in writings of this kind, for the sake as some have done, merely of getting into notoriety, for of all wars I hate that of the newspaper; but necessity sternly requires of me to vindicate the part I undertook in the trial, besides this while I have neither time, talent, or any disposition, to live in broils or contention with any man or set of men, yet I will never consent to be trampled on with impunity, under the feet of any, be their rank or standing what it may. Therefore as I expect to be now a target for many, who will try to kill me if possible with Ink balls, when they have shot a while, I may then be compelled to give a broadside which may touch the quick of their wicked hearts, or make some so mad as to shoot off their brainless heads. Respecting the town meeting so called, which was held at the Court House on the evening of the 5th August, being the second night after the acquital of T. Outland, and said to be a large meeting of the citizens of Monrovia, which is basely untrue.

For it was proposed and gotten up only by a few unhappy spirits, who was disappointed of a victim which they wished to have immolated, on the altar of their fiendish erection, for no sooner than the verdict was read in court, thereby acquiting the prisoner, then the faces of some were as much if not more distorted than that of Caiaphas, at the condemnation of the Saviour. The party so disappointed immediately went to work forming another stratagem, their first expedient was to get up a Mob meeting, under the title of a Town meeting, at which time they would have an opportunity by declamation to injure the name and character of myself, Mr. Wilson, with the jury together, with all that were friendly to T. Outland's release, and it being near the time of the election the devil taught them that it would take well. The meeting was organized but whom did it consist of! Why, of several prayerless Priests, who are always the first into every mischief, having on the uniform of heaven, they are generally the best prepared to fight the battles of the devil. Next several Apostates from churches in this town and elsewhere, together with a mercenary set of Rowdies, with a few harmless but noisy boys and young men, who would sport and laugh if the whole metropolis was on fire. It was not supprizing to find the famed commonwealth Attorney opening this infamous meeting for such was his chagrin at his being completely outlawyerd, that he was prepared to do any low act. I feel sanguine that he would perform the office of Hangman, for myself Wilson, or D. Moore. But I will here advise this learned Doctor of Law, to read carefully, (and keep the same in mind) the History of Haman and Mordecai, he appears to lay some stress upon myself, and colleague being cunning and crafty, in a good sense this belong to the profession, but in the other it belongs to himself being a Pettifogger. It's said in this famed account of this Mob meeting that the citizens were assembled for the purpose of sending T. Outland out of the limits of this county. Now is there any sense in this, I answer none, for where could they send him to? have they any place prepared to which they could send him even if the Legislature authorized the action of such a Mob. But T. Outland was tried legally, and honorably acquitted, therefore is no more an offender of our laws, than many of those who were the principal actors at this meeting, some must well remember when they stood trembling in the criminal seat, and merely escaped as by the skin of their teeth.

It's said that the Preamble and Resolutions which was offered at this meeting, was done so by Thomas Robertson, but did he write them? no; for he cannot write his own name correctly; but as he suffered himself to be made the cats paw, for a mischievous party he have to bear the scorching. It's well known who is the instigator of this foolish meeting, also who composed the Resolutions &c.

S. BENEDICT.

NOTICE.

To all whom it may concern,—The Court of Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions, orders that in the case of Anthony D. Williams Plaintiff, v. s. Frederick Lewis Defendant, in account of the late J. Ashmuns estate, do not appear at its next session in the Town of Monrovia, to be held on the first Monday in November 1847, to show cause why judgment should not be rendered up against him: and if no one appears, the Court will be in duty bound to render judgment against defendant.

By order,

W. W. STEWART,
Clerk of the Court of Common
Pleas and Quarter Sessions.

A Quaker's admonition to a man who was pouring forth a volley of ill language to him was—'Have a care, friend, or thou mayst run thy face against my fist

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, SEPTEMBER 3 1847.

We are truly pleased at the unanimity which prevails among our fellow citizens, especially in Montserado, and Sinoe Counties, with respect to the proceedings of the late convention. It was hardly to be supposed that any set of men, without the special inspiration of the Almighty, could form a constitution, which, in all its parts, would be unexceptionable. We are happy to find that the draft which has been submitted to the people seems every where, except by a few in Grand Bassa, to be favorably received, and will, no doubt, be adopted by a large majority of the people. It is pronounced, by persons capable of judging, to be as well adopted, in all its important parts, to the circumstances of the people of these colonies as any that could be produced. The Delegates, no doubt, feel exceedingly gratified to find that their labors are so generally appreciated by their constituents. Indeed, the conduct of their constituents in this instance clearly shows, what confidence virtuous and honest representatives may place in the judgment, integrity and moderation of an intelligent and free people.

While we rejoice at the patriotism of our fellow citizens in this county, we have reason to regret that in the county of Grand Bassa, to some extent, a different feeling prevails. We are informed there are a few disaffected individuals in that county, who, intent only upon romantic schemes, and their own unshaken interest and aggrandisement, are deceiving the people by the most false assertions and insinuations of oppression on the part of the people of that county—and even daring to question the sincerity of the Colonization Society.

For two years past those men, they are well known to us, have been unremitting in their efforts to sow discontent and disaffection among the inhabitants of Bassa and to prejudice their minds against the people of this county.

When the question of independence was seriously agitated, and found to be popular in this county, they seized upon the occasion to propagate the most base and scandalous falsehoods respecting the motives of the people of Montserado county. We allude exclusively to those persons who are now endeavoring to excite the people in Bassa to acts of insubordination. We know well that there are gentlemen in that county, as in this, who opposed from the commencement, any change in our relations with the Society, and done so from honest and patriotic motives. They feared that the time had not arrived for such an important change, that we should not be able to sustain the government without enormous taxation &c. &c. Not so with those demagogues, though, at the time, they assumed that position. A majority of the people, however, determined upon the measure, and men of intelligence, in the minority, at once submitted to the will of the majority, hence it was sincerely hoped, and confidently believed that unanimity would prevail—notwithstanding the low artifices of these discontented and factious spirits.

Great harmony prevailed in the convention—the delegates from Bassa taking the lead, and one or two of them loud in their declamations for immediate action. A solemn declaration of independence was issued, and a new government drafted. Now those promoters of sedition and rebellion, in Bassa, have changed their position and partially thrown off their masks. They are now endeavoring to mislead the people by impugning the motives of the Society. Telling the people that the constitution should not be adopted until the Society has actually transfered all its property in the colony, to the commonwealth; advising them in the mean time to withdraw from this county, and form a separate government. We are informed that they have succeeded too well in imposing falsehood on a number of the innocent people of that county, and have shaken their allegiance to the constitution and laws of their country—strange infatuation. We have reason to believe, however, that some of their wild schemes and atrocious purposes are known to the authorities, and unless they are more cunning than we suppose them to be—we predict, that before they will be able, even for a moment, to gratify their lust of power, and lawless ambition, they will have to account for their conduct, and receive that punishment which the laws of their country inflict upon such atrocious offenders. We do sincerely hope that the good people of Bassa will consider well the measures proposed by those men, who set themselves up as their leaders in this unnatural opposition.

We doubt not that upon cool and sober reflection the people will soon be convinced of the ruinous consequences that must result from the measures in which their selfish leaders would engage them, and their resentment and indignation would be justly turned against the wicked contrivers and promoters of their ruin.

Our Bassa readers will please understand, that we apply the term leaders exclusively to three or four swaggering boasters among them, whose plans and designs are some what known to us; and it is our object to warn you against them. Will you be involved in a criminal connection—as one of them has been—with a certain dealer not many miles from you? Will you be guilty of the gross incongistency of another? Consent to be dupes of the third? And submit to the tyrany of the fourth? Surely you will not. Be not deceived. Tear from those men the masks which cover them, expose their real character, and your rights and liberties are secure.

You have nothing to fear in regard to public lands, the Society has promised, and will deal with us on the most liberal principles. As to separating from this county, and forming a distinct government; the idea is preposterous; it is suicidel; dismiss it at once from your minds. Aside from every other consideration, how unreasonable the suggestion.

You sent Delegates to the convention, they were unanimous in their action; our relations with the Society were changed, formally declared, and a new government drafted: now to talk of separation is perfect nonsense. Should the constitution be adopted by a majority of the people of the whole commonwealth, it will go into operation, and be as binding upon you as upon the citizens of any other part of the commonwealth. Then take our advice, cooperate with your fellow citizens, in the other counties, let us unite our efforts in advancing the interests of our common country.

The Pleasuring Party.

On Tuesday morning our river was alive with boats gayly dressed with flags and pennants. About one hundred persons, of both sexes, embarked in them on a recreative excursion up the St. Pauls. They made "Mammytown" their head quarters; and what with swinging and jumping, the time was pleasantly passed, until summoned to dinner. The Ladies, the most useful part of creation, had prepared for the occasion a sumptuous banquet, to which all paid their devoirs with the greatest satisfaction. After partaking of the rich repast, the party adjourned to Mr. Gabriel Moore's farm, where an hour was spent in gleeful exercises. The boats were then put in requisition to bring the party home, well delighted with the enjoyments of the day.

The Meeting of the Dey Chiefs.

We are informed, that as soon as the rice crops are gathered and housed, the Dignitaries of the Dey country will meet in convention to elect a successor to the late King Bromley. Several competitors are looking forward to this meeting with considerable anxiety: but we know not, who will be the successful aspirant. Kia Buco a man of respectable intelligence, and who is well known to our commercial men as an extensive trader, will we are told, stand a very good chance of being elected, if he will exercise his great influence for the purpose.

Slavers Watched!

There are two vessels in the Sherbro river waiting for an opportunity to slip out with slaves,—they are closely watched by the British Cruizers, but unless the greatest caution is preserved, they may yet get off with their living cargoes.

Our readers will find in our present number the Address delivered on the 24 h ultimo, by Rev. James S. Payne. We invite our Liberia readers to peruse it attentively—they will find it highly interesting and instructive. We consider it a handsome production.

Reciprocation.

It is rumored that the Brazilian Consul at Sierra Leone, who was also dubbed Judge in the Court of Mixed Commission, for the adjudication of vessels engaged in the slave trade, has lately taken leave for his country in the [illegible] and the John Seys; and while [illegible] Sierra Leone, he was met by his own ship going in with a modest cargo of five hundred slaves. She was captured by one of H. B. M. Cruizers. His worship being anxious to reach home did not return to assist his brother Judges in the adjudication.

A fearful mortality has been raging amongst the European population of Sierra Leone.

Correction

In our last number amongst the names of the Ladies, who presented the flag, please read Mrs. J. R. Roberts, instead of Mrs C. Ellis.

SELECTED EXTRACTS

A "lick back" to the Enemies of Capital Punishment.—The richest nut the capital punishment advocates have had to crack for some time, is offered by Robert Bowland, of Ohio, recently convicted of murder in the first degree in Mansfield, in that State; and sentenced to be hung on the 14th of March next. The Governor of the State commuted the punishment to imprisonment for life, but the convict positively declines to accept, and insists that the sentence of the law shall be executed. One of the Cincinati papers states that unless the criminal accepts the commutation cannot be carried into effect. Perhaps it would be as well for the community that the laudable desire of Bowland should be gratified.

There is a certain sea-captain who sails from Boston, who loves his wife, and makes a great pet of her when he is at home. She always writes him very lengthy epistles while he is away, but the careful and affectionate man never thinks of opening them. He just lays them by, tied up and labelled according to their dates, in order that, when he returns, his wife may read them all to him in a lump.

An editor in Illinois, mentioning the fact that ladies have discarded corsets, concludes with the following effusion—'Sound the timbrel o'er valley and sea—The lace strings are broken and women are free!'

Scarcity of Food.—Douglass Jerrold, in his English shilling Magazine, is severe on the Government for ordering prayers against famine to be put up in 14.490 parishes, when by merely taking off the duty on foreign corn the danger would be past. It reminds him of the imprisonment of the Pope, by order of Charles the 5th, when he captured and sacked Rome, and who, on his return to Spain, ordered prayers to be said on behalf of his Holiness, whom he could have relieved by his sign manual at any time.

DIED:—In this town, on the 15th ultimo, Mr Joseph Mars, in the——year of his age, after a protracted, but painful illness of about ten months. Mr. M. was a member of the Providence Baptist Church in this place. With the faith of a "Paul," he departed this life, in the triumphant hope of a blessed immortality. Through the whole course of his illness, he bore it with Christian fortitude, and always expressed himself as being resigned to the will of God. He followed "Paul" as he followed Christ; and was truly a pattern of Christian piety. During his sojourn in Liberia, he evinced to all who knew him, that there is a reality in the Religion of Jesus Christ. He has exchanged cares, sorrows, pains and afflictions, for a never fading crown of glory at God's right hand.—Communicated.

In this town, on the morning of the 17th ultimo, Mr. John Tisdal, after an illness of a few weeks. Mr. T. was a member of the M. E. Church at Caldwell. His end was peace.—Com.

In this town, on the 3rd, inst. Mr. Peter Johnson, after a severe illness of about 17 days. Mr. J. was a member of the Providence Baptist Church in this place. He departed this life in the full assurance of a blessed immortality.—Com

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile Business under the firm of Samuel F. McGill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MCGILL,
R. S. MCGILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	6	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	33 1-3
Beef, cargo No. 1,	Bl	10 00	12 00
Blue Baftz,	Pc.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	22	30
Boards,	1000/t	30 00	45 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	12 1-2	16 3-
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks, domestic,	Pc	12 1-2	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 12
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Pc	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molassea	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	1 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1-3	34
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	15 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2
Romaulo	Pc.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none	100
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Pc.	3 00
Tobacco	1000/bs.	9 00	3 75
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00	10 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	5 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	18 00
			20 00

POETRY.

From the Daily Courier.

TO THE ROSE.

Lovely flower! why thus created?
Why with beauty so divine!
When alas! 'tis only fated,
Thou thy charms should'st soon resign.

For the sun hath scarce extended,
To the West his brilliant ray.
Ere thy charms so sweetly blended,
Have begun to fade away.

Gladly would the eye retain thee
In the freshness of thy bloom;
Gladly would the heart regain thee
As an infant from the tomb!

But oh! no—the spoiler cometh
Even to the blooming rose;
And its short-lived moments summeth
As the infant's to its close.

And our hearts within us wonder
Why thus smitten from above;
Why the ties we thus must sunder,
From the things we still would love;

Yes, sweet rose! it prins us sadly
Thus thy fading charms to view,
And, if Heaven permitted, gladly
Would we see them ever new.

But this boon hath Heaven declin'd us,
Wisely, as we fain wou'd trust;
For thy fate should still remind us,
That like thee, we too, are dust.

A.

MISCELLANEOUS

From the New-York Observer.

POVERTY IN LONDON.

One of the results of the great chemical process, civilization by which such immense wealth is produced in London, is to use up and throw off as a scum, a pretty large proportion of the human race. Go to a Queen's Drawing Room, and see miles of coaches marked with coronets and loaded with diamonded ladies inside, & gilded flunkies outside, or to an Epsom or Ascot race, or Eton Montem, and see London disgorge itself in a river of humanity on wheels, and you would think the riches of London must fill every pocket. You could not dream that utter emptiness lurked under a great part of the show, much less that poverty was surrounding the whole, as the ocean does an island, always threatening to engulf it at high tide. Go through London again: avoid Regent St., Oxford St., Pall Mall, Piccadilly, Strand; keep clear of Parks and squares; if you please, leaving the centre of Regent St., at Beak St., drive through Silver St., into the purlieus and human pig-styes of a great brewery near Windmill St., penetrate and perforate, if you can, the stived alleys there, where you will see children playing at marbles in their shirts in the afternoon. Make your way to the Seven Dials, where six streets meet, and each street leads through a vista of second-hand clothes and old shoes from cellar to garret, and the dealers seem the most extravagant caricatures upon the vices of drunkenness and fraud. This is not purgatory, but a place that needs to be sent there. Then turn your steps to the northward a little where St. Giles' steeple rises in brotherly companionship with the tall chimney of St. Giles' brewery. The pens of Dickens and Jerrold, to my certain knowledge, have not over painted St. Giles. They are driving the ploughshare of city improvement right through it now—I mean in regard to brick and mortar. As to the humanity, that is turned out of the furrow like grubs from a dunghill, and is left to add itself to similar dunghills not yet disturbed. Here, is in fact, or was, a great city in itself, which gets its living by begging & stealing cold victuals, cast off clothes coals, potatoes, bread, and money to buy beer with; and at the hour of midnight cooks its only daily meal, and takes the comfort which the blessed God vouchsafes even to the most miserable and wicked. One night, between 11 and 12, I followed a little girl of eight or ten years, who said her mother was dying of the typhus fever, and needed assistance, and the children had nothing to eat—more than a mile, and she led me into a cellar room in the midst of St. Giles.' There was a tipsy hag, who sure enough, as soon as she heard us at the door, jumped into a bed of rags in her shoes, and feigned to be sick with the typhus fever. The pot was boiling merily over a fire made of old laths, and was pretty well filled with potatoes, and, by the smell, was not without meat. There was plenty of beer, not in the mug, but in the mother of two little lying beggar children. The game they were playing was that of the whole neighborhood, up stairs and down stairs, every house containing from six to ten families.

Retracing your steps cross Long Acre, where they make the splended coaches by thousands, at James St., and look at the poverty which murmurs sullenly around Covent Garden, Bow St., Police Office, and Drury Lane Theatre. Pursue your way, by devious streets, to the moral slough of Holy Well St. Strand, where between two churches the population is the farthest pasible from God, getting a precarious living much of it by selling vile prints, or the sight of them. Then get along, as you may, through Harp Alley, Fleet Lane, and by the enormous prisons, where men expiate the crimes of human passions and poverty, and close by its awful walls you will see plenty of people, whose looks, if not their lips, say they "don't care a bit," whether they are inside or out. Then go back down the hill of Skinner St. to foot of Holborn Hill and turn to your right up Field Lane. You will see more stolen handkerchiefs exposed for sale, than you ever conceived of before. You can buy one at your own price, and it will be stolen from you before you get through the next street, perhaps. At the foot of Saffiron Hill turn again to your right through West. St. and passing through 13 acres of sheep and oxen in Smithfield, enter Bartholomew Close, which you will confess to be close enough. You will perhaps deviate into Little Britain, and crossing Aldersgate St., dive into the masses back of old Guild Hall, and so on by St. Austin Friars, where it is possible you may marvel at the dead population—where, literally, the dead bury the dead—human dust being about all there is for human dust to return to. At last you come to the neighborhood of Houndsditch, and you will have gone far enough to have seen as much as you can bear of London's vice, poverty, and human rubbish. O Hogarth, thy pencil was that of a mere portrait painter, and strong was thy stomach. This whole pilgrimage you should take, between 10 and 12 on Saturday night, or rather on Sunday morning. The people having then their week's wages are making their week's purchases, resolved generally to have one sufficient dinner on Sunday, at least. Butcher shops and old clothes shops are then in their glory with the most extravagant flaring of gas, so as to make deeds of darkness impossible. Then to, and later, is pandemonium best enacted in the beer shops and gin palaces, which are the most splendid precisely on this very route. Here, amidst broad plate glass mirrors, and great gilded punchoons, on hair-seat sofas, revel men and women who will want bread before another Saturday night, and whose children are either begging or stealing at the same time. Judging from the state of these streets, there is no hour in the twenty-four when so few people are asleep in London, as at midnight between Saturday and Sunday. Even small children and babes in the arms are abundant enough in the street crowd to put to rest all fears of the extinction of the race. At Houndsditch you had better be on Sunday morning, to attend the great mart of second hand clothing held by the Israelites. Thither wretchedness calls together more people than ever attend a Queen's drawing room, to trade with the Rothschilds of Rag Fair. The scene is perfectly indescribable and overwhelming, and far exceeds in sublimity and effect any Regatta or Lord Mayor's day which London wealth can get up. It is hardly a wonder that some philosophers, having seen both, should think it an easier problem to abolish wealth than poverty. Many rich Jews, such as Sir Moses Montefire, and others, perhaps ashamed of the ditch where, in this or a previous generation, their own fortunes were born, have tried with all their might to abolish poverty's Sunday Rag Fair, but found it too hard for them. In a country where a bishop has $50,000 or $100,000 a year and a brewing Christian makes even more than that, I believe it an impossibly.

ASSOCIATION OF IDEAS.

Bishop Stillingfleet tells us a story of a clergyman who was eagerly engaged in a fox chase, when the fox took to earth, on which he cried out gentlemen, I must leave you. This puts me in mind that I have a corpse to bury at four o'clock this evening and I fear I shal be an hour too late."

DEATH.

Death is indeed the disturber of every man's felicity. An ugly shadow that darkens the brightest noon; a frost that defies swaddling clothes, and the glow of summer. It is the great horror of every fancy, the great agony of every heart. The pitiless, pursuing, tireless and unsated hungerer, whose maw seems to expand as it feeds, whose thirst grows with the rush of the fountain that slakes it. A discord shuffling between all our harmonies; a cloud black and baneful in the sky; a wind bitter and fierce over the waters; a thick slimy mist in the air and sand-waste on the earth, wherever we turn. No submission nor bribe, no flattery nor oblation, no prayer nor threatening can avert him. He knows no time, no ceremony, no fear, and no remorse. The king and the beggar, the rich and the poor, the tyrant and the slave, have his favor alike. Sleepers on velvet cushions, in dungeons, upon the rack, or in the filth of holes, claim the roll-call of death. He carries a dark lanthorn, whose teper-wick is fed by the light of souls struggling through pale faces toward Eternity! He is in the air, in the earth, in the sea, on the gleam of the sword, and in the foam that sparkles the rim of the wine cup! The winged Mercury of all "leperous distilments"—poison, murder, plague and famine. The extinction of races is his inheritance, the wail of the world his music, its agony his banquet. He has his pastime picking bones, strangling infants, idiots, dwarfs and grown man, but his holidays are held on battle fields, in massacres, and he delights in inquisitions, headsmen's blocks and fandangoes under the gallows. He is the genius of graveyards, the god of worms. He snatches the king from his crown, the victor from his wreath, the judge from his ermine, and the bishop from his mitre. The hearth is made desolate by him, and the altar reft of its worshippers. Lovers, and children, and friends are parted at his nod. Even the poor miser, who has pined and suffered a life time, is robbed from his gold. There is no expectancy he will not cut off, no honor he leaves undisputed, no seal unbroken. He even envies the fool the carriage of his carcase! And yet, Death has some good points. Even his indiscriminacy is not without credit. He takes the whip from the tyrant, and the chain from the slave. He relieves the beggar from his rags, the sick man from his pain, and the weeper from his grief. He opens dungeon doors, breaks down prison walls, and lets the captive go free. He is the avenger of innocence, the protector of weakness, and the mocker of injustice. He teaches the peasant the true value of his fields, the merchant of his goods, the money-lender of his gold. He rights the wrong, wipes out distinctions of blood, and proves the equality of men. Death is a sterling Democrat, a leveler without stint and by measure, and withal a righeous impartial and unflinching judge. Death stands by to ward off dishonor, the leah, and all worse infirmities than himself. While he is a tyrant, he is also a drudge and a slave. We can force our burthens upon him, and he cannot escape. He is bound to serve the beggar as well as the prince. He cannot choose a moment's labor, but round and round, with wan cheeks, goes to his task, the fit pack-horse of mankind. He feels no ferocity, for he has no will—commits no atrocity because he is a tool. His office is only negative, his term within period, and his end annihilation. After all, Death is not such a grim gaunt fiend He saves as many buds as he blights flowers, and he does either from obedience rather than instinct. I neither fear nor love him more than any other servant of Destiny!

C. D. S.

What's your capital?' asked an Englishman of an American recently in London. The reply was—'Our capital? it is that which levels mountains, builds cities' establishes empire, and extends republics—energy, industry, and indomitable courage.'

From the New Orleans Picayune.

THE LAST OF THE ILLINOIS.

BY CHARLES LANMAN.

Starved Rock is the unpoetical name of a singular spot on the Illinois river, about eight miles south of Ottawa. It is a rocky bluff rising from the margin of the stream to the height of more than a hundred feet, and is only separated from the main land by a narrow chasm. Its length might probably measure two hundred and fifty feet. Its sides are perpendicular, and there is only one point where it can be ascended, and that is by a narrow stair-like path. It is covered with many a conelike evergreen, and in summer, encircled by luxuriant grape and ivy vines, and clusters of richly-colored flowers. It is undoubtedly the most conspicuous and beautiful pictorial feature of the sluggish and lonely Illinois, and is associated with the final extinction of the Illinois tribe of Indians. The legend, which I listened to from the lips of a venerable Indian trader, is as follows:

Many years ago, the whole region lying between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi was the home and dominion of the Illinois Indians. For them alone did the buffalo and antelope range over its broad prairies; for them did the finest of rivers roll their waters into the lap of Mexico, and bear upon their bosoms the birchen canoe, as they sought to capture the wild water fowl; and for them alone did the dense forests crowding upon these streams shelter their unnumbered denizens.

In every direction might be seen the smoke of Indian wigwams curling upwards to mingle with the sunset clouds, which told them tales of the spirit land.

Years passed on, and they continued to be at ease in their possessions. But the white man from the far east, with the miseries that have ever accompanied him on his march of usurpation, began to wander into the wilderness, and trouble to the poor red man was the inevitable consequence. The baneful "fire water," which was the gift of civilization, created dissensions among the savage tribes, until, in process of time, and on account of purely imaginary evils, the Pottawattomies, from Michigan, determined to make war upon the Indians of Illinois. Fortune, or rather destiny, smiled upon the oppressors, and the identical rock in question was the spot that witnessed the extinction of an aboriginal race.

It was the close of a long siege of cruel warfare, and the afternoon of a day in the delightful Indian summer. The sunshine threw a mellow haze upon the prairies, and tinged the multitudinous flowers with deepest gold; while in the shadows of the forest islands the doe and her fawn reposed in perfect quietness, lulled into a temporary slumber by the hum of the grasshopper and wild bee. The wilderness would wore the aspect of a perfect sabbath, but now, in the twinkling of an eye, the delightful solitude was broken by the shrill whoop and dreadful struggle of bloody conflict upon the prairies and the woods. All over the country were seen the dead bodies of the ill-fated Illinois, when it was ordered by Providence that the concluding skirmish between the hostile parties should take place in the vicinity of Starved Rock.

The Pottawattomies numbered near three hundred warriors, while the Illinois tribe was reduced to about one hundred, who were mostly aged chiefs and youthful heroes—the more desperate fighters having already perished, and the women and children of the tribe having already been massacred and consumed in their wigwams. The battle was most desperate between the unequal parties.

The Illinois were about to give up all for lost, when, in their frenzy, they gave a defying shout and retreated to the rocky bluff. From this, it was an easy matter to keep back their enemies, but alas! from that moment they were to endure unthought-of suffering, to the delight of their baffled yet victorious enemies.

And now to describe in words the scene that followed, and was prolonged for several days, were utterly impossible. Those stout-hearted Indians, in whom a nation was about to become extinct, chose to die upon their strange fortress by starvation and thirst rather than surrender themselves to the scalping knife of their exterminators. And, with a few exceptions, this was the manner in which they did perish. Now and then, indeed, a desperate man would lower himself, hoping to escape, but a tomahawk would cleave his brain before he touched the ground or water.

Day followed day, and those helpless captives sat in silence and gazed imploringly upon their broad, beautiful lands, whilst hunger was gnawing into their very vitals. Night followed night, and they looked upon the silent stars, and beyond, to the home of the Great Spirit, but they murmured not at his decree. And if they slept, in their dreams they once more played with their little children, or held converse with their wives, and roamed the woods and prairies in perfect freedom. When morning dawned it was but the harbinger of another day of agony; but when the evening hour came, a smile would sometimes brighten up a haggard countenance; for the poor, unhappy soul, through the eye of an obscure faith, had caught a glimpse of the spirit land. Day followed day and the last lingering hope was utterly abandoned. Their destiny was sealed, and no change for good could possibly take place, for the human blood-hounds that watched their prey were utterly without mercy. The feeble, white-haired chief crept into a thicket and there breathed his last; the recently strong bodied warrior, uttering a protracted but feeble yell of exultation, hurled his tomahawk upon some field below and then yielded himself up to the pains of his condition; the blithe form of the soft-eyed youth, parted with its strength, and was compelled to totter, fall upon the earth and die. Ten weary, weary days passed on, and the strongest man and last of his race was numbered with the dead: and a glorious banquet was presented to the eagle and the raven.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) SEPTEMBER 24 1847. NO. 21

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—if not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Every one subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisments, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr. R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

From the Monthly Sun

Paddy's unfortunate Journey to Market.

A barefooted son of Hibernia, and an exceedingly ragged one, withal, was one day as is said of the little old woman.

"Going to market, his eggs for to sell."

On an occasion so important, he deemed it necessary to put on all his finery, the chief of which was, a red woolen comforter for his neck, (not mentioning the "bottle o'comfort" in his pocket,) On his way he fell in with a brood of goslings, accompanied by their dam, and the old gander. The consequences was, that the old gander and his wife, to speak politely, having a very delicate perception of colors in general, and of red in particular, were highly offended at Pat's display of finery, so inimical to their ideas, and kicking up a most unearthly noise with malice aforethought, they commenced an attack on Pat's defenceless toes. Immediately the poor fellow began to dance a queer sort of hornpipe, much like the antiquated custom of bears dancing on hot plates. The reason was, Pat, in his perplexity, had a basket of eggs in his charge; and although it is a difficult matter to dance in fetters, yet, surely no impartial advocate of the art will deny, that to dance with eggs without breaking them, is no mean performance, and requires no little skill. How Pat contrived to do it, remains a profound mystery; some think that he visited a mesmerizer that morning; others say that he carried a charm about him. However this may be, he did it, and did it fairly—our veracity demands that this should be clearly stated and understood. It is the more wonderful, as he was considered the fairest clown in an Irish jig, that ever hopped the tune of a fiddle. But "too much of a good thing is good for nothing," and Paddy found that too much repetition of an arduous feat, is too severe a strain on the physical constitution; or in other words, causes too vast a consumption of the vital economy. It became necessary then, to change his tactics So, seizing a handful of stones, he began pelting the goslings at a distance. This enraged the old folks, and they renewed the attack on Paddy's toes with increased violence. Pat believing that his safety entirely depended on his dexterity fired away with amazing energy, and down came gosling after gosling.—At this juncture the farmer appeared

"Murther and ouns, what are ye killing my goslings for?"

"Botheration!" ejaculated Pat, embracing the opportunity thus presented, to breath a little, and pulling out a handful of straw from the basket, he wiped the perspiration off his face "Sure, sir, I was in bodily danger; and so was my eggs."

"But why, you spalpeen was you killing the goslings for?"

"In self-defence, sure!" replied Pat, breathing more freely.

The sorrow a haporth o'harm the darlints did ye," said the farmer; looking pitifully on the dead bodies in the road.

"Well, sure their father and mother did sir."

"Then why did'nt ye attack them, ye devil's whelp ye?"

"Be me soul, sir, I never thought of that. But sure, an it please yer, I'll not forget that same the next time."

"Its a mortal sin for ye Pat, to be the death of the little creatures for the fault of the old ones."

"Devil a bit, misther O'Moor. Sure Fathe O'Falix says, the fault o'the father shall be visited on the childer" Pat squinted as he gave this astounding dogma for he thought it was another.

"Och! o mighty deal ye know about the canons o'the church, Pat. Sure, it was the tinth generation, as was said; and them goslings is only the first generation; and thats why they're so tinder, and fetch such a price at market; it is"

Pat was beaten with his own weapons. He archly said, "Sure, thin, misther O'Moor, it's mighty sorry I am for the trouble I've caused ye; but, ant its a fact sir, them yallow chickens has been a power o'throuble to me."

And he walked off with his eggs, leaving the farmer to gather up the dead As Paddy walked off, the farmer shook his fist and shouted.

"Sure a judgment 'll come on ya for this."

Patrick escaped from Mr O'Moor, without having suffered any bodily pain, began to congratulate himself on his good luck.

"Och! its better manners, Mr. O'Moor 'll teache his goslings afther this, I'm a thinking. The little yellow bastes that I killed he'll be afther keeping in the house now, and not letting decent people be plauged to death. Be the saints!" cried Pat, in consternation And well he might; for an infuriated bull was running after him in no measured pace.

"Och! help! help!—misther O'Moor's judgement is afther me!"

Under the lively impression that the predicted judgment of Mr. O'Moor was really at hand, he very philosphically concluded to run a race with the Fates. And he he did run. If he danced well for the gander, he ran better for the bull; for Pat knew how to run as well as any man in Kilkenny.

The bull got so close on the poor fellow, that he ejaculated, "Och! the judgment, Och! the yallow chickens!"

Fortunately for Pat, a tree was in his course he instantly turned it, and the bull in trying to do the same, came "full drive" again the tree, perfectly stunning himself. But what deprived the bull of activity, gave Pat a greater supply of the material; and soon he had much the best of the race. Being the first on record who ever ran against Fate, and beat her fairly. Pat got fairly out of danger; but he did'nt stop running though; for as we have said, he was famous for that. However, he met a friend, and then he stopped, just to be "gentle"

"Good-morrow, Pat. What's your hurry? Your'e early to market."

"Sure, a bull as big as the elephant at Baliwich Fair, was afther me," said Pat, nearly exhausted.

"Tare an ouset but a fine brade of a bull he must h' been at that," exclaimed the friend,

Yes. And be the——but that 'ould be wicked, sure. He was within the toss of a button of giving me—"

"A toss in the tree;" suggested the friend.

"No, Mikey; but as I was going to say, only you stopped me He came within the toss of a ha'penny o'sending me to heaven."

"What a blessing that 'ould been!" exclaimed Mikey, delighted with the thought.

"What going to heaven without absolution! —think o'that, Mikey. Its herrifferous!" replied Pat in holy horror.

"Ah, you're right, Pat. And sure yez was meant fo a preast; but yez was spoilt in ther making"

Pat felt complimented, and continued, "Besides, Mikey, to go to heaven and not to leave a haporth for masses for your sowl's salvation."

"But sure, Pat, if the bull had sent ye up, ye need'nt a' taken the eggs along; and they'd do. Would'nt they?"

"Be me sowl, Mikey, I niver thought o'that. Sure ye know I'm throubled with waek mimory. How I wish the bull had run harder and catched me up."

"It's a burning shame, Pat. There always is something tha robs a poor man of his blessings when they're coming. It is'n so with the rich."

"Don't you see?" says Pat "that's why Father O'Falix says a rich man can't inter the kingdom of heaven; because they don't have the tribulation that poor men do."

Thrue for you, Pat; so good-morning; I shall be at market soon myself. Good-morning to you."

The friends parted, and soon Pat and his eggs arrived safe and sound at market. Here he saw a crowd round a poor woman; and his gallantry taking alarm, he supposed they were taking advantage of a poor defenceless creature. Unfortunately for Pat's gallantry, defenceless and dissolute were to him synonymous terms. Breaking into the crown, he cried,

"Arrah! bies, shame on yez, acting in this scandalous way with a poor, dissolute woman."

Not appreciating Pat's kind intentions, the little vixen's eye flashed daggers at her benefactor.

"Och, now, shame, taking advantage of a poor dissolute woman!," repeated Pat.

"A dissolute woman!" screamed the termagant. "Och, hone! Will nobody take me part against this spalpeen calling me dissolute, who's been always a vartuous woman, and had fourteen childers by me last husband! God bless him!"

This appeal was all-powerful; and seizing the the basket of Pat, the crowd pelted its precious contents most lavishly at the poor fellow's head. Pat for his life, he could not comprehend the true cause of this condition of affairs.

"For the love o'the saints!" roared Pat, "is this the fun ye'd be afther? Won't nobody give me a shelalah? It's so long since I've had a fight that I am blue mould for want of a bating".

Mikey was close by, and he thrust a black thorn-stick into his friend's hand Pat was himself again; and so deftly his shelalah flew about, that he broke the head of one of his persecutors in a trice. This made a general clearing.

"Hurrah! hurrah! Where's the bye can face me now?" roared Pat, twirling his shelalah over his head.

Just at this critical moment, when Pat was winning victories, two policemen laid their hands on him

"Sure sors, it wasn't you I meant at all, at all! Was it Mikey?"

But Mikey was not to be found.

Pat was escorted with all due ceremony, to the magistrate's and there accused of insulting a poor woman by attacking her character, and of breaking the peace in divers manners; all of which was proved by abundant witnesses.

"Sure, you're honor, I did'n insult the poor woman at all, at all. I called her a dissolute woman, yer honor."

"Why, the knave confesses it," said the astonished magistrate

Pat was fined five shillings; and in default of payment, was to be sent to the house of correction. When at his leisure, Pat began seriously to think.

"O-h! I see how it's come!" he exclaimed, "It's misther O'Moor's judgment. Its's all for killing the yallow chickens."

From Africa's Luminary.

TO THE LADIES OF LIBERIA.

Wherever the influence of civilization and christianity prevail: the digniy of the female character delopes itself, and is raised to its proper level; her worth appreciated and acknowledged; so much so, that it has been a subject of doubt with some, which of the sexes exerted the greater influence in community. However it is an acknowledged fact, that the prosperity of a nation, depend much upon her, who has the first mould of the infant mind, who stamps the first impression on his heart, which "grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength."

Was not the influence which the mother of Washington exerted on her illustrious son, felt and acknowledged? and the mother of Franklin, did much in the formation of the character of that justly celebrated philosopher; "who drew down the thunder bolts, and played with lightning." May we not as ladies of the Commonwealth of Liberia, do much in carrying out the principals embodied in the new constitution.—Should we not feel, and deeply too, the responsibilities now resting upon us, as an independent Republic; and whenever our eyes rest upon that beautiful and "lone star," with her graceful, and appropriate stripes, floating in the breeze; may we admire the peculiar providence of God, in placing us here, where we may enjoy that Liberty, and Independence, we have so long desired.

May it speak with a voice which must be acknowledged, "what hath God wrought."

May we who are mothers, guard the morals of our sons, by strictly inculcating the principles of our holy religion, and early imbuing their minds, with this truth, "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." Let us warn them of the danger of evil associations; for "evil communications corrupt good manners." The third chapter of Proverbs, furnishes a summary of what constitutes true greatness. Let its principles be imprinted upon the tablets of their memories. May they be eminently qualified to fill any important office, which may be committed to their trust.

And may our daughters too, be trained to regard virtue as their brightest jewel; and may it in truth be said of them, "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellent them all."

LIBERIA.

September 3rd, 1847.

THE FOLLY OF DISCONTENT.

Suppose thyself in as great sadness as ever did load thy spirits! wouldst thou not bear it nobly and cheerfully, if thou wast sure that within a certain space some excellent fortune would relieve thee, and enrich thee, and recompence thee, so as to overflow all thy hopes desires and capacities? Now then, when a sadness lies heavy upon thee, remember that thou art a Christian, designed to the inheritance of Jesus. Or have they taken all from me? What now? Let me look about me: they have left me the sun, and the moon, fire and water, a loving wife and many friends to pity me, and to relieve me; and I can still converse; and unless I list they have not taken away my merry countenance and my cheerful spirit, and a good conscience; they have still left me the providence of God, and all the promises of the gospel, and my religion and my hopes of Heaven, and my charity for them, too, and still I sleep and digest, I eat and drink, I read and meditate, I can walk in my neighbor's pleasant fields, and see the varieties of natural beauties, and delight in all that God delights—that is, in virtue and wisdom, in the whole creation, and in God himself. And he that hath so many causes of joy, and so great, is very much in love with sorrows and peevishness, who loves all these pleasures, and chooses to sit down upon his little handful of thorns —Ibid.

From the Orator's Guide.

LEGISLATIVE POWER.

It were highly to be wished, that legislative power would direct the law rather to reformation than severity; that it would appear convinced, that the work of eradicating crimes, is not by making punishments familiar, but formidable. Instead of our present prisons, which find or make men guilty, which incase wretches for the commission of one crime, and return them, if returned alive, fitted for the perpetration of thousands, it were to be wished we had, as in other parts of Europe places of penitence and solitude, where the accused might be attended by such as could give them repentance if guilty, or new motives of virtue if innocent. And this, but not the increasing punishments, is the way to mend a state: nor can I avoid even questioning the validity of that right, which social combinations have assumed, of capitally punishing offences of a slight nature. In cases of murder, their right is obvious; as it is the duty of us all, from the law of self-defence, to cut off that man who has shown a disregard for the life of another. Against such all nature rises in arms: but is is not so against him who steals my property. Natural law gives me no right to take away his life, as by that the horse he steals is as much his property as mine. If, then, I have any right, it must be from a compact made between us, that he who deprives the other of his horse shall die But this is a false compact; because no man has a right to barter his life, no more than to take it away; as it is his own. And, next, the compact is inadequate and would be set aside, even in a court of modern equity, as there is a great penalty for a very trifling convenience since it is far better that two men should live, than that one man should ride. But a compact that is false between two men, is equally so between an hundred, or an hundred thousand; for as ten millions of circles can never make a square, so the united voice of myriads cannot lend the smallest foundation to falsehood. It is thus that reason speaks: and untutored Nature says the same thing. Savages, that are directed nearly by natural law alone, are very tender of the lives of each other; they seldom shed blood but to retaliate former cruelty.

Our Saxon ancestors, fierce as they were in war, had but few executions in times of peace; and in all commencing governments that have the print of nature still strong upon them, scarce any crime is held capital.

It is among the citizens of a refined community that penal laws, which are in the hands of the rich, are laid upon the poor. Government, while it grows older, seems to acquire the moroseness of age; and, as if our possessions were become dearer in proportion as they increased, as if the more enormous our wealth the more extensive our fears, our possessions are paled with new edicts every day, and hung round with gibbets to scare every invader.

Whether is it from the number of our penal laws, or the licentiousness of our people, that this country should show more convicts in a year, than half the dominions of Europe united! Perhaps it is owing to both; for they mutually produce each other. When by indiscriminate penal laws a nation beholds the same punishment affixed to dissimilar degrees of guilt, from perceiving no distinction in the penalty, the people are led to lose all sense of distinction in the crime, and this distinction is the bulwark of all morality: thus the multitude of laws produce new vices, and new vices call for fresh restraints.

It were to be wished, then, that power, instead of contriving new laws to punish vice, instead of drawing hard the cords of society till a convulsion come to burst them, instead of cutting away wretches as useless, before we have tried their utility, instead of converting correction into vengeance, it were to be wished, that we tried the respective arts of government, and make law the protector, and not the tyrant of the people. We should then find that creatures, whose souls are held as dross, only wanted the hand of a refiner; we should then find that wretches, now stuck up for long tortures, lest luxury should feel a momentary pang, might, if properly treated, serve to snow the state in times of danger; that, as their faces are like ours, their hearts are so too; that few minds are so base as that perseverance cannot mend; that a man may see his last crime without dying for it; and that very little blood will serve to cement our security.

VICAR OF WAKEFIELD.

Emancipation in the British West-Indies...No. I.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

There are few passages in the English language more replete with the poetry of eloquence than the narrative by Thome and Kimball, of the manner in which the slaves of Antigua received their freedom. The Parliament of Great Britian, after a long and arduous conflict, had passed the act of Emancipation. The last night of July, 1834, had arrived, and as the sun went down behind the waves of the Caribbean sea, there were eight hundred thousand slaves in the British West Indies, and before the sun should again gild the Eastern horizon, the chains of their long bondage were to be sundered for ever,

As the evening preceding their liberation cast its twilight over the island, the slaves were seen, dressed in their best attire, hastening along the various footpaths of the plantations, through the valleys, and over the hills, to their places of worship, to keep their night watch—to offer their evening sacrifice, and their morning orisons. "The spacious chapel of Saint John's," say Thome and Kimball, was soon filled with candates for liberty. All was animation and eargerness. A mighty chorus swelled the song of expectation and joy. And as they united in prayer, the voice of the leader was drowned in universal acclimation of thanksgiving and praise and blessing and honor and glory to God, who had come down for their deliverance. In such exercises the evening was spent, until the hour of twelve approached. The minister then proposed that when the clock on the cathedral should begin to strike, the whole congregation should fall upon their knees and receive the boon of freedom in silence. Accordingly as the loud bell tolled its first note, the immense assembly fell prostrate on their knees. All was silence, save the quivering, half-stifled breath of the struggling spirit. The slow note of the clock fell upon the multitude. Peal on peal, peal on peal, rolled over the prostrate throng, in tones of angel voices, thrilling among desolate chords and weary heartstrings. Scarcely had the clock sounded its last note, when the lightning flashed vividly around, and a loud peal of thunder roared along the sky,—God's pillar of fire and trump of Jubilee. A moment of profoundest silence passing,—then came the burst! They broke forth in prayer. They shouted. They sang Glory! Hallelujah! They clapped their hands, leaped up, fell down, clasped each other in their free arms, cried, laughed, and went to and fro, tossing upward their unfettered hands,—but high above the whole there was a mighty sound, which and anon swelled up. It was the utterings, in broken Negro dialect, of gratitude to God.

After this gush of excitement had spent itself, and the congregration became calm, the religious exercises were resumed and the remainder of the night was occupied in singing and in prayer, in reading the Bible and in addresses from the missionaries' explaining the nature of the freedom just received, and exhorting the free people to be industrious, steady, obedient to the laws, and to show themselves in all things worthy of the high boon which God had conferred upon them. Such was the affectionate and religious gratitude which the gift of freedom awakened in the Negro breast.

The succeeding day, the first day of their emancipation, was passed as a sacred jubilee. There were no intemperate carousals; there were no riotous mobs sweeping through the city, spreading terror and devastation through the country, but the rejoicing freemen assembled in their churches, with their pastors, who with martyr zeal, had suffered and toiled for them, and offered to God the incense of their thankful hearts.

In the excitement of this vast change, when the slaves, though ignorant, though degraded, were casting off the intolerable burden of ages of oppression, and exulting in their untried liberty, it is not known that a single drop of blood was shed, that a single blow was struck, or that a single outrage was committed. All remembrance of past wrongs appeared to be for ever obliterated, and joy and gratitude were the only emotions which were cherished in the hearts of the emancipated. "History," says Dr. Channing, "contains no record more touching, than the account of the religious tender thankfulness which this vast boon awaked in the Negro breast."—New-York Tribune

LITERARY VARIETIES.

Pray, Mr. Betterton (asked the good Archbishop Sancroft of the celebrated actor,) can you inform me what is the reason you actors of the stage, speaking of things, imaginary, affect your audience as if they were real; while we in the church speak of things real which our congregations receive only as if they were imaginary?—Why, really, my lord (answered Betterton,) I don't know; unless it is that we actors speak of things imaginary as if they were real, while you in the pulpit speak of things real as if they were imaginary—Edinburgh Review.

THE MOORISH ANIMAL.—The Moor, especially when somewhat advanced in life is a magnificent, lion-like creature. He is rather above the middle size, stout built, large of limb, with great display of muscle; noble features, approaching to the Roman, an ample brow, a dark eye, and (in jockey phraseology) uncommonly fine action; lifts high, steps out well, and sets down his foot with a firmness, of tread peculiar to himself. With turbaned head his loins girt with a red sash, wide white trousers, and naked limbs, as he moves along with his free, unfettered stride, he presents a remarkable contrast to the close buttoned European, with his artificial manner and confined garb.

"That sewed up race—that button'd nation,
Who, while they boast their laws so free,
Leave not one limb at liberty;
But live, with all their lordly speeches,
The slaves of buttons and tight breeches."

The striking peculiarity of the Moor is his lion-like appearance. Often have I stood and gazed with admiration on a group of these swarthy turbaned children of the sun, squatted crosslegged, pipe in mouth, solemn and silent under shelter, of the parapet wall of the King's Bastion, and wondered at the singular resemblance which their grave countenance strongly marked features, and air of slave age dignity, gave them to the lord of the desert in repose. Place them under a palm tree, beside the Diamond of the Desert, and Rubens would glory in the picture.—Rev. W. Robertson's Visit to the Peninsula.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF THE ENGLISH AMBASSADOR.—The Princess Caroline (Princess of Wales) much embarrassed on my first being presented to her—pretty face—not expressive of softness—her figure not graceful—fine eyes—good hand—tolerable teeth, but going—fair hair and light eyebrows, good bust—short, with what the French call "des epaules imperti nentes." Vastly happy with her future expectations.—Diaries and Correspondence of James Harris, First Earl of Malmesbury.

THE FIRST INTERVIEW.—I immediately notified the arrival to the King and prince of Wales; the last came immediately. I, according to the established etiquette, introduced (no one else being in the room) the princess Caroline to him. She very properly, in consequence of my saying it was the right mode of proceeding, attempted to kneel to him. He raised her gracefully enough,) and embraced her, said barely one word, turned round, retired to a distant part of the apartment, and calling me to him said, "Harris, I am not well; pray get me a glass of brandy." I said "Sir, had you not better have a glass of water?"—upon which he, much out of humor, said, with an oath, "No; I will go directly to the Queen," and away he went. The princess left during this short moment alone, was in a state of astonishment; and, on my joining her, said, "Mon Dieu! est ce que le prince est toujours comme cela! Jele trouve tres gros et nullement aussi beau que son portrait." I said his royal highness was naturally a good deal affected and flurried at this first interview, but she certainly would find him different at dinner.—Ibid.

METHOD IN MADNESS.—In the first illness, when Willis, who was a clergyman, entered the room, the King asked him, if he, who was a clergyman, was not ashamed of himself for exercising such a profession. "Sir," said Willis our Saviour himself went about healing the sick." "Yes" answered the King, "but he had not 700*l* a year for it.—Ibid.

PITT READING THE DESPATCHES OF TRAFALGAR.—On the receipt of the news of the memorable battle of Trafalgar (some day in November, 1806) I happened to dine with Pitt, and it was naturally the engrossing subject of our conversation I shall never forget the eloquent manner in which he described his conflicting feelings, when roused in the night to read Collingwood's despatches. Pitt observed, that he had been called up at various hours in his eventful life by the arrival of news of various hues; but that, whether good or bad; he could always lay his head on his pillow and sink into sound sleep again. On this occasion, however, the great event announced brought with it so much to to weep over, as well as to rejoice at, that he could not calm his thoughts, but at length got up, though it was three in the morning.—Ibid.

A STORY OF LORD ELDON, NOT PARTICULARISED IN HIS ANECDOTE BOOK.—The chancellor, Lord Eldon, had mentioned to the prince the Princess of Wales, and the hopes her dignity and comfort would be attended to. The prince's reply was, "He was not the sort of person who let his hair grew under his wig to please his wife." On which the chancellor respectfully, but firmly, said, "Your royal highness condescends to become personal—I beg leave to withdraw; and accordingly bowed very low and retired. The Prince, alarmed at this, could find no other way of extricating himself than by causing a note to be written the next day to Lord Eldon, to say that the phrase he made use of was nothing personal, but simply a proverb—a proverbial way of saying a man was governed by his wife. Very absurd of Lord Eldon, but explained by his having literally done what the prince said.—Ibid.

THE NIGHT BEFORE WATERLOO.—As the storm continued without any sign of abatement and the night was setting, in orders were given to pile arms; but no man was on any account to quit his position. Under such circumstances, our prospect of a night's lodging was anything but cheering; the only provision we had being the remnant of the salt provision served out on the 18th. Having disposed of that, we began to consider in what way to pass the night; to lie down was out of the question, and to stand up all night was equally so. We endeavoured to light some fires, but the rain soon put them out, and the only plan we could adopt was, to gather armsful of the standing corn, and, rolling it together, make a sort of mat on which we placed the knapsack, and sitting on that each man holding his blanket over his head to keep off the rain—which was almost needless, as we were so thoroughly drenched; however, this was the plan generally adopted and maintained during the night.—Sergeant Morris's Recollections of Military Service.

THE NIGHT AFTER WATERLOO.—While we had any daylight left, I went among my wounded comrades, tendering all the assistance in my power; binding up some of their wounds and placing them in more easy positions. All their cry was for "Water;" but, alas, we had none to give them; we were ourselves suffering the most intolerable thirst, from the heat of the weather, the exertion and the salt provisions. The cries and shrieks of the poor creatures would have been dreadful in the night if we could have heard them; but the continued discharge of the artillery during the battle had so affected the drums of the ears that we could scarcely hear anything for two or three days afterwards but the roaring of cannon.—Ibid.

PLEASANT CONFIDENCE.—Having returned to our regiment, and distributing the usual allowance of spirits to the company, I had three canteens full left; being the allowance for those men who had been placed hors-de-combat. I took an extra drop with my old friend Sergeant Burton; and he ordered me to keep some to drink together after the battle. I told him I thought very few of us would live to see the close of that day; when he said, "Tom, I'll tell you what it is, there is no shot made yet for either you or me."—Ibid.

THE MUSTER.—The only captain we now had left invited us from the shelter of the bank, to follow him in an attack on about three thousand of the French infantry. About a dozen of us accepted the invitation; and such was the destructive fire to which we were opposed, that we had not advanced more than six or seven paces before every one of the party except me and my brother was either killed or wounded. We carried the captain back to the shelter of the bank; where we found our first major, who had not been with us during the day, having been attached to the staff. He ordered the captain to be taken to the rear, and then caused us to be mustered. We numbered two officers and seventy men: the batallion, when we entered the field the first day, had twenty-nine officers and five hundred and fifty men. My worthy friend Burton gave me a hearty slap on the back and said, "Out with the grog, Tom! did I not tell you there was no shot made for you or me!"—Ibid.

A WINTER'S NIGHT: LONDON.—The streets were empty. Pitiless cold had driven all who had the shelter of a roof to their homes: and the north-east blast seemed to howl in triumph above the untrodden snow. Winter was at the heart of all things. The wretched, dumb with excess of misery, suffered in stupid resignation the tyranny of the season. Human blood stagnated in the breast of want; and death, in that despairing hour losing its terrors, looked in the eyes of many a wretch a sweet deliverer. It was a time when the very poor barred from the commonest things of earth, take strange counsul with themselves, and in the deep humility of destitution, believe they are the burden and offal of the world. It was a time when the easy, comfortable man, touched with the finest sense of human suffering; gives from his abundance, and, whilst bestowing, feels almost a shame that, with such wide-spread misery circled round him, he has all things fitting, all things grateful. The smitten spirit asks wherefore he is not of the multitude of wretchedness; demands to know for what especial excellence he is promoted above the thousand, thousand starving creatures; in his very tenderness for misery, tests his privilege of exemption from a woe that withers manhood in man, bowing him downward to the brute. And so questioned, this man gives in modesty of spirit—in very thankfulness of soul. His arms are not cold formal charities, but reverent sacrifices to his suffering brother. It was a time when selfishness hugs itself in its own warmth, with no other thoughts than of its many pleasant gifts—all made pleasanter, sweeter, by the desolation around; when the mere worlding rejoices the more in his warm chamber because it is so bitter cold without; when he eats and drinks with whetted appetite, because he hears of destitution prowling like a wolf around his well-barring house; when, in fine, he bears his every comfort about him with the pride of a conqueror. A time when such a man sees in the misery of his fellow-beings nothing save his own victory of fortune—his own successes in a suffering world. To such a man the poor are but the tattered slaves that grace his triumph. It was a time, too, when human nature often shows its true divinity, and with misery like a garment clinging to it, forgets its wretchedness in sympathy with suffering; a time when in the cellars and garrets of the poor are acted scenes which make the noblest heroism of life—which prove the immortal texture of the human heart, not to be wholly searched by the branding iron of the torturing hours; a time when, in want, in anguish, in throes of moral agony, some seed is sown that bears a flower in heaven.—Jerrold's Skilling Magazine.

THE HALLS OF THE MONTEZUMAS.

Montezuma II. ascended the Mexican throne A. D. 1502, at the age of twenty-three, before Mexico had been discovered by Europeans. He died 29th June 1520, in the 42d year of his age, of wounds inflicted by the Spanish discoverers, whom he had invited to his royal palace. Historians agree in admiring his character,

On ascending the throne, not content with the spacious residence of his father, he erected another, much more magnificent, fronting on the plaza mayor of the present city of Mexico. So vast was his great structure, that, as one of the historians informs us the space covered by its terraced roof, might have afforded ample room for thirty knights to run their courses in regular tourney. His father's palace, though not so high, was so extensive that the visitors were too much fatigued in wandering through the apartments, ever to see the whole of it. The palace were built of red stone, ornamented with marble, the arms of the Montezuma family (an eagle bearing a tiger in its talons) being sculptured over the main entrance. Crystal fountains, fed by great reservoirs on the neighboring hills, played in the vast halls and gardens, and supplied water to hundreds of marble baths, in the interior of the palace. Crowds of nobles and tributary chieftains were continually sauntering through the halls, or loitering away their hours in attendance on the court. Rich carvings of wood adorned the ceilings, and beautiful mats of palm leaf covered the floors. The walls hung with cotton richly stained, the skins of wild animals, or gorgeous draperies of feather work, wrought in immitation of birds, insects and flowers, in glowing radience of colors. Clouds of incence from golden censors, diffused intoxicating odors through splendid apartments, occupied by the nine hundred and eighty wives and five thousand slaves of Montezuma.

He encouraged science and learning, and public schools were established throughout the greatest part of his empire. The city of Mexico in his day, numbered twice as many inhabitants as at present, and one thousand men were daily employed in watering and sweeping its streets, keeping them so clean, that a man could traverse the whole city with as little danger of soiling his feet as his hands. A careful police guarded the city. Extensive arsenals, granaries warehouses, an aviary for the most beautiful birds, menageries, houses for reptiles and serpents, a collection of human monsters fish ponds built of marble and museums, and public libraries, all on the most extensive scale, added their attractions to the great city of the Aztecs. Gorgeous tempels—in which human victims were sacrificed, and their blood baked in bread, for their bodies dressed for food, to be devoured by the people at religious festivals—reared their pyramidal spires far above the highest edifices. Thousands of their brother men were thus sacrificed annually. The temple of Maxtili, their war god, was so constructed that its great war going sounded to battle, roused the valley for three leagues around, and called three hundred thousand armed Azecs to the immediate relief of the monarch. So vast was the collection of birds of prey, in a building devoted to them, that five hundred turkeys, the cheapest meat in Mexico, were allowed for their daily consumption. Such were the Montezumas!" The summer residence of the monarch, on the hill of Chapoltepec, overlooking the city, was surrounded by gardens of several miles in extent, and here were preserved until the middle of the last century, two statutes of the Emperor and his father. The great cypress trees, under which the Aztec sovereign and his associates once held their moonlight revels, still shade the royal gardens. Some of them fifty feet in circumference, are several thousand years old, but are as green as in the days of Montezuma, whose ashes, or those of his ancestors, render sacred in the eyes of the native Mexicans, the hill of Chapoltepec. Natural decay and a waning population, now mark the seat of power of the great Montezuma.—Plain dealer.

SUICIDES BY BRUTES.

It is related in the travels of Monsieur Violet, the truth of which is avouched by Captain Marryatt, that he saw horses, that had been tyrannized over by other horses, and treated by the whole herd as outcasts, commit suicide. When tired of their Paria life they walk round and round some large tree, as if to ascertain the degree of hardness required, measure the distance, and, darting with furious speed against it, fracture their skulls, and thus get rid of life and oppression both together. He says that squirrels sometimes persecute one among their number till he destroys himself. "One day, while we were watching this outcast of a squirrel, we detected a young one slowly creeping through the adjoining shrubs; he had in his mouth a ripe fruit; at every moment he would stop and look as if he was watching, just as if he feared detection. At last he arrived near the Paria, or outcast, and deposited before him his offering to misery and old age. They were, however, perceived by the other squirrels, who sprang by dozens upon them. The young one, with two bounds, escaped; the other submitted to his fate. I rose---all the squirrels rose except the victim; but that time, contrary to his habits, he left the shrub, and slowly advanced to the bank of a river, and ascended a tree. A minute afterwards we observed him at the very extremity of a branch projecting over the rapid waters, and we heard his plaintive shriek---it was his farewell life and misery."---Boston Daily Journal.

INDIAN IDEAS.

At the congress of Lancaster, in 1774, between the government of Virginia and the Five Nations, the indians were told, that if they would send some of their young men to Virginia, the English would give them an education at their college. An Indian orater replied to this offer as follows: "We know that you highly esteem the kind of learning taught in those colleges, and that the maintenance of our young men while with you would be very expensive to you. We are convinced, therefore; that you mean to do us good by the proposal, and thank you heartily. But you who are wise must know, that different nations have different conceptions of things, and you will not therefore take it amiss, if our ideas of this kind of education happen not to be the same with yours. We have had some experience of it; several of our young people were formerly brought up at the colleges of the northern provinces; they were instructed in all your sciences. But when they came back to us, they were bad runners; ignorant of every means of living in the woods; unable to bear either cold or hunger; knew neither how to build a cabin, take a deer or kill an enemy; they spoke our language very imperfectly; were neither fit for hunters, warriors or councellors; they were totally good for nothing. We are, however, not the less obliged by your kind offer, though we decline accepting it; and to show our grateful sense of it if the gentlemen of Virginia, will send us a dozen of their sons, we will take great care of their education, instruct them in all we know, and make men of them."---Cist's Advertiser.

DIGNITY OF MAN.

MANKIND have ever been prone to expatiate in the praise of human nature. The dignity of man is a subject that has always been the favourite theme of human; they have declaimed with that ostentation, which usually accompanies such as are sure of having a partial audience; they have obtained victories, because there were none to oppose. Yet from all I have ever read or seen, men appear more apt to err by having too high, than by having too despicable an opinion of their nature; and by attempting to exalt their original place in the creation, depress their real value in society.

CITIZEN OF THE WORLD.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, SEPTEMBER 21 1847

The prospect of our domestic affairs, though not presenting a very flattering appearance to the indifferent observer, is, nevertheless, very cheering to those who have taken the care to examine them. The people seem to be alive to the importance of exerting themselves, to improve their circumstances.—On every side we notice the march of industry, and a willingness among the people to cultivate the soil. The banks of the beautiful St. Paul's interespersed with comfortable cottages and well cultivated farms, represent truly, that the inhabitants are comfortably situated. Less cannot be said of the industry of the inhabitants on the Stockton Creek.—New Georgia continues to be foremost as an agricultural settlement, and though the "Virginia settlement," may in a year or two take the lead of her, it must not be supposed that there is any diminuation of labor on the part of the New Georgians—but that her competitor gets the advantage by having a larger working population. Monrovia presents a thriving appearance--the wharves are well lined with crafts varying in size from seven tons to thirty tons. Warehouses are undergoing repairs and Speculaters are busily traversing the wharves. Dwelling houses are being erected, workmen of every grade are employed, and contentment appears to be the order of the day. Marshall, with a very small population, in comparison with the other villages, is, notwithstanding, well entitled to consideration. It is supposed that its inhabitants excel all others in the growing of rice. Its trade is very small, excepting in that of lime, which can be had in large quantities. If an addition of one hundred enterprising colonists could be added to its population, the trade and importance of the place would increase considerably.

The county of Grand Bassa is not behind Monsterrado County in industry. Bexley, an agricultural settlement on the St. John's is, in a prosperous condition. The inhabitants give their whole attention to the cultivation of their farms. Edina has considerable trade; very few of the inhabitants are engaged in agriculture. It has some half dozen encouraging coffee farms. Foreign soap will find no market here, as the people make more soap than is necessary for their consumption, which is not the case elsewhere in Liberia. Bassa Cove is certainly the most important village in the county. The people are industrious and enterprising. Several crafts of respecptable sizes, have been built by them in the last year; and the trade is rapidly increasing. The majority of the inhabitants are engaged in the cultivation of the soil, and some very pretty coffee farms may be seen here.

The County of Sinoe is the smallest county. The people are very industrious—the greater part of them are living on their farms from which they derive their principal support. Considerable trade is carried on at Greenville. Population only is wanted to make this county equal in importance to her sister counties.

We have attempted a brief statement of the condition of Liberia, and in doing so, we see much to encourage and very little to discouarge us. We feel assured that the present state of Liberia, is decidedly a favourble one; for the last six months the people have supported themselves mainly from what they raised on their farms. We are now ready and willing to welcome to our land a large number of industrious and enterprising families—they will find every inducement to labor—a soil capable of yielding the richest productions with very little exertion— a permanent home, free from oppression, for themselves and children. What more is required?

CAPE MOUNT.

We have often heard it asked, "Why the authorities do not intercede for Grand Cape Mount?" As the report of its having been transferred away by the Chiefs, is flatly contradicted by the Chiefs themselves.—And that Her Majesty's Naval Officers on this station, in their intercourse at that place, look upon the territory as being under the entire control of the African Chiefs." This we know to be the fact, because such information has been given by the Chiefs themselves to the authorities--Nevertheless, they manifest an unwillingness at the present time to sell the country; they have invited our people to settle among them—to open schools for the education of their children---to make trading establishments: and they promise to be responsible for the good conduct of their people. We know that several of our citizens have already gone to Cape Mount, and we doubt not but that they were gladly welcomed, and that the Chiefs will give them all the protection in their power.

The Launch.

On the 9th, instant the fine sloop Independence, belonging to H. Teage Esq:, was launched from his wharf. She is a fine looking craft, and we hope she will prove a serviceable one.

Slavers Captured!

By the arrival of the schooner "Louisa" from Sierra Leone, we are informed that within a period of three months, Her Majesty's cruisers have captured and sent into that port for adjudication some nineteen slave vessels,—some of them with living cargo on board. All of them were condemned, and would be cut up.

The Salute!!

On the 18th, inst: at noon, the U. S. Brig "Boxer," M. H. Bell Esquire commanding, saluted the Flag of the Republic with twenty one guns.

SELECTED EXTRACTS

PLAN FOR EMANCIPATION.

A Virginia slaveholder writes in the New York Observer. that he has adopted the following plan to deliver himself from slavery.

"I opened an account with each one of my slaves charging him with the amount of his purchase—this bears a running interest of 6 per cent. At the end of each year from the date of the purchase, I credit him with the value of his year's service, (ascertained by the current value of like services in my neighborhood,) these credits are also entitled to a running interest of 6 per cent. per annum. When the credits to the slave thus entered with their seeming interest, amount to the sum I paid for him with its interest, he is free. Or, in other words, I allow my negroes to purchase themselves by the value of their labor, and at the price I pay for them.

"I respectfully suggest, if such a system was generally pursued by the owners of slaves it would hasten that great desideratum—the banishment of slavery from our country—and my word for it, it will not make the slave less valuable to his master while he continues such."—Colonization Herald.

SLAVERY IN AFRICA.

In that part of Africa called the Gold Coast of Guinea, domestic slavery is carried on to a very great extent: and is, of course, attended with many evils. There is one small state near the Kong Mountains, which is tributary to the King of Ashanti; and I was told, while in Kumasi, that this state alone sent to the King every year, as part of their tribute, three thousand slaves of the finest young people that could be obtained. These must al be sent by a stated time, or else a heavy fine is laid upon them.

Besides this tribute, there is a regular trade carried on by the Ashantis in slaves They proceed from Ashanti to the far interior, and purchase slaves in great numbers. These are brought back to Kumasi, and are sold as domestic slaves, either to those Ashantis who may want them, or to those tribes who occupy that part of the country that lies between Ashanti and the sea. These poor people are bought and sold just as a farmer buys and sells his horses. The usual value of a slave in Kumasi is from thirty to forty five dollars. The women, provided they are strong, are worth from five to seven dollars more than the men. These poor creatures are sometimes treated with great severity, although this is not always the case. The master has great power over them; for although he may not kill them when he likes, yet if his slaves offend him, he may punish them so as to cause their death. I have frequently known them to have their ears, noses or lips cut off. I well remember one poor boy who, for tasting his master's dinner, had his lips so burnt, that when they healed, his mouth was so contracted that he could scarcely speak. And instances of this kind are of very frequent occurence. Indeed they are hardly secure of their lives for a day. If a men is only suspected of a crime, they have no great difficulty in finding him guilty by means of their fetish. A person accused has to pas though a kind of ordeal, which sometime consistts of drinking a very nauseous draught, cpmposed by the fetishman of the bark of a particular tree. The man is either condemned or acquitted according to the manner in which it opperates, They have no other modes of finding out guilty persons, which are all very foolish.

It is Christianity only that can put a stop to slavery in Africa. Trade has been carried on for ages on that part of the coast of which I am now speaking, and England has sent out several vessels to that cost for years; yet neither trade nor armed vessels have put it down. Nothing less than the gospel can overcome it. My young readers will easily anticipate the conclusion to which I would lead them. I need only say, therefore, that I hope they will do all in their power to send that greatest of all blessings, the gospel, to Africa.—

Rev. Robert Brooking

ORIGIN OF SLAVERY IN THE U. STATES.---The Rev. Dr. Bangs is publishing in Zion's Herald a series of articles on slavery. In his last he alludes to the origin of slavery in this country, stating that it was in 1640 that a Dutch man-of-war entered James river and offered twenty negroes for sale. This was the beginning of negro slavery in Virginia, and though its progress was slow, owing to the disgust with which the blacks were viewed, yet it gradually increased, as the people found that slave labor was profitable in the cultivation of the soil, until laws were finally enacted declaring that "all servants, not being Christians imported into the country by shipping, shall be slaves," and also that their "conversion to the Christain faith doth not make free." Dr. Bangs states further on the authority of Mr. Bancroft, that about 800,000 human beings were taken from Africa to be sold in perpetual slavery in this country, before the memorable era of 1776, when the American Congress passed its notable degree---a decree which has had but little effect to prevent the slave trade.

Hook being told of the marriage of a political opponent. exclaimed, "I am very glad to hear it." Then suddenly added with a feeling of compassionate forgiveness, "And yet I don't see why I should be, poor fellow, for he never did me much harm."

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile business under the firm of Samuel F. Mc Gill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MC GILL,
R. S. MC GILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

NOTICE.

To all whom it may concern; The Court of Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions, orders that in the case of Anthony D. Williams Plaintiff, v. s. Frederick Lewis Defendant, in account of the late J. Ashmuns estate, do not appear at its next session in the Town of Monrovia, to be held on the first Monday in November 1847, to show cause why judgment should not be rendered up against him: and if no one appears, the Court will be in duty bound to render judgment against defendant.

By order,
W. W. STEWART,
Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions.

MARRIED.

In this town, on the 9th inst. by Rev. A. D. Williams, Mr. Lewis Fernando; to Miss Maria Curdbote of this place.

DIED.

In this town, on the 11th, inststant, Mrs. Frances Haynes, consort of Mr Thomas Haynes, after a severe illness of a few hours. Her end was peace.—Com.

At Millsburgh, on the 12th inst, Miss Farena Voton, daughter of Mr. Joseph Voton, after a protracted illness. Miss V. was a member of the M. E. Church in that place. She departed this life, in the triumphant hope of a blessed immortality.—Com.

On the 13th instant, in the settlement of New Orleans, Miss Elizabeth Gray, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Gray, deceased.—Com.

In Millsburgh, on the 15th inst. Mr. Joseph Voton, after a severe illness of a few hours. Mr. V. was a member of the M. E. Church in that place.---Com,

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon.	Lb.	8	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	33 1-3
Beef, cargo No. 1.	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Bafts,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	25	30
Boards,	1000/t	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	12 1-2	18 3.
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12 1-2	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 1 3
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	1 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1-3	34
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter.	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2
Romauls	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none	100
Sugar loaf	Lb.	13
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Sind	"	none
Satin stripe	P.	3 00
Tobacco	1000lbs.	9 00	3 75
Wash hand bowls	Dozen	2 00	18 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	18 00
			20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

NAVAL.

Sept. 17. United States Brig Boxer, H. H. Bell Esq. commander, from St. Paul de Loando.

The United States Brig Boxer Sailed 20th Sept. for Port Praya.

Sept 9. British schooner Louesa——master, from Sierra Loone.

" 12. British Brig Timbuctoo, Dyer master, from Bristol.

" 24. Dutch brig Tora, Frahmann master, from windward.

DEPARTURES.

Sept. 15. Liberia Schooner Perseverance, Jones master, for leeward.

" " Liberia sloop Independence, T. Barbour master, for leeward

" " Liberia Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, for leeward.

" 18. British schooner Louesa——master, for leeward.

" 21. British brig Timbuctoo, Dyer master. or leeward.

POETRY.

From the Y. Y. Knickerbocker.

WOMAN'S TRUE GLORY.

I am no more a child; the days are gone,
The lovely days which distance brightens now,
When fondness clustered round my being's dawn,
And read the future on my smoother brow,
And shielded me from harm, I knew and recked not how.

None stand between me and the cold, cold world!
I've launched me out upon a treacherous sea,
Beside the one I love, and closely furled
Our little span of snowy sail must be,
To meet the bitter blasts of rude adversity.

He whom I love stands ever at the helm:
Erect and firm, far looking to descry
If mountain wave be rolling on to whelm
Our fragile bark, where softly cradled lie
His dearest ones, this little boy and I

So when the skies are blue the water calm,
We gently sail, beneath his watchful care,
Delighted with the breeze that breathes like balm,
And together with the soft and curling hair
Around thy brow, my darling bold and fair!

But when the storm arises, and the spray
Of this most vexed and billowy sea of life
Filleth the air, I may not turn away,
And hide me from the fury and the strife,
For I am standing forth, a mother and a wife!

And I must fold my baby to my breast,
And shelter him as others shielded me;
And at my husband's side unshaken rest,
To bear our lot, whatev'er that lot may be
With patient hope and high serenity.

Such is a woman's duty; and her aim
Should be to find in this her joy and pride.
She may not ask the uncertain breath of fame
To scatter her poor deeds a far and wide;
A queen within the circle of her home,
There let her reign, and never wish to roam!

NELL.

Newburgh, November 1846.

MISCELLANEOUS

A COQUETTE.

In what words shall I describe a being of whom every one has a different impression? The coquette! Is she not of all climes, of all complexions, of all styles of beauty and of grace that have ever manifested themselves on the earth? What two persons will agree as to the traits of her portrait? As well might I attempt to describe the rainbow by one of its hues, and expect all mankind to say the description was right, as to give an idea of the coquette by one specimen alone. Yet like artists, I must draw from a single model, the most perfect of its kind. The discerning will recognise in it the type of a wide class of beings, as the florist at once names the rose, though it be crimson, or amber, or white; or the tulip, no matter what are the lines and the hues of the stripes.

The coquette! I see her yet. She is in deep mourning; but the black is brilliant with bugles here and there, and shines with exquisite lustre from contrast with the alabaster shoulders that rise above it. Her air is pensive and downcast, and though her cheek is radiant with a warm blush, some lingering traces of indisposition seem hovering about her as if to mark her kindred with mortality. Her hair, of the deepest jet, is set out on each side of the face in wide bands, as you sometimes see when a dealer would heighten the value of his stone, a diamond of price, placed in a deep border of black setting. Behind, her hair is gathered into a plain Grecian knot, and from it fall some weepers in black, which seem continually endeavoring to kiss the neck beneath it, which resist their blandishments. Her eyes are fringed—gracious order of Providence!—by long lashes, which are cast downwards, revealing only momentary glimpses of the liquid and lustrous orbs that confound you when you encounter the full rays of splendor. The lips are remarkable for their ripe fullness, and their transparent skin; there are volumes of wooing eloquence in their coral life. Her person is admirable for its roundness, and when she rises for its symmetry. Her foot—her foot you never see; timid and shy it retreats always beneath the shelter of her full and flowing dress, for the coquette is true to her nature, to the very points of her toes The coquette is known to you before you have distinguished her in the circle: she has been too constant in her affection and her care, but she is recovering, that is good news, from a fever. From a fever? Do not be alarmed—there is no need of infection—from a fever of the nerves! You stand apart respecting her sorrow! Chance throws you together. You address her timidly! What a thrill of rapture pervades your frame when you find she knows your name—and she has had your signature in her possession. She has read what you have written!—she thinks it admirable! You are overwhelmed by flattery from such lips. You stand disconcerted and abashed, and then she wakes up from the beauty of her repose and shows you, author, novelist, critic, as you are, how poor are all your fancies, how faint your dreams, how colorless your words, in comparison with her own language. You are roused by her animation and her frankness. You strive, in turn, to entertain her, though your efforts seem awkward to yourself! You get rid of commonplace topics—you have done with the merits of mutual friends. You suffer her to catch glimpses of your own soul, you tell her whatever you think will please her by its novelty. She adores music, though she does not play, at least but indifferently; and you murmur to her the last inspiration of Donizetti—conceived, you alone know, in what a sad and darkened state—more sweet and dreamlike than the serenade in "Don Pasquale." Her eyes are fixed on a painting and you tell her of the last rough sketch of Horace Vernet—the last figure Delaroche has imagined of his idol, Napoleon. You have heard but that morning a lively story of the beautiful Marquise de la S—— and you pour it into her ear. You describe the last plot of Dumas, received from his own lips, before he have written a word of the dialogue of the scenes.

Have you pleased her? You cannot tell; her eyes are exhilarated—her lips smile. You follow the direction of her looks with trembling, and see with what a delighted air she has wafted half a dozen enchanting words—no more—from the tips of her tapering fingers to a handsome youth at a distance. You have still ears for her wit, but you cannot answer her! She laughs at your gravity—she has found you out for a dull pretender; she vows you have been drinking some of that stupid heady English port, and that she would not have spoken to you had she known it. Yet, when you are about to retire, she alone of the circle extends to you her hand, delicately cased in its spotless and embroidered glove, with the charming frankness of an old acquaintance, and with an expression like sunlight—for this VISHNU of society smiles as she sacrifices the victims at her feet—hopes, should she ever meet you again, you will be in a less stolid mood, and will endeavor to answer her with something new. Something new! Is your mind, then so destitute of fancy?—have you been praised for a poet without cause? Ungrateful and ungenerous girl! Should I ever meet you more, I will surround you with old officers of the revolution, who will prose to you of battle they took no part in—with capitalist whose souls are in railways and railway scrip—with dull politicans, who swear by Thiers and Guizot—with coxcombs whose world knows no wider circumference than the rim of their own hats and whose ideas are limited in extent by the tips of their own boots—with little story-tellers, who are always the heroes of their own tales—with those intolerable newsmongers who will repeat to you in the evening item by item, the contents of the Debats and the Presse, which you read whilst you were at breakfast, and give you a mangled version of the last criticism of Jules Janin, as if you had not that already by heart. I will not even wait so long for my revenge. You challenged me to write of you in my next article. I will obey you in a way you little think of. I will present your portrait, drawn with the strictest truth—that truth which your flatterers have never dared to whisper in your ear; and while you read you shall confess—without being able to dispute the accuracy of one stroke in the picture—"Here, at least, is something new."—From the French of Jules Janin

CHINESE SURGERY.

A work has recently been re-published in London, giving an account of a long residence in china, with a description of the manners, prejudices, and institutions in the Celestial Empire. The book is written by a learned Catholic priest—Father Ripa, and was first published in Naples, being thought worthy of a careful translation. Many portions are intensely interesting and full of instruction. We quote the Father's curious account of the mode of treatment to which he was subjected by a Chinese surgeon, for a severe wound he received in his head by a fall from his horse:

"When I recovered my senses, I found myself in a house, but every thing appeared dark and indistinct, and I felt as if I had fallen from my horse two months before. The Emperor sent me a Tartar surgeon, for he and his Court were fully persuaded that for falls Tarter surgeons were better than Europeans. And, to confess the truth, although the mode of treatment was of a barbarous description, and some of the remedies appeared useless, I was cured in a very short time. This surgeon made me sit up in my bed, placing near me a large basin filled with water, in which he put a thick piece of ice, to reduce it to a freezing point. Then stripping me to the waist, he made me stretch my neck over the basin, and, with a cup, he continued for a good while to pour the water on my neck. The pain caused by this operation upon those nerves which take their rise from the piamater, was so great and insufferable, that it seemed to me unequalled. The surgeon said that this would staunch the blood and restore me to my senses, which was actually the case; for in a short time my sight became clear, and my mind resumed its powers. He next bound my head with a band, drawn tight by two men, who held the ends, while he struck the intermediate part vigorously with a piece of wood, which shook my head violently, and gave me dreadful pain. This, if I remember rightly, he said was to set the brain, which he supposed had been displaced. It is true, however, that after this second operation my head felt more free.

A third operation was now performed, during which he made me, still stripped to the waist, walk in the open air, supported by two persons; and while thus walking, he unexpectedly threw a bowl of cold freezing water over my breast.—As this caused me to draw my breath with great vehemence, and as my chest had been injured by the fall, it may be easily imagined what were my sufferings under this infliction. The surgeon informed me that if any rib had been dislocated, this sudden and hard breathing would restore it to its natural position. The next proceeding was less painful and extravagant. The operator made me sit upon the ground, then assisted by two men he held a cloth upon my month and nose till I was nearly suffocated. 'This, said the Chinese Esculapius, by causing a violent heaving of the chest, will force back any rib that may have been bent inwards.' The wound in the head not being deep, he healed it by stuffing it with burnt cotton. He then ordered that I should continue to walk much, supported by two persons; that I should no sit long, nor be allowed to sleep before ten o'clock at night, at which time and not before, I should take a little hifan, that is, thin rice soup. This continued walking caused me to faint several times; but this had been foreseen by the surgeon, who had warned me not to be alarmed. He assured me that these walks in the open air, while fasting would prevent the blood from settling on the chest where it might corrupt. These remedies were barbarous and excruciating; but I am bound in truth to confess that in seven days I was so completely restored as to be able to resume my journey into Tartary."—Herald of Religious Liberty.

IGNORANCE AND CRIME.—We take the following from Douglas Jerrold's paper of the 17th ultimo. "According to the returns of the Registrar-General, one-half of the adult population of England and Wales are unable to write their names; and Mr. Porter states that, during the years 1839, 1840, and 1841, out of 735,788 persons married, 303,836 affixed their mark to the marriage register by way of signature. In Mr. Tremenher's report to the Committee of Council on Education, he observer that, in Monmouthshire and Wales, 48 males in 100, and 69 females in 100, were unable to write their names; while in Cheshire and Lancashire 40 per cent: of males and 65 per cent: of females were similarly disqualified. In his inquiries into the state of crime in the Northern division of Lancashire, Rev. Mr. Clay, referring to the prisoners admitted into the House of Correction, at Preston during the year 1844, ascertained that of 1022 persons committed, 49 per cent: were unable to name the months of the year: 39 per cent: were ignorant of the name of the reigning sovereign; 42 per cent: knew not the import of the words 'virtue,' 'vice,' 'righteousness,' &c.; while 13 per cent: were unable to count one hundred. Incredible as it may appear, among the opinions as to Her Majesty's name, seventeen were in favor of 'Prince Albert,' while thirteen supposed it to be 'Elizabeth.' Their religious ignorance was still more deplorable, for 36 per cent had never heard of the name of the Saviour. We might multiply similar facts, but those adduced are sufficient to show the necessity of some plan being adopted to educate the great body of the people. Our boasted claim of being at the head of civilized Europe will hardly be conceded so long as one-half of our adult population can neither write nor read, and our material wealth will only be regarded as the exponent of an ingenious system of industrial slavery."—N. Orleans Weekly Delta.

THE TWO ROSES—Being with my friend in a garden, we gathered each of us a rose. He handled his tenderly, smelt it but seldom and sparingly. I always kept mine to my nose or squeezed it in my hand; whereby in a very short time it lost both its color and sweetness, but his still remained as sweet and fragrant as if it had been growing on its own root. The roses, said I, are true emblems of the best and sweetest enjoyment in the world, which, being moderately and cautiously used and enjoyed, may for a long time yield sweetness to the possessor of them but squeeze them too hard, they quickly wither in our hands, and we lose the comfort of them. It is a point of excellent wisdom to keep the golden bridle of moderation upon the affections.—Ibid.

JUSTICE.

JUSTICE may be defined, that virtue which impels us to give every person what is his due. In this extended sense of the word, it comprehends the practice of every virtue which reason prescribes, or society should expect. Our duty to our Maker, to each other, and to ourselves, are fully answered, if we give them what we owe them. Thus justice, properly speaking is the only virtue: and all the rest have their origin in it.

The qualities of candour, fortitude, charity, and generosity, for instance, are not in their own nature virtues; and, if ever they deserve the title, it is owing only to justice, which impels and directs them. Without such a moderator candour might become indiscretion, fortitude obstinacy, charity imprudence, and generosity mistaken profusion.

ESSAY 6.

HOSPITALITY.

HOSPITALITY is one of the first christain duties. The beast retires to his shelter, and the bird flies to its nest; but helpless man can only find refuge from his fellow creature. The greatest stranger in this world was he that came to save it. He never had an house, as if willing to see what hospitality was left remaining amongst us.

VICAR OF WAKEFIELD.

COTTON MATTRESSES.—Mr. Ellsworth, in his Report as Commissioner of Patent, says, "Cotton is the cheapest, most comfortable and most healthy material for bedding that is known in the civilized world." The following is his computation:—Cost of Hair-Mattress, at 50c. per lb, 30 lbs, from $15 to $20; do. Wool do., 30c. per lb., $11 to $12; do. Feathers do., 30c. per lb., 40 lbs., $12; do. Moss do. $12; do Cotton do., 30c. per lb., with cost of tick ing, at 12 cents per yard, labor, thread, &c, $6 65. The advantages, says the Report, of this bedding are:—"Vermin will not abide in them; there is no grease in them as in hair or wool they do not get stale and acquire an unpleasant odor, as feathers often do. Beside the advantages in all these particulars they are in many cases medicinal, it being a known fact that raw cotton worn on parts affected is one of the best and most effectual cures for rheumatic affections.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) OCTOBER 1 1847. NO. 22

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI B. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLARS.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr. R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr. S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORTE Esq.

UNITED STATES

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia,	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	WM. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. WM. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

MEXICAN WAR.

SPEECH OF J. G. GIDDINGS.

We give a small portion of the speech of this honest, plain-dealing man, recently delivered in the House of Representatives at Washington, when the President's message was under consideration. The whole of his speech as usual, is clear, bold, and uncompromising:—

But, sir, what is the amount of money thus due to our people, for the recovery of which the President represents this war to have been commenced and carried on? I believe it is less than three millions of dollars. We have already expended more than thirty millions in this war; and, by this message, we are asked to appropriate twenty more. This vast expenditure is said to have been made with a view to extort three millions from Mexico. But this fifty millions is but a part of the pecuniary loss which the nation must suffer. The time of every man engaged in this war is lost, yea, worse than lost. The amount of injury to our commerce, and to the business of this country, by diverting the circulating medium from its legitimate channels, cannot be estimated. But the whole pecuniary damage constitues but a small portion of our real loss. The effect which this war is destined to exert upon the morals of our people is far more to be deplored than its effects upon property. Again: How can we estimate the anguish and suffering of our sick, and wounded, and dying soldiers? How shall we compute their agonies and despair? Go, count the graves of those whose lives have been sacrificed to recover this three millions of dollars. Then number the widows and the orphans, and ascertain their griefs, their poverty, their disappointed hopes, and blighted expectations. Add these to the whole loss and suffering which this war has brought upon our land. Then proceed to Mexico: form a catalogue of the crimes committed there by our troops, and ascertain the amount of pecuniary, physical, and mental suffering, inflicted upon her people. Find the sum total, and compare it with the three millions of dollars for which we are contending; strike the balance, and then judge of the policy and humanity of this war, and of those who sanction it.

But, sir, the Executive never assigned the non-payment of this money as a cause of war until after hostilities were commenced. Our troops had invaded Mexico. The battles of "Palo Alto" and "Resaca de la Palma" had been fought before this reason for commencing the war appears to have been discovered. It did not therefore, operate to bring on the war. It was an after-thought, subsequently brought forth to justify it. But here, again, the different parts of the message do not sustain each other. In the forepart of that document the author says, "Mexico commenced hostilities," and, in the latter part, he goes into a long argument to show that we had good cause for commencing the war, and tacitly admits that we did, in fact, commence it. But I have only time to touch upon some of the interesting points of the message. I have no opportunity, under this hour rule, to go into detail.

I have stated the amount of moneys already expended, and now asked, for carrying on this war.—The President avows his intention to hold the territory which we have conquered until Mexico shall repay us this expenditure. We have waged an unnecessary and unjust war upon a weak and defenceless republic. We have squandered untold millions in its prosecution; and now the President expresses his intention to rob Mexico of her territory, unless she repays the money we have so profusely spent. This we all know she can never do. The avowal, thereof, amounts to a declaration of the President's intention to render it a war of conquest. Indeed, we have abundant evidence of such intention.

During the darker ages, among the savage nations, such a war might have been tolerated; but it will surely be condemned by all Christian nations of the 19th century. Such a war is opposed to the sentiment of the age in which we live. Sir, I would as soon lend my vote to commence a system of national robbery or piracy, as I would to support a war commenced for the evident purpose of wresting from a neighboring government a portion of her territory. But how much Mexican territory does the President think it will require to indemnify us for our expenditure? How much land will he demand for the two thousand American citizens whose lives have been sacrificed in this war.

Again, Sir, are the President and his friends conscious that the public lands in the slave States have never paid the expenses of surveying and selling them? They have cost us forty millions of dollars more than we have been able to sell them for. Every acre has been an expense to us. Nearly the entire profits arising from the sale of lands in the free States has been expended to supply the expense of those in the slave States. Such will be the case with those acquired in Mexico. The more territory we get there the greater will be the loss. A standing army must be maintained to hold the people in subjection to our laws. With the expenses of the lands and maintenance of an army, burdens will be incured, that are to sit like an incubus upon the nation for coming generations. And the more territory we get the greater will be the expense. Under these circumstances, I leave it for the supporters of this war to determine upon the amount of territory it will require to satisfy us for the money we have paid out for its support.

A few days since, a political friend of the President in debate on this floor complained that the religious sentiment of the nation had been invoked against this war. Sir, every principle of our holy religion comes in conflict with this war. What Sir, will you talk to Christians about sending an army to invade a neighboring nation? To shoot down our brethren of Mexico upon their own soil? To storm their fortications, to cannonade their cities, to involve whole families, consisting of all ages and of both sexes, in those revolting scenes of blood and slaughter, which were witnessed at Monterey and at Tobasco? Can we expect Christians to remain silent while reading the dark list of damning crimes which have been committed upon a weak and distracted people, by those armed ruffians and murderers, who have been commissioned by this government to make war upon our fellow-beings on the other side of the Rio Grande? - - - - Is it expected that the religious sensibilities of our people will slumber in silence, while our nation thus "reeks with crimes which smell to heaven?" Will the President and his supporters smother the religious feelings of the nation? Will they silence the voice of those whose vocation is to proclaim "peace on earth and good-will to men?" It appears to me that moral darkness has spread over our land, or these things would not have passed by so silently. I regret to say that the clergy have not spoken on this subject as becomes the "minister of the gospel of peace." The history of the world shows that national crimes have ever been followed by national judgments. This government has hurried to premature graves, without any just cause, at least four thousand human beings, who had committed no crime; neither had they offended us, or our government. Many thousands in this government and in Mexico have been clad in mourning, and afflicted with the loss of husbands, brothers, and sons. And can we hope to escape the penalty so manifestly due for our national crimes? Do we expect that the immutable law of justice will be suspended or repealed, in order that our nation may pass unpunished? Sir, I would earnestly invoke every preacher of the gospel, every professor of our holy religion, every lover of his country, to put forth his utmost influence to stop this tide of crime, of physical and moral death, now rolling over Mexico.

But a most interesting question is soon to be presented to the members of this body. We shall in a few days be called on to provide the means for carrying on this war. To authorise the sending of more troops to that Mexican Golgotha, and to appropriate the money of our people to continue the crimes and murders now committed there. Sir, I speak for myself, and for my constituents, when I say, that no earthly power will induce me to vote away the life of a single soldier to carry on this attempt to subjugate Mexico, by butchering her people. No, Sir; were I to do it, my people would, in my opinion immediately call on me to resign my seat here, that it may be filled by one who would use his efforts to lustrate them from the guilt of this unholy war. I am aware that many of my political friends voted for the appropriations demanded at the last session. That vote was given under peculiar circumstances. We were not allowed time to compare views, or to discuss the propriety of the measure. Our troops were said to be surrounded by the Mexican forces, and liable to be cut off. I therefore can easily see why gentlemen should differ in opinions on the subject. But we are now placed under different circumstances. Our army having conquered one city after another, and one state after another, is now in the interior of Mexico, holding possession of her towns and states. We know that it is a war of conquest, commenced and carried on for the purpose of the dismembering of Mexico. Now, with all these facts before me, were I to vote for the appropriation of men and money to continue this wicked and murderous war, and to carry out these designs, I feel that I should make myself a party to it. I feel that I should become involved in the crimes and bloodshed of those we send there. That act must be done by others, if done at all. I dare not participate in it. I am aware that some, who view the war as I do, urge, that as the nation is now engaged in it, we ought to help to carry it forward by voting supplies of men and money. I do not see the force of the argument. If it be in fact a wicked and unjust war, it follows, that the longer it is carried on the greater will be the wickedness and the injustice of those who continue it. But it is said that to press the war with vigour will be the shortest mode of obtaining a just and honorable peace. If the war be unjust and dishonorable, I am wholly unable to discover how a vigorous prosecution of it, and a consequent increase of injustice and wrong, can, in the nature of things, be right or proper. On the contrary, every pang we inflict, every life we sacrifice in this miserable war, must increase our guilt, and consequently our disgrace. There is but one way for the friends of our country and of humanity to do. That is, to use our efforts to stop the war, to withdraw our army from Mexican territory, and to tender to her honorable terms of peace. . . . . I am aware that it is said by some that the war is popular. I know that to be an error, so far as concerns Northern Ohio, and such portions of other States as I have travelled in since this war has existed. Its advocates are few, and they are daily becoming less. The people can find no possible reason why their moral purity should be sacrificed by its crimes, or their pecuniary interests to its support. They can see no good cause why a debt should be contracted that shall rest upon their children, and perhaps on their children's children. But it is said that we must press the war or surrender up the conquests we have made. I reply, those conquests are robberies; and the sooner they are given up the better for our country.—Christian Volunteer.

REPUTATION

THE great are solicitous only of raising their own reputations; while the opposite classs alas! are solicitous of bringing every reputation down to a level with their own.

COLONIZATION AND EMANCIPATION, NO. III.

In our former numbers on this subject, we set forth the leading principles and arguments relied upon for emancipation of Slaves on Colonization principles, in the Southern States, and promised in our subsequent numbers, to strengthen the positions therein taken by facts and arguments directly bearing upon the subject.

We here present the introductory remarks of Dr. W. E. Channing, of Boston, to his chapter on the "Means of Removing Slavery," Char. Works, Vol. II. p. 106.

"How Slavery shall be removed, is a question for the slave-holder, and one which he alone can fully answer. He alone has an intimate knowledge of the character and habits of the slaves to which the means of emancipation should be carefully adopted. General views and principles may and should be suggested at a distance; but the mode of applying them can be understood only by those who dwell on the spot where the evil exists. To the slave-holder belong the duty of settling and employing the best methods of liberation, and to no other. We have no right of interference, nor do we desire it. We hold that the dangers of emancipation, if such there are, would be indefinitely increased, were the boon to come to the slave from a foreign hand, were he to see it forced on the master by a foreign power. It is of the highest importance that slavery should be succeeded by a friendly relation between master and slave; and to produce this, the latter must see in the former his benefactor and deliverer. His liberty must seem to him an expression of benevolence and regard for his rights. He must put confidence in his superiors, and look to them cheerfully and gratefully for counsel and aid. Let him feel that liberty has been wrung from an unwilling master, who would willingly replace the chain, and jealousy vindictiveness, and hatred would spring up, to blight the innocence and happiness of his new freedom, and to make it a peril to himself and all around him. I believe, indeed, that emancipation, though so bestowed, would be better than everlasting bondage; but the responsibility of so conferring it, is one that none as us are anxious to assume."

We have contended; that whatever be the scheme by which Slavery was brought to an end, it must be one in which slave-holders themselves must take a part and co-operate. Colonization is the only scheme in which they are willing to embark, as far as schemes have been presented. This agrees with Dr. C.

We have also asserted that Kentuckey, Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware were doing everything in their power to act by this scheme. As evidence of this we subjoin the following from a Kentucky paper.

The Hopkinshire Gazette publishes a memorial to the Legislature of Kentucky, praying that body to make an annual appropriation to the Kentucky Colonization Society to enable them to remove such of the eight thousand free people of color in this State, as are willing to go, to the colony of Liberia which has been purchased for them by the citizens of the State. We should be gratified to know that a similar memorial were circulated in every county in the State, and numerously signed by the friends of the scheme. Facts which are transpiring every day, only serve to deepen the impression that this is the only practicable scheme of benefiting this class of our population, which presents itself to the philanthropist at the present time.—Take the following resolutions passed at a meeting recently held in Mercer county, Ohio, the country to which the Randolph negroes were removed, as a sample of what the negro is to expect from the free States. The resolutions are said by the President and Secretary, to have been passed by a meeting that was large and respectable:

"Resolved,—That we will not live among negroes; as we settled here first, we are fully determined that we will resist the settlement of blacks and mulattoes in this county to the full extent of our means, the bayonet not excepted.

"Resolved, That the blacks of this county be, and they are hereby respectfully requested to leave the county on or before the first day of March, 1847, and in case of their neglect or refuse to comply with this request, we pledge ourselves to remove them 'peaceably if we can, and forcibly if we must.'

"Resolved. The we who are here assembled, pledges ourselves not to employ or trade with any black or mulatto person, in any manner whatever, or to permit them to have any grinding done at our mills, after the first day of January next."

Take also the recent vote in New York on the question of negro suffrage as another sample of the same feeling. The question was voted down by a majority of four to one.

The condition of the colored people in Philadelphia, where they have been free and had their churches and schools and various means of improvements for an age, may afford some light on this subject. A committee of most respectable citizens recently made an appeal in behalf of an institution for the benefit of the blacks. In their statement the following facts are presented:

"The committee say, that while the proportion of colored to white population in Philadelphia city and county, is 1 to 12; the ratio of colored to white rangers in Blockley Almshouse, on the third of January, was more than 1 to 7; and of the untried prisoners received into the county prison, in the last five years the proportion of colored was still greater, more than 1 to 2.

"If we comprise the eastern district of the State in our examination, we shall discover that while the proportion of colored to white population is as 1 to 23, the proportion of colored to white inmates of the Eastern Penitentiary, for the last sixteen years, has been as 1 to 2. viz: whites 1,367, blacks 693

"Had the number of white convicts received into the Penitentiary during the years above stated, been in proportion to that of the colored population of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, there would have been about 15,000, instead of 1 357 white inmates"

These are Christian States, and perhaps they are as good specimens of what in the present state of society may be expected to be done for the negro in this country as we can anywhere find. We undertake not now to discuss the question whether the feelings manifested be right or wrong. That is a question which must be answered by the parties exercising it to God and their own consciences. But the practical inference to be drawn from them is, that if we wish to benefit the free negro, we must remove him to a country where none of these adverse influences are operating upon him. The Kentucky Colonization Society has such a country in Kentucky in Africa. That society is now engaged in a laudable work of removing the free people of color to that land, and the object of the memorialists is to secure the aid of government in their noble work. If they succeed they will benefit Kentucky, they will benefit the negro himself, and they will bless Africa for all time to come. Who, then, will withhold his name and influence from so noble an enterprize!—Pres. Herald.—The Colonizationist.

From Liberia Advocate.

ON PARRYING CHARITABLE SUBSCRIPTIONS.

ADVICE FROM A FATHER TO A SON.

Dear Son:—The weakness of my feet since the last fit, still remaining, so that I cannot visit you, I continue writing, not only as an amusement to myself that may be of more lasting service to you, than verbal advice occasionally given.

In my three last, I gave you all the precepts that occurred to me, relative to getting; I shall now proceed to the topic of saving. And as the mad extravagance of the present age is charity, and you must meet with frequent temptations, and earnest solicitations, to squander your money in that way, I shall in the first place, give you some instructions in the art of parrying a charitable subscription.

The want of this necessary art has been a great misfortune to many people I could name to you. For, besides parting with their money against their will, they get the character of being charitable, which draws upon them fresh applications from other quarters, multiplying by success, and creating endless vexation.—And here I cannot help remarking the wisdom of that precept of our holy religion, which requires that if we do give alms, we should do it secretly; that the left hand may not know what is done by the right; that no one may be encouraged to ask for more. And this is so agreeable to sound human prudence, that even the unenlightened heathens could say bis dat qui cito dat; the English of which, as I am informed, is, he gives twice that gives readily; meaning, as I suppose, that if you are known to give readily you will soon be asked to give again.

Not that I would have you thought quite uncharitable neither, no more than I would have you thought poor and not able to give. The avoiding of these imputations, while at the same time you save your money, is the aim of the art I am about to instruct you in.

The first rule of this art is, to like the charity, but dislike the mode of it. Suppose now, for instance, that you are asked to subscribe towards erecting an infirmary or new hospital, you are not immediately to refuse your contributions; nor is it necessary, for you can say, "The design seems a good one, but it is new to you, and you would willingly take a little time to consider of it, because if you do any thing in this way, you like to do something handsome." This puts by the demand for the present, and before the solicitors call again, inform yourself of all circumstances of the intended situation; constitution, government, qualification of patients, and the like. then when all is to be placed in the fields, 'You think it would have been much better in the city, or nearer to the poor, and more at hand to receive them in case of accidents and their other distresses; and besides we have already hospitals enough in the fields.' If in the city, 'You can only approve of the fields, on account of the purer air so necessary for the sick.' If they propose to take in all poor patients from whatever quarter they come, 'You think it too general, and that every country, at least, ought to take care of its own.' If it is limited to the poor of the city or county, 'You disapprove of its narrowness, for the charity and benevolence like the sunshine, should be extended to all the human race.' While the collectors are endeavoring to remove these prejudices, you ply them with other objections of the like kind, relating to the constitution and management; and it is odds but some of your arguments appear strong and even unanswerable to the advocates for the project themselves; they will be sorry that things are now settled in a different way, and leave you with a high notion of your understanding, though they get none of your money.

The second rule is, to like some other charity better. Thus if they come to you for a contribution to the Magdalen house; 'You approve rather of the Asylum, it being much easier in your opinion to prevent vice than to cure it.' If they apply for the Asylum, then, 'What money you can spare for such purposes you intend for the Magdalen-house; the very name reminding you, that the conversion of prostitutes is a good and practicable work; but the necessity or utility of the Asylum does not appear so clear to you.'—Again, suppose your subscription asked to the Lying-in-hospital; then, 'You should like one that would be on a more extensive plan, and take the single as well as the married women; for very worthy young persons may unfortunately need the convenience of such an hospital, and the saving of a character you look upon to be almost as meritorious as the saving of a life: But if such a general hospital be proposed; then, 'You approve highly of the married women's and doubt whether a general one would not be rather an encouragement to lewdness and debauchery.' One instance more on this head. Suppose they urge you for a subscription to clothe the poor French prisoners; you are then to say, that, 'Charity begins at home; we have besides our own common poor, who are crying for bread in the streets, many modest housekeepers and families pining for want, who, you think should first be provided for, before we give our substance to those who would cut our throats. Or you are of opinion, that the brave fellows that fight for us, are now exposed to the hardships of a winter campain, should be first comforted or the widows and children of those who have died in our service, be taken care of. But should a subscription be proposed to you for these purposes, 'You are then of opinion, that the care of our own people is the business and duty of the government, which is enabled by the taxes we pay to do all that is necessary; but the poor French prisoners, deserted by their prince and country, have only our charity to rely on; common humanity points them out as proper objects of our beneficence; and besides, to visit the prisoners, to clothe the naked, be kind to the stranger and do good to our enemies, are duties among the strongest required by Christianity.

The third rule is, to insinuate (but without saying it in plain terms) that you either will contribute or have already contributed handsomely though you do not subscribe. This is done by the intimating, 'That you highly approve of the thing, but have made a resolution that your name shall never appear in a list of subscribers on such occasions; for that the world is apt to be very censorious, and if they see that a man has not given in accordance with their ideas of his ability, and the importance of the occasion, they say he is mean and niggardly; or if by giving liberally he seems to have set them an example they do not care to follow, then they charge him with vanity and ostentation, and hint, that from motives of that kind he does much more than is suitable to his circumstances.'

And then you add that your subscribing or openly giving, is not at all necessary; for that as bankers are nominated to receive contributions, and many have already sent in their mites, and any one may send in what they please, you suppose a few guineas from a person unknown will do as much good as if his name was in the list.' This will entitle you to the credit of any one of the sums by an unknown hand, or by N. N. or X. Y. Z. whichsoever they may think fit to ascribe to you.

The reason I would not have you say in plain terms that you have given, or will give, when you really have not, or do not intend it, is, that I would have you incur trespasses no more than debt unnecessarily, and be as frugal of your sins as your money; for you may have occasions for a lie in some other affair, at some other time, when you cannot serve your turn by an evasion.

Thus, my son would I have you exercise the great privilege you are endowed with, that of being a reasonable creature; to wit, a creature capable of finding or making a reason for doing or not doing anything, as may best suit its interest or its inclination.

And so referring other instructions to future letters, I recommend the rules contained in this as worthy of your closest attention; for they are not the airy speculations of a theorist, but solid advices drawn from the practice of wise and able men. Rules, by the help of which, I myself, though I lived many years in great business, and with some reputation as a man of wealth, have ever decently avoided parting to these modish plunderers, nor can I recollect, that, during my whole life, I have ever given anything in charity, except once, (God forgive me) a half-penny to a blind man—for doing me an errand.

I am my dear son,

Your affectionate Father,

GRIPUS.

A CALCULATION

The whole amount of money which had been received and expended by the American Colonization Society, up to January 1, 1846, was $611,862 87. Out of this sum, the coasts of Africa has been explored, the territory of Liberia purchased, a light-house or two erected, a Government house and several public buildings erected, the emigrants from this country transported and maintained six months in the country after their arrival, and furnished with medical attendance during that time; the salary of the Governor in Liberia and the whole current expenses of the Society, and all its agencies in this country, for thirty years, paid. The colonies now own land enough to accommodate a population as large as that now in Ohio. If the statement in regard to the cost of emigrants was true, those who have been transported would have cost the Society the sum of 1,207,000:—a sum nearly double its whole revenue up to the beginning of last year; while the truth is, but a part of the sum received and disbursed has been appropriated to that object.

But to show that in the hands of the Government, the whole work could be accomplished in a short time, and at comparitively a very small expense, we will here submit one or two statements on the subject.

First, in regard to the cost.

There are, in the United States, we will say, 3,000,000 of colored people bond and free.

To purchase 60 ships, $10,000 each, fitted for sea, would cost	$600,000
To furnish each family of five persons with provisions for their passage, would cost $50. For the whole number, at this rate, adding 6000, 000, for increase while the work is going on, viz: on 3,6000,000, would be	$36,000,000
Add, for incidental expenses,	500,000
Total cost	$37,100,000

But, secondly in regard to time.

The 60 ships will carry each 500 passengers a trip, and make three trips a year—making in the whole, 90,000 a year.

In 40 years, at this rate, the number will amount to 3,600,000. The whole number!!

Thus, in forty years, every man, woman and child, of the colored race, in America, could be transported to Africa, at an expense of less than one million of dollars a year. But suppose we still add $2,900,000, and make the sum forty millions one million a year, what is that sum compared to the ability of the nation and the value of the work to be accomplished! In forty years from this time our population will fall but little short of 70,000,000

But this estimate is far above what is really necessary in the hands of the Government, if we employ the ships of war, which are kept, in time of peace, either doing nothing, or in part employed crusing on the African coast. According to the terms of the Ashburton treaty of the United States with Great Britian, our Government is bound to keep up a squadron of eighty guns on the African coast, for the suppression of the slave trade. This will cost the Government according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Navy, $211,152, annually—more than one fourth of the sum required annually to carry on our scheme. Whereas, if our policy should prevail, the slave trade would be more effectually and forever banished, than by that system, with but a slight increase of present expenses.

But to place the subject in its worst possible light. Suppose the General Government and the several States should refuse, or neglect to "adopt any regulation on the subject;" what then is to become of our cherished scheme of African Colonization? In the first place, we remarked, we should be in no worse condition than we have been, thus far. In the second place, that we have many advantages in our favor, which, until now, we have never had, viz: What was at first a supposed truth, in regard to the capacity of the colored race for self-government, is now a demonstrated truth. So in regard to Africa and its advantages to the civilized man, and its suitableness as an asylum from oppression to the colored race of this land.

Again: In this country we have many advantages over the past. "Truth will out." The colored people have been fed up with the delusive idea, that some how or other, all their shackles in this land would be removed, and they would be the equal with the white man. But a few years will prove to them, that their condition, bad as it is, will grow worse! At present we have land enough and to spare. They are not crowded by an overgrown population. The demand for here labor is now above the supply. But there are about 250,000 foreigners annually pouring into our country from abroad; these make their way for the free States. Most of them are laborers: these are added to the same classes of our own country, will soon contend with the colored man strongly for every place of employment.—land will become scarce and high, a crowded population will regularly curtail the privileges of the poor of the country, and they will be the more oppressed from these causes, with others not enumerated.

While this is in progress here, Liberia will have advanced also. Her ships will be found in our ports, laden with coffee and the rich spices of her sunny clime. She will send us her palm-oil, dye-stuffs, lignumvitæ, mahogany, ebony, calm-wood, ivory, gold, and a thousand other valuable commodities. Information in regard to the prosperity and happiness of her citizens will be general, and the colored man here, as a natural result, will follow his interest—the love of "Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," will warm his energies so far into life, as to over-leap the prejudice of former days, and injurious counsels, and, by thousands and tens of thousands, they will flock to Liberia, and rejoice that God in his wise and gracious providence, had prepared for them a retreat so well suited to his interests. These will go at their own charges. Our system now possess a self-creating power, and although it may take time to develpe it, yet it is bound to succeed. For, with these developements, a few years, will bring thousands to our aid who have stood aloof.

But, once more: We are often asked, why does your system only propose to benefit, and colonize "the free people of color?" Why do you not colonize the poor slaves, also! For the simple reason that we have no power to do it. As long as the slave remains under the authority of his master, we cannot interfere with him. Then, "is not this system calculated to injure the slave and make his condition worse, by removing the free people of color and leaving them behind?" Or, in other words, we are often asked, "is this not a scheme of Southerners, the very objects of which is to fix more firmly upon the slave his bonds?"—Colonizatio nCerald.

COMMONWEALTH OF LIBERIA.—Messrs Editors.—It is already known, that the Directors of the American Colonization Society, at their last annual meeting, advised the people of Liberia so to amend their constitution, as to take into their own hands the appointment of their own chief magistrates, and all other powers of government heretofore exercised for them by the society. This measure was found to be necessary for the proper management of the foreign relations with Great Britain and other powers, which had inevitably grown up with the growth of the Colony and its commerce; and the fact that the Directors had not found it necessary, for many years, to veto any act of any department of the Liberian Government, encouraged the hope that it would be safe. It is also known that the Legislature of Liberia, at an extra session last summer, referred this question to the people and the Governor issued his proclamation, appointing a day for them to vote upon it in their primary assemblies.

I have this morning received a letter from Gov. Roberts, dated Monrovia, Nov. 9, in which he says: "The people of these colonies, by a solemn vote taken on the 27th ultimo, have decided in favor of independence, and have recommended the call of a convention, to draft a constitution for the Commonwealth. The legislature, at its annual session in January next, will order a convention and adopt rules for its government."

It will be seen by these dates, that the Liberians are proceeding in this matter with a deliberateness such as the importance of the occasion demands: and from other information communicated by Governor Roberts, I have reason to believe that their new constitution will be constructed on the soundest republican principles, and judiciously adapted to their circumstances.

This movement may have an important influence on emigration, as it will present Liberia to the minds of many free persons of color in a new and more inviting aspect: and if so, the Society may need a large increase of funds, to meet the increasing calls upon its treasury for aid in emigrating.

Gov. Roberts adds:—"The affairs of the colony are progressing in their regular order. Our relations with the surrounding tribes are of the most friendly character."

J. T.

Col. Office, Boston, Jan. 8th, 1847.

A NEW VIEW OF WEST INDIA EMANCIPATION.

It may be useful to inquire, what have been the results of the emancipated negroes in the West Indies? In connection with a return lately furnished to the British Government, as to the number of emancipated negroes who have become freeholders, &c., in British Guiana, is appended a list of estates which they have purchased, either in partnership or association. From this we extract the following instances.

Perseverance Estate.—Four hundred and seventy acres purchased by sixty-three laborers in association for $5000; and two hundred and fifty acres purchased by one hundred and nine laborers, for $4515, in the same manner.

Littlefield Estate.—Five hundred acres purchased by twelve laborers in partnership, for $3000.

Lovely Lass Estate.—Five hundred acres bought for $1715, by fourteen laborers in association.

North Brook Estate.—Five hundred acres purchased by eighty-four laborers in partnerships for $10,000.

These are only examples from a list extending over five foolscap, sheets of paper. From the facts gathered from them, we see no cause to doubt the wisdom of these enfranchised blacks. They have even set an example to the working classes of the whites. In a country where little labor is required for the sustenance of life, they appear determined to discountenance the oppressive system of over-worked hired labor. This they effected by becoming freeholders through co-operation, in association, in partnership. In all this there is no lack of wisdom, in all this the image of God in ivory might take a lesson from the image of God in ebony.—[People's Journal.

EDUCATION OF COLORED YOUTH.

The Christain Secretary concurs with us in regard to sending colored missionaries to Africa. He says:

"The Connecticut Baptist Education Society has one young colored man under its patronage, who had previously so far qualified himself for the ministry by his own efforts as to understand the Greek and Latin languages. He is now pursuing his studies at a high school in New Hampshire. While he was in this city he told us that he had a strong desire to preach the gospel in Africa, and it was for this purpose that he had devoted all his leisure time to books. His studious habits, sincere, unaffected piety, and manful struggles to acquire an education, induced his friends here to apply to the Education Society in his behalf, and he is now one of its beneficiaries. Should his life be spared there is good reason to believe that he will become a valuable and efficient missionary on the shores of benighted Africa. We wish there were more like him."

We commend this subject to the consideration of the churches in our own State. Those who wish to do something for the elevation of the colored race, should be especially awake to the importance of securing for them the advantages of education. They need it at home as well as in Africa.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, OCTOBER 1 1847.

Constitution of the Republic—Legislature.

It is with feelings of mingled pleasure and pride that we announce to our readers the adoption of the constitution by a large majority of the votes polled. The government is therefore fairly constructed and waits only the election and appointment of officers to be completely organised.

Candidates for office under the Republic, should endeavour to rise to a perception of the great responsibilities and arduous duties which will be theirs should the people honor them with their confidence. Now, less than at any former time this government can have no sinecures. The man who accepts office with the expectation that he will receive any thing like an adequate pecuniary compensation for his services gives proof of one of two things—either that he intends to do little else than receive the stipend—or that he is conscious of the poorness of his ability. In either case he proves himself unworthy of the people's confidence. The people therefore will do well to weigh the character, and from that infer the motive of those who solicit their suffrage. At the least they should demand of the candidates to be able to tell whether England is in Polynesia or New Zealand, or whether France is in Siberia or Lapland! These remarks have been suggested by hearing the names of some who have the modesty to offer themselves candidates for the Legislature at this most critical period of the colony's history. We trust however the good sense of the people will be manifested in the returns of the election; and that candidates who it is obvious have no motive but the pitiful pay, will be left in that obscurity whence they should never emerge.

But the successful candidates will have a Herculean task to perform—that is provived they be so simple as undertake all that some of our good and considerate people expect them to do. We have recently been some what attentive to the signs of the times—we have listened with some attention to the people's expression of their wants and wishes—and we venture to affirm that Sir Robert Peel backed by Lord John Russel and he helped by Webster, and Calhoun of America could not meet these wants and wishes by the exertion of all their immense abilities. In the first place they wish provision made for the employment of the poor. Very good and very natural wish, and we wish with them. In the second place they want a circulating medium, which will answer as an exchange with foreigners. There is truly no crime in the mere wish," but it is certainly very idle to us at present. Government can only be furnished with the means of employment by a revenue drawn from the people: but the people who have nothing cannot pay any thing. Foreigners cannot be expected to give their commodities in return for nothing. When we go to work upon our farms and raise something besides cassado and potatoes—when we raise groundnuts and ginger, and arrow-root and pepper—for export, when we collect the valuable timbers and gums abounding in our forests, then we may talk of these things and not till then. Nor will we deserve these blessings until we have gone fairly to work. That we can do these things no sensible colonist will deny, for what is above the reach of indivdual effort can be conveniently effected by combined exertion.

We therefore can see but little for the Legislature to do more than meet present exigences. We have enough law, in all conscience, and if the legislature embark boldly into the vast ocean of law making there is danger that they will never again see the land. Let them simplify our Judicial system, abolish useless courts—reduce the number of officers civil and military, provide a revenue to meet current expenditures, set a good example of low pay, by voting themselves a fair sum for services rendered in the legislature and return to their homes. Thus they will do the people a service.

Fatal Accidents.

Mr. Lloyd B. Fuller, late Collector of the Port of Grand Basa, was drowned a few weeks ago while on his way from Edina to Bexley. He had two of his sons with him in the canoe, but they, it is reported, were saved from a like fate by the strenuous exertions of two native boys.

At Gallinas on the 30th ultimo, 1 white man and five natives lost their lives by attempting, when the bar was bad, to go out to a vessel.

Since we uttered our complaints for want of vessels, we have been visited by three. The "Timbuctoo" Captain Dyer form Bristol, Eng: the "Thora" Captain Frahmann, from Hamburg, and the "Madonna" Captain Lawlin, form New-York. The Timbuctoo brought some little in the way of eatables, at a very moderate price. Among these edibles, there was mentioned "corned beef," all "choice pieces," and the price was not high considering. Having been some time since we rejoiced in "corn beef," all "choice pieces," we were urged by a remorseless fate to order some ashore. But lo! when it came, the kit was a little detestable noggin, for seven dollars and thirty five cents. The meat is pretty good to be sure, but the price puts us out of all patience. The German supplied a little flour, whether of beans or gypsum, we will not say, but only say the price is $16 00 a barrel. Hams 35 cents a pound, Tobacco 10 cents, Muskets very good imitation of U. S. $3 25; crockery and glass were cheap. The Madonna sold excellent flour at $12 00 Hams 25 cents.—Demanded $20 for Pork; &c.—Under existing circumstances these prices were not unreasonable.

Religious.

The third Union Meeting of the Associated Baptist Churches, was held with the Church at New-Georgia. It commenced on the third Friday in last month. It was indeed a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. On Friday, the day of commencement, an unusual solemnity pervaded the assemblies, which disposed to deep and serious thought and close self-examination. This state of feeling was regarded a favorable occasion to rouse Christians to earnest and persevering prayer for the out pouring of the spirit—it was thus used, and by the blessing of the Great Head of the Church, used successfully. As the meeting progressed, the earnestness and fervour of Christians increased until on Sabbath, the Lord displayed his power in a manner that reminded us of the penticostal visitation. Christians of different denominations were present—backsliders were there, and cold negligent worldly-minded professors, were there—and non professors were there—and all felt and confessed that "The Lord is in this place." The Holy Spirit descended and by a diversity of manifestation appealed to the hearts and consciences of all classes present. The faithful consistent persevering christian was edified and cheered by the hope set before him—the frigid and worldly-minded felt shame and remorse in view of the past—backsliders repented and returned from their wanderings, and the stout hearted sinners made to cry "what shall I do!"

On Sabbath night fifteen persons came forth to the altar, confessing their sins and bewailing their condition, and with tears in their eyes, begged that the people of God would pray for them. Among them was one of the captives by the "Pons". The season was one of so much interest, that having charge of the Church and being compelled to leave, we advised the church to continue divine serveice every evening through the week, which was done. On Thursday we received an earnest request from the deacon to go up. We went and found the interest and excitement unabated. On the following Saturday we again went up and found three of the late seekers professing to have experienced a change of heart. On Sabbath morning at six o'clock the church assembled to hear their relation. In regard to one who was to come forward, we confess we felt a little scepticism—and that was the captive by the "Pons". Perhaps by this admission we are exposing ourself to the imputation of want of faith in the power of God, or of correct understanding of the nature of that work which changes the human heart. Be it so, and be it that our want of faith and our ignorance have been reproved by the relation of this proselyte, who lately in the nakedness of sin, and infatuated by heathenism is now clothed and in his right mind, and has a place with the saints of God, at the feet of the Saviour. Still we must confess it a part of our creed, that the work of conversion is wholly a work of divine power, and that as soon will the Leopard change his spots, or the Ethiop his skin, as man cease from sin and turn to God.

But to the relation. Sam Clark, for this is his name, came forward. Finding he could speak tolerably good English, when he ended his relation, we thus interrogated him

What make you pray?

Because I fear die and go for bad place.

Who tell you there be a bad place?

I go meeting ebery time, I hear da palaver and I blieve him.

When you been lib for pray, how you been feel?

I feel bad too much, My heart, be bad, sick too much.

You feel bad all da time you lib for pray?

All time I feel bad, I no feel good one time

You pray all time?

I pray all time, I pray night, I pray day, I pray house, I pray bush.

What time you feel better?

One night I feel bad too much, I think I can die, I pray, den I hear something fall down all same man cut tree in bush. My heart light, I be new, I laugh, I cant cry, I say what dis? something say dis be God. God done hear you for Jesus Christ. (sake.)

Do you love God?

I lub God too much.

Do you love God's people?

Too much. I lub ebery body.

Supeese church say you no converted, you must go pray again?

Spose he say I noo look God, I cant ble (believe) that no more I can go pray, because I lub pray

These answers with others which have escaped us banished our doubt, and with indescribale feeling we gave him our hand as a candidate for baptism and admission into Christ Militant Church. Three other persons were received the same morning as candidates for baptism, and it gives us pleasure to state that the relations of all were marked with an artlessness, yet consistency and firm conviction of the change wrought in them, that left no doubt as to the reality of the work performed. More, perhaps six or eight will soon come forward for baptism.

We learn from a source entitled to credit, that unless preventive measures are speedily adopted by the authorities, the whole Basa Country will be in a state of war. It appears that Bah-Gay has been playing a double game since he sold the country to this Colony. It is a universal custom among the tribes in this part of the country, whenever anymoney is received from foreigners by the King, whether in the way of Largess for privileges granted or consideration for land sold, to divide the amount amongst the various chiefs. Bah-Gay, in order to gratify his avarice by the appropriation to himself of the whole amount paid by this Government for the territory of Basa, at first denied to the chiefs that he had sold the country. They have now ascertained the fact beyond all doubt; and demand a council upon the subject. Bah-Gay foreseeing the difficulty a palaver would bring upon him, has shifted his ground. He acknowledges he has sold the country, but declares he is now "Merica man" and therefore not bound by "country fash," and moreover "gives it out "Gubnor live him back," and has made him headman for all da country." In virtue of this appointment he has issued his edict forbidding any of the Malcontents to come to the beach. The country people are determined to resent this injury and are now preparing for war.

We know that Bah-Gay has received no such appointment, and that all he is now doing is unwarranted and directly in the face of his agreement with the Colonial Authorities: and we know moreover that prompt interferenece on the part of this Government will set this old chap right, and compose the discord. Should it not be done?

Folly.

The passion for fashionable dress and display is increasing in the colony at a most fearful pace. As soon as a vessel arrives with the faded and cast-off unmentionables of other climes, a mania seizes all hands, a general chase is opened. Faded spinsters and blooming maids, mamas and little misses twinkled antiquity and uncentized infancy, aunts, grand mas and dwelling nieces all hobble off in a breathless race, which is to end only when one is bonnetted, another gloved, the heaving bosom of another enveloped in variagated gauze and the godlike form of another shrouded and tortured in dubious silk! Until all have possessed themselves of something to show off in and be admired for, it is the all absorbing topic, and the place where the gew-gaws are offered for sale is the general resort.

There are it is true some exceptions to the above; but they are few and it would be invidious to name them. Upon these few we call to set their faces against this vanity. Oppose to it the powerful influence of counter conduct. Those who shall induce our people to put less money upon their persons, and apply it to the cultivation of the soil will be true benefactors of the country

We beseech our people to pause and reflect upon this conduct. None can be so infatuated as to think they are any better for a little would-be-fashionable dress; or that they are more thought of by the sensible portion of humanity on account of possessing a silk shawl or tuscan bonnet or a long-tail-blue coat or black satin vest. No indeed, these things only serve to procure for them contempt if their other possessions do not correspond with them. It does not require the eye of a prophet to see where this will lead, unless a timely check is laid upon it. When the passion has firmly established itself no means or recourse will be to be base to gratify it. Honesty, integrity, modesty will then have no power because all virtue will be placed in showing off. Then for a lady to flaunt in silk and tuscan, and a gentleman to strut in blue cloth and high-heeled boots will be regarded as the summum bonum of happiness and the apex of human dignity. We will not hint about sumptuary laws, but we do say it is exceedingly desirable that people dress in proportion to their means. We are aware that we are exposing ourself to animadversion and perhaps to the ogling of some gentle eyes, but as ladies are always interesting we shall feel ourself happy in being their object of their attentions, whatever may have caused it. As to the other sex we will bare our bosom to their shafts

Wanted.

The Senior Editor of this paper is seriously in want of a few necessaries, such as Pork, (he don't aspire to Hams) Flour, Sugar, Beans and Peas, &c. Any one having a surplus of these articles, by sending a small quantity of each, or of either as may be most convenient will be entitled to our warmest gratitude. Prompt acknowledgement will be made in the Herald. Please be careful to direct "For the Senior Editor of the Herald;" as a doubt here would give no little uneasiness.

Eloquence.

Lord (prayed a brother) Lord we have been wandering so long on the barren mountain of carnal delight and feeding so long upon the orchard of sinful pleasure and eating the husks of the devil that we have got right poor!

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	8	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	38
Beef, cargo No. 1.	Bb	16 00	17 00
Blue Baftc,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	30	35
Boards,	1000ft	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	none	12
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	12	15
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	75 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	none	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	1 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1-3	34
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter.	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12½
Romauls	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shot	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 00
Tobacco	1000lbs.	none
Washband bowls	Dozen	2 00	10 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	18 00
			20 00

PISCATORIAL FACTS.—"It is an ill wind that blows nobody good," says the adage, and it would appear equally true that it is an ill flood that does not work some benefit, for since the great inundation in the Mississippi, last year, several kinds of fish, before unknown to the vicinity of St. Louis, are caught in great abundance in the river and small streams running into it. One kind is a very handsome fish, with bright silvery sides, reddish colored back, flat and broad, resembling in shape the salt-water shad, for want of a better name the fishermen call them flounders. Another kind resembles in appearance the pike, but is smaller and more delicate in its proportions, with a brownish circle or ring round its body near the gills: these are called ringed sturgeon. Both are excellent fish? The latter is free from and the former full of small wiry bones. Herring precisely like those of Cape Fear, have also made their appearance in the waters at St Louis. They run in shoals, and are easily taken with hook or seine. Shrimps are now caught in the small necks and streams near that city, with the seine, by bushels.

POETRY.

From the Christian Volunteer.

A VICTORY.

The joy-bells peal a merry tune
Along the evening air;
The crackling bonfires turn the sky
All crimson with their glare;
Bold music fills the startled streets
With mirth-inspiring sound;
The gaping cannon's reddening breath
Wakes thunder-shouts around;
And thousand joyful voices cry
"Huzza! huzza! a Victory!"

A little girl stood at the door,
And with her knitten played;
Less wild and frolicksome than she,
That rosy prattling maid.
Sudden her cheek turns ghostly white;
Her eye with fear is filled,
And running in-doors, she screams—
"My brother Willie's killed!"
And thousand joyful voices cry,
"Huzza! huzza! a Victory!"

A mother sat in thoughtful ease,
A-knitting by the fire,
Plying the needle's thrifty task
With hands that never tire.
She tore her few grey hairs, and shrieked
"My joy on earth is done!
O! who will lay me in my grave!
O God! my son! my son!"
And thousand joyful voices cry,
"Huzza! huzza! a Victory!"

A youthful wife the threshold crossed,
With matron's treasure blessed;
A smiling infant nestling lay
In slumber at her breast.
She spoke no word, she heaved no sigh,
The widow's tale to tell;
But like a corpse, all white and stiff,
Upon the earth-floor fell.
And thousand joyful voices cry,
"Huzza! huzza! a Victory!"

An old weak man, with head of snow,
And years three-score and ten,
Looked in upon his cabin-home,
And anguish seized him then.
He helped not wife, nor helpless babe,
Matron nor little maid,
One scalding tear, one choking sob—
He knelt him down and pray'd.
And thousand joyful voices cry,
"Hezza! huzza! a Victory!"

MISCELLANEOUS

Facts relating to War.

At Palo Alto, Resaca, and Monterey, thousands of men were suddenly hurried out of time into eternity, their hearts burning with revenge and malice, and their hands reeking perhaps in a brother's blood; unprepared, it is to be feared, for that awful reckoning with the Judge of all the earth, from which none can escape. What must be the feelings of that man, who survives this fiend-like conflict, and afterward reflects that he was himself the instrument of thus closing the mortal career of his fellow man, and hurrying him, with his sins upon his head, into the presence of his God. Would not bitter remorse follow him during the remnant of his days.

A writer describing the field of Borodino, says, "the fire of 2000 pieces of cannon enveloped the two armies in smoke, and mowing down whole battalions, strewed the earth with the dead and wounded. The latter fell to expose themselves to a fate still more terrible. How agonizing their situation. Forty thousand dragoons galloping over the field in every direction, trampled them under foot, and dyed their horses hoofs in their blood. The flying artillery, in rapid and alternate advance and retreat, put a period to the anguish of some, and inflicted new torments on others who were mangled by their wheels. * * * Night separated the combatants, but left 80'000 men dead upon the field."

Describing the appearances next day he says, "A surface of about nine square miles in extent, was covered with the killed and wounded, with the wreck of arms, lances helmets and cuirasses, and with balls as numerous as hail stoned after a violent storm. Such was he havock occasioned by repeated discharges, that mountains of dead were raised. But the most dreadful spectacle was the interior of the ravines, where the wounded had instincively crawled to avoid the shot. Here, these unfortunate wretches, lying one upon another, destitute of assistance and weltering in their blood, uttered the most horried groans. Loudly invoking death, they besought us to put an end to their excruciating torments."

Another writer describing the siege of Saragossa, says, "Pestilence broke out as a matter of course, and when once begun, it was impossible to check its progress, or confine it to one locality. It was not long before more than thirty hospitals were established. As soon as one was destroyed by the bombs, the patients were removed to some other building, which was in a state to afford them temporary shelter, and thus the infection was carried to every part. The daily average of deaths was not less than 350. Men, stretched upon straw, in helpless misery, lay breathing their last, and with their dying breath spreading the mortal taint of their own disease without medicines, food or attendance; for the ministers of charity themselves, became the victims of disease. The slighest wound produced gangrene and death in bodies so prepared for dissolution by distress of mind, want of proper aliment and of sleep;—for there was no respite either by day or night. * * * * * * The cemeteries could no longer afford room for the dead. Large pits to receive them were dug in the streets and in the courts of the public buildings, until hands were wanted for the labour; they were laid before the public buildings, heaped upon one another, and covered with sheets; and not unfrequently these piles of mortality were struck by a shell, and the shattered bodies scattered in all directions. When the besieging army entered the city, six thousand bodies were lying in the streets and trenches, or piled up in heaps before the churches."

Of the sufferings endured in marches, the following description given by an eye witness, will convey some idea;—"Overwhelmed with whirlwinds of snow, our soldiers could not distinguish the road from the ditches and often fell into the latter, which served them for a tomb. Badly clothed and shod, having nothing to eat or drink, groaning shivering with the cold, they gave no assistance and showed no signs of compassion to those who, sinking from weakness, expired round them. Many of these miserable creatures struggled hard in the agonies of death. Some in the most affecting manner, bade adieu to their brethren in arms, and others with their latest breath pronounced the names of their mothers and of their country. Stretched on the road, we could only see the heaps of snow that covered them, and formed undulations in our route like those in a grave-yard.

"Flocks of ravens flew over our heads, croaking ominously, and troops of dogs, which followed us, and lived solely on our bloody remains, howled around us, as if impatient for the moment when we should become their prey. Every day furnished scenes too painful to relate. The road was covered with soldiers, who no longer retained the human form. Some had lost their hearing—others their speech; and many, by excessive cold and hunger, were reduced to such a state of stupid frenzy, that they roasted the dead bodies for food, and even gnawed their own hands and arms."

Take another scene from an eye witness and participator: "These horrors, so far from exciting our sensibility, only hardened our hearts. Having no longer the power of exercising our cruelty on our enemies, we turned it on each other. The best friends were estranged; and whoever experienced the least sickness, was certain of never seeing his country again unless he had good horses and faithful servants. Securing the plunder was preferred by most to the pleasure of saving a comrade. We heard around us the groans of the dying and the plaintive voices of those who were abandoned; but all were deaf to their cries and, if any one approached them, even when on the point of death, it was for the purpose of stripping them, and searching whether they had any remains of food."

"Among the burning houses; were three large barns filled with soldiers, chiefly wounded. They could not escape from two of them, without passing through the one in front, which was on fire. The most active saved themselves by leaping out of the windows, but those who were sick or crippled not having strength to move, saw the the flames advancing rapidly to devour them. Touched by their shrieks, some who were the least hardened, endeavoured in vain to save them, but we could scarcely see them, half buried under the burning rafters. They entreated us to shorten their sufferings by depriving them of life; and from motives, of humanity we thought it our duty to comply with their wishes!!! As there were some who still survived, we heard them with feeble voices crying, "Fire on us!—fire on us!—at the head! at the head! don't miss!"

How awful is this picture! how does war harden the heart, steel it against the cry of distress—render it insensible to the awful realities of death and eternity, and exemplify the truth of that Scripture declaration, "The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel."

Such are some of the horrid scenes which the march of an army presents, and if the written delineation fills us with horror, how much more shocking must it be to witness and to suffer the dreadful reality.

Nor is a hospital much less terrible. An eminent surgeon, present in the hospitals after the battle of Waterloo, says, "The soldiers who had in the morning been moved by the piteous cries of those they carried in, I saw in the evening, so hardened by the repetition of the scene, and by fatigue, as to become indifferent to the sufferings they occasioned. It is impossible to conceive the sufferings of men rudely carried at such a period of their wounds. When I first entered the hospital, the men had been roused and excited in an extraordinary degree; and in the glance of their eyes there was a character of fierceness, which I never expected to witness in the human countenance On the second day the temporary excitement had subsided, and turn which way I would, I encountered every form of entreaty from those whose condition left no need of words to stir compassion. Surgeon Major! O how I suffer! Dress my wounds—do dress my wounds! Doctor, I commend myself to you. Cut off my leg. Oh! I suffer too much!" And when these entreaties were unavailing, you might hear, in a weak, inward tone of despair, "I shall die! I am a dead man!"

In the hospitals of Wilna there were left more than 17,000 dead and dying, frozen and freezing. The bodies of the former were used to stop the openings in the windows, floors and walls, and in one Corridor of the Great Convent, above 1500 were piled up transversely, like pigs of lead or iron.

Such are some of the horrors of war! But perhaps it will be said, these descriptions do not apply to the Mexican campaigns there will be no such miseries there. Do not deceive yourselves with such hopes—war is very much the same every where—climate or other attendant circumstances may make some little modifications, but its general features do not vary. Could you now look at the troops who are enduring long, painful, and harassing marches, through an unhealthy; and in great measure, uncultivated country—at the sick, the wounded, the dying, crowded into uncomfortable quarters with little or no attendance, and few of the comforts which their diseased and helpless condition demands, you would perceive, that war at Palo Alto, Monterey, or Resaca, is the same cruel and destructive business that it was at Borodino, Saragossa, and Waterloo. In proportion to the numbers engaged, the carnage and the miseries were probably quite as great at the former as at the latter places.

A member of Congress in a speech lately delivered in the House of Representatives, describing the appearance of the volunteers who had been discharged by General Taylor, says, "Of all the emancipated, walking skeletons ever beheld, these surpassed. They were discharged because they were utterly unfit for duty. A campaign on the Rio Grande had rendered them thus incompetent, and their discharge under these circumstances, was an act of good sense and of humanity. Had not General Taylor discharged them when he did, death would very soon have done it for him."

But the moral evils of war are not less terrible! Bad as many men are who enlist in armies, war makes them worse. The recruit begins his degradation even in the rendezvous, and he rapidly grows more wicked in the camp. There vice becomes his occupation. His worst passions are fostered, and unbridled license given to the exercise of them. Those restaints which kept them in check while the man was in the bosom of virtuous society, are all removed. He becomes ashamed of tender feelings, and of conscientious scruples. He dare not meet the dread laugh of his companions in arms—he drowns his convictions, stifles the stirrings of good within his breast, and runs eagerly with the multitude to do evil

The business of a soldier is to butcher his fellow men. He is hired to destroy them, and all his ingenuity and skill are called into requisition to enable him to kill them in the most successful manner. He is a wholesale, legalized murderer.

"War," says the celebrated Robert Hall, "is the fruitful parent of crimes. It reverses, with respect to its objects, all the rules of morality. It is nothing less than a temporary repeal of all the principles of virtue It is a system, out of which almost all the virtues are excluded, and in which nearly all the vices are incorporated. Whatever renders human nature amiable or respectable, whatever engages love or confidence, is sacrificed at its shrine."

Camps are proverbially scenes of the most abandoned and unblushing wickedness. Every species of crime which can deform or debase the character of man, is there shamelessly practised. It is an atmosphere of moral pestilence, which corrupts all who come within its baleful influence.

One of the volunteers, writing from Monterey, during the late armistice, remarks: "If you would witness wickedness and vice, drunkenness and all the wicked propensities of the human heart—if you would see the worst passions with which our fallen nature is cursed, in the most odious colours, the American camp, I grieve to say, is the place where you may behold them. Full many a bright and promising youth, who looked forward to a life of usefulness and honour, may date his ruin, it is greatly to be feared, from this campaign—this grand school of iniquity and vice. The ingenuous mind shrinks appalled from the revolting scenes daily exposed to view." * * * * *

NEWSPAPER SUCCESS.

We omitted to notice the recent purchase of the United States Gazette, by the proprietors of the North American. They gave to J. H. Chandler, Esq., the sum of $45,000 for the paper. Mr. Chandler thus states some of his early struggles which were followed by a pleasing success.

"When I entered upon the duties of editor of this paper, in 1822, its existance as a daily paper seemed scarcely to be known. A few, a very few, of the old Federal party continued to pay for it, but with the multitude it was obsolete—it was among the things lost. Evidences of resuscitation were soon marked, and from a few hundreds the subscription list rose to nearly a thousand, when I became joint proprietor. How I toiled at the editorial columns, and how the constant companion of my labors, (G. H. Hart, Esq.) toiled in his departm[ent] I can scarcely explain; but month after month, year after year, did I attend daily to a school of more than [a] scholars during seven hours of the day, then write editorials, collect and select news, do all the reporting, and much of the correspondence of the daily paper, retiring, with the companion of my labors, at two and three o'clock in the morning, from the office, to renew labors after three or four hours' attempt to sleep. Ruinous as all this was to the constitution; it was continued, and the paper slowly, but constantly, gained patronage."

Eloquent Passage.—The light of the lamp was dying away in the socket; the midnight clock swung heavily aloft, and its brazen tones sounded loudly on the frozen air; it was the hour when disembodied spirits walk, and when murderers, like the stately wolf, prowl for their prey; the lonely watches shuddered as he heard a slight noise at the door; big drops stood on his pale brow—the door gently opened, and in came a strange cat.

The Marlborough Family visit Brighton this season. The very name may still be a terror to the French, should they approach that coast.—London paper.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) OCTOBER 21 1847. NO. 23

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semimonthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two Dollars a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two Dollars and fifty cents—if at the end of the year Three Dollars.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One Dollar a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	John N Lewis.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. Davis,
Edina,	Rev. James Moore
Stone,	Mr R. Murray.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. McGill.
Sierra Leone,	Jno. Thorpe Esq.

UNITED STATES

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. John B. Pinney,
Richmond Virginia,	Rev. W. Mylne,
Norfolk "	W. De Lacy Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. Crane. "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. Allen,
New York,	Rev. S. H. Cone,
Boston,	Rev. Joseph Tracy,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. Coppinger

LIBERIA HERALD.

TABLE-TALK OF EMINENT MEN:—

SELDEN.

Much of information and entertainment is to be found in the Table-Talk (as it is called)—the familiar conversation—of eminent men, treasured up by those who have held intercourse with them, and posthumously published their choice sayings. The lively discourse of a powerful mind, quickened by colloquial intercourse, is often more striking than lubrications laboriously committed to paper. Brilliant sparkles coruscate; and gold-dust and diamonds are scattered with lavished prodigality; so that a bye-stander is sometimes fain to prefer the racy effervescence of the rapid mental fermentation, to the heavy elaporated portion. Nor are the thoughts necessarily less solid for being spontaneously thrown off; for they may have been growing for years, till occasion for using them, and the ardor of conversation gave zest to the delivery. In writing, a man often refines and corrects, till he debilitates what was redolent of grace and spirit in the conception.

It is no wonder, then, that both in early and modern times collections of the remarkable sayings of wise men have been accounted among the most precious records of human wisdom. The ancients have left us some valuable collections of this kind; among which (not to include the inspired maxims of Solomon, who spake "three thousand proverbs,") the conversational outpourings of Socrates, as noted by Plato and Xenophon, are the most interesting and delightful. The Germans, the Italians, and the French, have many repositories of the kind; the Jews, and even the Turks, are not destitute of them; and England is rich in them; indeed Boswell's Johnson stands at the head of the list, ancient or modern.

The authenticity of many of these collections has been disputed. Sometimes the alleged table-talk does not coincide with the known opinions of the speaker, as gathered from his life, or as set forth in his published works. Thus Plato makes Socrates often Platonize rather than Socratize. Frequently speeches are put into the lips of a great and good man, so mean, vain, worthless, or indecent, that their admirers cannot bring themselves to believe they uttered them. In these respects portions of the alledged table-talk of Lord Bacon and of Luther lie under suspition. But it must be remembered that even wise men do not always exhibit wisdom; and that witty men may be seduced to utter striking rather than judicious sayings. Sometimes also the speaker may be jesting, or expressing himself ironically; and frequently he may throw off in the heat of conversation opinions or remarks which will not stand the test of his own calm investigation. The admiring pupil is perhaps not select in his gatherings and recollections; he embalms much that had better gone to decay; he accumulates rubbish as well as rubies; he possibly mistake, or misstates, the words or intention of the speaker; and he injures the fair fame of the object of his veneration, by recording much that had better been forgotten: in which catagory we must class whatever is false, gross or profane, however intellectually or imaginatively felicitous. And all this may happen without any intention to deceive; though sometimes it is to be feared that the love of making a good story has led to intentional exaggeration, to silly fabrication, and to improper would-be wit, for which the person whose name is abused is not answerable.

After making ample allowances under these several heads, we do not doubt that most of the celebrated collections of table-talk may, in the main be a genuine transcript; though so mixed up with fallacy or invention, as not to be thoroughly authentic.

We are led to these remarks by glancing over the table-talk of Selden, published after his death by his amanuensis, Richard Milward. The learned Dr. (David) Wilkins, who edited the collected writings of Selden in 1726, discredited the authenticity of this work, declaring that it contains many things inconsistent with Selden's great learning, his own principles, and his general character. But Milward dedicated the book to Selden's four executors, Sir Matthew Hale, Heywood, Vaughan, and Jewkes, stating that he had been twenty years in the habit of hearing Selden's conversation, and that he was sure these relics the "excellent things that fell from him" would be very acceptable to those who well knew, and so greatly admired, "this glory of the nation;" and as these eminent lawyers did not repudiate the publication, it was too late for Dr. Wilkins, seventy years after Selden's death, to repudiate it. Many of the remarks are thoroughly Seldenian; and that some are unworthy of so able and learned a man, is no proof that he did not utter something of the kind. Nor are we even surprised that some contradict certain of his written opinions; for, in the course of years men's opinions may vary; besides which, the turn of a conversation may often lead to an inconsistency more apparent than real: as a whig may seem to torvize when opposing a radical; or a moderate dissenter to defend the church when replying to some outrageous statement. We have a proof that it was not always easy to discover Selden's real opinion, from what passeed relative to his "History of Tithes." The work was published in 1618. It is usually considered as denying the "divine right;" but Selden does not enounce that conclusion, though he arranges his facts and authorities in such a manner as, upon his premises, to render it inevitable. It does not even appear that he wished to deprive the Church of England of this provision; for though he rejects the divine right, he learnedly proves and defends the legal title. The book, however, excited the displeasure of the clergy and the court; and he was accordingly cited before some of the lords of the high commission to make a public submission, which he did in the following words. "My good lords, I must humbly acknowledge my error which I have committed in publishing the History of Tithes, and especially in that I have at all, by shewing any interpretations of Holy Scriptures, by meddling with councils, fathers, or canons, or by what else soever occurs in it, offered any occasion of argument against any right of maintainance, Jure Divino, of the ministers of the gospel; beseeching your lordships to receive this ingenuous and humble acknowledgement, together with the unfeigned protestation of my grief for that I have so incurred both his majesty's and your lordship's displeasure, conceived against me on behalf of the Church of England." This was popularly considered to be a recantation of his opinion; but it is not really so; and next year, in reply to his opponent, Dr. Tillesley, he said: "I did most humbly acknowledge that I was most sorry for the publishing of that history, because it had offended; and his majesty's most gracious favor towards me received that satisfaction of the fault in so untimely printing it; and I profess still to the world that I am sorry for it. And so I should have been if I had published a most authodox catechism that had offended. But what is that to the doctrinal consequences of it, which the doctor talks of? Is there a syllable of it, of less truth, because I was sorry for the publishing of it? He (Dr. Tillesly) hopes as he says, that my submission hath cleared my judgment concerning the right of the tithes. What dream made him hope so? There is not a word of tithes in that submission more than in mentioning the title of the book; neither was my judgment at all in question, but my publishing it." Several replies were put forth; but Selden was forbidden by the king to rejoin. He says: "All that will, have liberty, and some use it, to write and preach what they will against me; to abuse my name, my person, my profession, with as many falsehoods as they please; and my hands tied; I must not so much as answer their calumnies."

There were several other events in Selden's career which exposed him to the charge of inconsistency; and sometimes the courtiers considered him on their side, and sometimes the parliament party on theirs. But we must not digress to a sketch of his life and character, our only intention being to give a series of passages from his conversation; which we propose following up in future numbers, by similar contributions from the table-talk of some other remarkable men; selecting such observations as may seem appropriate to our passages—whether for adoption, consideration, or rejection, but not endorsing all that we quote.

A few dates may usefully introduce our citations from Selden. That erudite and laborious man was born in 1584. After passing through Oxford and the inns of Court, he began to give to the world the fruits of his learned researches in law, history, and other studies. The dry titles of his many volumes it were tedious to specify. He was equally at home in heraldic bearing and Arundelian marbles; in the origin of duels and of church courts; in Jewish antiquities and English constitutional law; in Rabbinical lore, and popish edicts and provincial decrees; in Hebrew and its cognates, and the biography of lord chancellors and keepers from the days of the Conquest. He could turn his hand from defending the right of England to the four seas, in his Mare Clausum, against the Mare Liberum of Grotius, to draw up the petition of rights, or articles of impeechment against Archbishop Laud. "Lay gentlemen," says quaint Fuller, "prefers his 'Titles of Honor;' Lawyers, his 'Mare Clausum;' Antiquaries, his Spicilegium ad Eadmearum;' Clergymen like best his 'De Diis Syris,' and worst his 'History of Tithes;' but all acknowledge his wonderful erudition and fecundity.

Yet could he break from his studies, and mix busily in the public struggles of those eventful days; and could then resume them in a dungeon, except when denied the use of pens, ink, paper, and book; as happened to him when Charles the First imprisoned him, because in his place in the House of Commons he had stood up for the rights of the subject and the privileges of Parliament; and had assisted to confine the speaker by manual force in the chair, while resolutions were passed in spite of his majesty's menaces.

Selden's love of letters moderated the barbarous proceedings of some of his rude colleagues in the days of anarchy. Thus when Archbishop Laud's endowment of professorship of Arabic at Oxford was seized, on the attainder of that prelate, he procured its restitution. When Archbishop Usher's library was confiscated, because his grace had been so graceless as to preach against the infalible Assembly of Divines at Westminster, Selden saved it from sale of dispersion. When prelacy was abolished, he procured the transfer of the Lambeth Library to the University of Cambridge, where it was kept safely till the restoration, and then honestly restored. Many similar services in those days of dilapidation he tendered to literature; and also to science and antiquities.

He continued writing almost till his death, his last work being published when he was nearly seventy years of age. He died in 1654: but had he lived six years longer, we sincerely believe—after he had witnessed—that he would have cordially concurred in the restoration of monarchy and episcopacy.

To our citations from this Table-Talk we will prefix alphabetical headings, for the convenience of reference. We repeat that citation does not always imply approval.

"Abbeys.—When the founders of Abbeys laid a curse upon those that should take away those lands, I would fain know what power they had to curse me; it is not the curses that come from the poor, or from anybody that hurt me, because they come from them, but because I do something ill against them that deserves God should curse me for it. On the other side, it is not a man's blessing me that makes me blessed, he only declares me to be so; and if I do well, I shall be blessed, whether any bless me or not.

"Articles.—The nine-and-thirty articles are much another thing in Latin, (in which tounge they were made) than they were translated into English: they were made at three several convocations, and confirmed by act of parliament six or seven times after. There is a secret concerning them; of late ministers have subscribed to all of them, but by act of parliament that confirmed them, they ought only to subscribe to those articles which contain matter of faith, and the doctrine of the sacriments, as appears by the first subscriptions. But Bishop Bancroft, (in the convention held in King James' day) he began it, that ministers should subscribe to three things; to the king's supremacy, to the Common Prayer, and to the Thirty nine Articles: many of them do not contain matter of faith. Is it matter of faith how the church should be governed? whether infants should be baptized? whether we have any propriety in goods, &c.

"Bible.—The English translation of the Bible is the best translation in the world, and renders the sense of the original best, taking in for the English tranlation, the bishops' Bible, as well as King James'. The translation in King James' time took an excellent way: that part of the Bible was given to him who was most excellent in such a tongue, (as the Apocrypha to Andrew Downs) and then they met together, and one read the translation, the rest holding in their hands some Bible, either of the learned togue, or French, Spanish, or Italian, &c.; if they found any fault, they spoke; if not, he read on.

"Henry the Eighth made a law, that all men might read the scripture, except servants: not no women, except ladies and gentlewomen, who had leisure, and might ask somebody the meaning. The law was repealed in Edward the Sixth's days.

"Bishops.—Anciently, the noblemen lay with, in the city for safety and security. The bishops' house were by the water side, because they were held sacred persons which nobody would hurt.

"That which is thought to have done the bishops hurt, is their going about to bring men to a blind obedience, imposing things upon them, though perhaps small and well enough, without preparing them, and insinuating into their reasons and fancies. Every man loves to know his commander. I wear those gloves, but, perhaps, if an alderman should command me, I should think much to do it: what has he to do with me? Or, if he has, peradventure I do no not know it. This jumping upon things at first dash will destroy all: to keep up friendship, there must be little addresses and applications, whereas bluntness spoils it quickly: to keep up the hierarchy, there must be little applications made to men; they must be brough on little by little: so in the primitive times, the power was gained, and so it must be continued. Scaliger said of Erasmus, Si minor esse voluit, major fuisset. So we may say of the bishops, Si minores esse voluerint, majores fuissent.

"The bishops were too hasty, else, with a discreet slowness, they might have had what they aimed at: the old story of the fellow, that told the gotleman he might get to such a place, if he did not ride too fast, would have fitted their turn.

"Bishops in Parliament.—You would not have bishops meddle with temporal affairs; think who you are that say it. If a Papist, they do in their church, if an English Protestant, they do among you; if a Presbyterian, where you have no bishops, you mean your Presbyterian lay elders should medule with temporal affairs as well as spiritual; besides, all jurisdiction is temporal, and in no church but they have some jurisdiction or other. The question then will be reduced to magis and minus; they meddle more in one church than in another.

"Bishops are now unfit to govern because of their learning; they are bred up in another law, they run to the next for something done amongst the Jews that nothing concerns England: it is just as if a man would have a kettle, and he would not go to our brazier to have it made as they make kettles, but he would have it made as Hiram made his brass-work, who wrought in Solomon's temple.

"To take away bishops' votes, is but the beginning to take them away; for then they can be no longer useful to the king or state. It is but like the little wimble, to let in the greater auger. Objection. But, they are but for their life, and that makes them always go for the king as he will have them. Answer. This is against a double charity, for you must always suppose a bad king and bad bishops.

"Books.—It is good to have translations, because they serve as a comment, so far as the judgment of the man ever.

"Quoting of authors is most for matter of fact; and then I write them as I would produce a witness, sometimes for a free expression; and then I give the author his due, and gain myself praise by reading him.

"To quote a modern Dutchman, where I may use a classic author, is as if I were to justify my reputation, and I neglect all persons of note and quality that know me, and bring the testimonial of the scullion in the kitchen.

"Ceremony.—Ceremony keeps up all things; it is not a penny-glass to a rich spirit, or some excellent water, without it the water were spilt, the spirit lost.

"Church of Rome.—Before a juggler's tricks are discovered we admire him, and give him money, but afterwards we care not for them; so it was before the discovery of the juggling of the Church of Rome.

"Catholics say, we, out of our charity, believe they of the Church of Rome may be saved; but they do not believe so of us; therefore, their church is better, according to ourselves; First, some of them no doubt believe as well of us, as we do of them, but they must not say so; besides, is that an argument their church is better than ours, because it has less charity?

"Clergy.—Though a clergyman have no faults of his own, yet the faults of the whole tribe shall be laid upon him, so that he shall be sure not to lack.

"The clergy (Landeau) would have us believe them against our own reason, as the woman would have had her husband against his own eyes; What! will you believe your own eyes before your own sweet wife?"

"Confessional.—In time of parliament it used to be one of the first things the house did to petition the king that his confessor might be removed, as fearing either his power with the king, or else, lest he should reveal to the pope what the house was doing, as no doubt he did, when the Catholic cause was concerned.

"The difference between us and the Papists is, we both allow contrition; but the Papists make confession a part of contrition; they say a man is not sufficiently contrite till he confess his sins to a priest.

"Why should I think a priest will not reveal confession! I am sure he will do anything that is forbidden him, haply not so often as I. The utmost punishment is deprivation; and how can it be proved that ever any man revealed confession when there is no witness? and no man can be witness in his own case. A mere gullery! There was a time when it was public in the church, and that is much against their auricular confession.

"Conscience.—He that hath a scrupulous conscience, is like a horse that is not well weighed; he starts at every bird that flies out of the hedge.

"Consecrated Places.—All things are God's already; we can give him no right by consecrating any that he had before, only we set it a part to his service: just as a gardener brings his lord and master a basket of apricots, and presents them; his lord thank him, perhaps gives him something for his pains; and yet the apricots were as much his lord's before as now.

"Yet consecration has this power when a man has consecrated anything to God, he cannot of himself take it away.

Devils.—Casting out devils (by the Romish clergy) is mere juggling, they never cast out any but what they first cast in: they do it where, for reverence, no man shall dare to examine it; they do it in a corner, in a mortice-hole, not in the market-place; they do nothing but what may be done by art; they make the devil fly out of the window, in the likeness of a bat or rat. Why do they not bolt him? Why, in the likeness of a bat, or a rat, or some creature? that is, why not in some shape we paint him in, with claws and horns? By this trick they gain much, gain upon men's fancies, and so are reverenced; and certainly, if the priest deliver me from him that is my most deadly enemy, I have all the reason in the world to reverence him. Objection. But if this be juggling, why do they punish impostures? Answer. For great reason: because they do not play their part well, and for fear others should discover them; and so all of them ought to be of the same trade.

"Equity.—Equity in law is the same that the spirit is in religion, what every one pleases to make it; sometimes they go according to conscience, sometimes according to law, sometimes according to the rule of court.

"Equity is a roguish thing; for law we have a measure—know what to trust to; equity is according to the conscience of him that is chancellor, and as that is a larger or narrower, so is equity. It is all one as if they should make the standard for the measure we call a foot, a chancellor's foot; what an uncertain measure would this be! One chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot: it is the same thing in the chancellor's conscience.

"That saying, 'Do as you would be done to,' is often misunderstood; For it is not thus meant—that I a private man, should do to you, a private man, as I would have you do to me, but do as we have agreed to do one to another by public agreement. If the prisoner should ask the judge, whether he would be contented to be hanged, were he in his case, he would answer—No: Then, says the prisoner, do as you would be done to. Neither of them must do as private men, but the judge must do by him as they have publicly agreed—that is, both judge and prisoner have consented to a law, that if either of them steal, they shall be hanged.

"Hell.—There are two texts for Christ's descending into hell; the one, Psalm xvi., the other Acts ii., where the Bible that was in use when the Thirty-nine Articles were made, has it hell. But the Bible that was in Queen Elizabeth's time, when the articles were confirmed, reads it grave; and so it continued till the new translation in King James' time, and then it is hell again. But by this we may gather the Church of England declined, as much as they could, the descent; otherwise they never would have altered the Bible.

"Images.—Though the learned Papist pray not to images, yet it is to be feared the ignorant do; as appears by that story of St. Nicholas in Spain. A countryman used to offer daily to St. Nicholas' image: at length by mischance the image was broken, and a new one made of his own plum-tree; after that the man forbore. Being complained of to his ordinary, he answered—it is true, he used to offer to the old image, but to the new he could not find in his heart, because he knew it was a piece of his own plum-tree. You see what opinion this man had of the image; and to this tended the bowing of their images, the twinkling of their eyes, the Virgin's milk, &c. Had they only meant representations, a picture would have done as well as these tricks. It may be with us in England they do not worship images; because living amongst Protestants, they are either laughed out of it, or beaten out of it by shock of argument.

"It is a discreet way concerning pictures in churches, to set up no new, nor to pull down no old."—Living Age

THE LONGEST LADDER IN THE WOLD.

On approaching the roads of James-Town, in the island of St. Halena, your attention is attracted by an enormous ladder, that extends from the town beneath to a fort directly over the town, on the summit of a hill 800 feet high On inquiry, I found that sentinels were placed both below and above, for the purpose of preventing any one ascending or descending without an order from the town major. This regulation was adopted in consequence of the number of accidents, attended with fatal consequences, that had occurred Together with a companion, after dinner, I rambled down to the guard-house, and having found the town major there, we obtained an order to permit our ascent. The ladder is composed of steps more than three feet in width, and some four inches in breadth, firmly fastened in sides of great strength On either side is a hand rail of such a width that you can conveniently lay a hand on either side The steps are upward of 18 inches apart, and great numbers of them much decayed At regular distances are small seats for resting places On one side, without the ladder, a description of slide has been formed, along which pulleys are fixed, for the purpose, it would seem, of raising anything from the town beneath, or lowring from the fort above The face of the hill, against which the ladder is erected, is exteremly steep, so as utterly to preclude the idea of any ascent without artificial means; in places there are perfect precipices, the rocks completely overhanging At the bottom we found no sentry, and so proceeded to ascend at once, but had not attained above the height of one hundred feet when we heard a voice hailing us, and perceived a sentry calling on us to return, who in his walk had been concealed from us when below by an intervening projection Down we had to go, and having shown our pass, and satisfied the Cerberus, commenced our ascent again At first we proceeded rapidly, but soon found that not to answer, the height of each step causing considerable exertion More slowly then we moved along, attained the third resting place, where we seated ourselves and turned round to view the town beneath, with its narrow streets and confined situation, cowering, as it were, between the two mighty hills that seemed to press it on either side Aloft we turned our eyes, anxiously wishing ourselves at the top, but we had the best part of the ascent yet to accomplish, and to our task once more we went As we attained a greater height, we found the steps getting more and more out of repair, in some places two or three steps together broken so that we had to clamber up the best way we could On, on we went, with alternate rests; the town, the bay and shipping beneath gradually became more mute the moving bodies seeming almost mutes. When we reched within a hundred feet of the top, the unusual fatigure almost overpowered us—the dizzy height so affected us that we felt as if we could scarce preserve ourselves from falling; yet we preserved, and did succeed in reaching the top A moment later one human being would have passed into another world My companion, who was before me, had scarce passed the gate at the top, when he fainted, completely overcome; and he afterword declared to me, that for the last hundred feet or so, nothing prevented his physical energies from being overcome by the fatigue and the position he was in. but the immediate prospect of reaching a place of safety. Many lives have been lost on this ladder, particularly those passengers, whom curiosty induced to attempt the ascent. The artillerymen and garrison of the fort are not (however used to going up and down) exempt from casualities; and it was only the very week before my visit to St. Halena, that an artilleryman was killed, in attempting to descend the ladder against time for a wager. Ladder-Hill fort completely hangs over the bay; it is of great strength, and commands the roadstead beneath. In the batteries are mounted generally eighteen twenty-four and thirty-two pounders; but there are some few guns of a larger calibre. A singular accident happened a few years previous on this battery. A passenger from one of the ships in the bay had ascended to the fort, and looking from the ramparts of one of the batteries, perceived his vessel beneath, and thought he could reach her with a stone; but in his attempt to do so overbalanced himself, and fell from the awful heigh', being dashed litterally to pieces in the fall. After passing an hour at the fort, we descended, but by the road, which is cut in a ziz-zag manner in the side of the hills—From "Reminiscenes of a Nine Years' Travel," in the Liverpool Times. —Ibid

HEAT AND COLD—AMERICA AND PERSIA—By the last accounts from the United States the heat appears to have been intense. The 13th of July has already acquired the soubriquet of "the hot Sunday," the thermometer having reached 98 degrees, in the shade at three P M. There are strange accounts of the weather from Erzeroom On the 21st of June a heavy snow storm set in, which lasted for eight and forty hours, The thermometer fell to 27 1 2 degrees Farenheit. The snow in the town itself was a foot and a half deep, and on the tops of the mountains four or five feet. The weather in the Black Sea was at the time wintry and dreadful. Many persons perished by the capsizing of boats; and it is apprehended that the blockading squadron of Rusia, on the cost of Abiscia, will have suffered.—Ibid

CORNISH MINES.

Amongst the various mines of Cornwall, one of the most interesting, as well as the most wildly situated, is the Levant copper and tin mine, in the parish of St. Just, near the Land's End. Its principal operations are carried on upon the summit of the cliffs and on and under the rocks, which brave the fury of the western ocean. At the base of the precipice, at the termination of a narrow and deep chasm in the rocks, and almost on a level with high-water mark, is seen the entrance of the adit, or the outlet by which the water is discharged from the mine into the sea; a little higher up appears the mouth of the shaft, by which the workmen descend by ladders into the mine; and on the summit of the cliff is the principal shaft, and a small steam engine, by which the mine is drained, and the ore drawn up to the surface. From this shaft, which is nearly three hundred and fifty yards in depth, are carried several horizontal galleries, called levels, at different depths, both eastward and westward. The highest level is twenty-eight, and the deepest three hundred yards below the adit, and as the shaft is very near the shore, most of the western levels are immediately under the sea; some of them have been excavated nearly two hundred yards horizontally in that direction. As deep as the sixty-six yards level, not only the roaring of the sea in stormy weather, but the ordinary breaking of the waves on the rocks and the rolling of the pebbles on the beach, are distinctly heard by the miners, but without the slightest apprehension of danger. At the one hundred and eight yards level; the miners hear the sea dashing against the rocks during storms, but not at other times; in the deeper level, it is not heard at all. The water drawn from the mine is quite brackish; but so very close is the texture of the rock, that although the mine is so deep, and the rock is penetrated in so many parts directly under the ocean, the quantity of water is surprisingly small. In the month of October last it did not exceed sixteen gallons per minute; which is as nothing, when compared with the quantity drawn from some of the large mines in the central mining district of Cornwall, from one of which was discharged in the same month upwards of eighteen hundred gallons per minute.

The whole scene is uncommonly picturesque. The sides of the chasm are covered with dark gray and yellow lichens. The gleams of the early sun falling around produce a beautiful effect—the wild arena of industry, and the piles of rich ore on the summit, all vived with light, while the shadow is on the stern precipice, and on the sea beneath. The narrow path from the summit to the opening into the mine winds down the face of the cliff, and at every turn there are sheds erected, where the workman are accustomed to change their dresses before they descend, and when they again emerge from the mine. A stranger, who from the summit of the cliff, during the storm, should view the miners winding down a path so narrow that the smallest deviation would be fatal, and then descending a shaft on whose very verge the sea broke feriously, would naturally be filled with alarm and apprehension for their safety; but the most interesting, as well as picturesque sight, perhaps, is that of the miners issuing from the shaft, in their mining dresses, (coloured by a solution of the red oxide of iron, of which some of the veins contain a large quantity,) with the dim lights in their hands, their faces streaked with mud, and almost as red as their clothes.

The principal produce of Levant is copper ore of that kind called the gray sulphuret of copper; a large protion of which contains from twenty to thirty per cent. of pure copper. Although a very small mine, it has been a very profitable one. The largest profit gained at any period was in August and September last, and amounted, in those two months, to three thousand pounds. The number of persons employed is about three hundred; viz. two hundred men in the interior of the mine, and one hundred persons on the surface.

The last visit paid to this wild scene was on a dreary evening at the close of autumn; the rain fell heavily, a storm was gathering on the waters, and the dark clouds swept hurredly along. The murmur of the waves on the solitary beach is beautiful but not here,—for it is mingled with the confused sound of voices, the clang of hummers far below, and the hissing sound of the steam issuing from the engine on the edge of the precipice,—to look down which was an animating yet fearful sight. It was the stern conflict of man with nature, even in her rudest holds,—the victory was his! On the right is a little building called the counting-house where the affairs of the mine are transacted and the adventurers meet to dine and share their profits. It is seldom that man can be led in the same hour the full enjoyment of the picturesque, a sumptuous repast, and a rich check on the banker at the close. The wild expanse of the north sea, its heavy sound on the dark cliffs, the clash of circling glasses within, and the excited voices dwelling on golden hopes and glorious speculations, make strange and beautiful harmony to the adventurer's ear, The rain continued to fall piteously; the sheds in the downward path offered a welcome shelter. The roofs of these sheds are fastened with chains, lest the wind should sweep them away. At this moment the miners began to issue from the shaft near the edge of the sea, one by one they came, the candle feebly burning in each hand, the only light that was now abroad. The pallid faces and weary step of these daring and successful men offered a striking contrast to the fearfulness of the tempest, with which many a bark was struggling. They were like the phantoms of the lost mariners in the Eastern tale, which sternly issue from the deep to wander round the Golden Isle, for the thirst of whose soil they had perished.—Friend

"This morning, April 1 a half-past eleven precisely, the unfortunate young man, Mr. Edwin Pinkney, underwent the extreme penalty of infatuation, by expiating his attachment to Mary Ann Gale in front of the altar railings of St. Mary's Church Islington.

"It will be in the recollection of all those friends of the parties who were at the Joneses' party at Brixton two years ago, that Mr. Pinkney was there, and there first introduced to Mary Ann, to whom he instantly began to direct particular attentions—dancing with her no less than six sets that evening, and handing her things at supper in the most devoted manner. From that period commenced the intimacy between them which terminated in this morning's catastrophe.

"Poor Pinkney had barely attained to his twenty-eight year; but there is reason to believe that but for reasons of a pecuniary nature, his single life would have come earlier to an untimely end. A charge for the better, however, having occurred in his circumstances, the young lady's friends were induced to sanction his addresses, and thus to become ancestories to the course for which he has just suffered.

"The unhappy man passed the last night of his bachelor existence in his solitary chamber. From half-past eight to ten he was busily engaged in writing letters. Shortly after ten o'clock, his younger brother Henry knocked at the door, and the doomed youth told him in a firm voice to come in. On being asked when he meant to go to bed, he replied, 'Not yet.' The question was then put to him how he thought he should sleep, to which his answer was 'I don't know.' He then expressed a desire for a cigar and a glass of grog, which were supplied him. His brother, who sat down and partook of the like refreshment, now asked if there was anything he would want, why he [illegible] 'Nothing,' in a firm voice. His brother then rose to take leave, and considerately advised him to get some sleep.

"Precisely at [illegible] next morning, the valet of the unfortunate man called according to his custom, and found his master fully dressed. He had the self-control to shave himself with the slightest injury; for not even a scratch upon his chin appeared after the operation. It would seem that he devoted a larger time to his toilet than usual.

"The wretched individual was attired in a light blue dress-coat with frosted metal buttons, a white waistcoat and nankeen trousers, with patent leather boots. He wore round his neck a variegated satin scarf, which partially concealed the Corazza of his bosom. In front of the scarf was inserted a breast-pin of very conspicuous dimensions. Having descended the staircase with a quick step, he entered the apartment where his brother and a few friends were awaiting him. He shook hands cordially with all present; and on being asked how he had slept, answered 'Very well;' and to the father demand as to the state of his mind, he said 'He felt happy.'

"One of the party having hereupon suggested that it would be as well to take something before the melancholy service was gone through, he exclaimed with some emphasis, 'Decidedly.' Breakfast was accordingly served; when he ate the whole of a French roll, a large round of toast, two sausages, and three new-laid eggs, which he washed down with two great breakfast-cups of tea. In reply to an expression of astonishment on the part of a person present, at his appetite, he declared that he never felt it heartier in his life.

"Having inquired the time, and ascertained that it was ten minutes to eleven, he remarked that 'it would soon be over.' His brother then inquired if he could do anything for him; when he said he should like a glass of ale. Having drunk this, he appeared satisfied.

"The fatal moment now approaching, he devoted the remaining brief portion of his time to distributing among his friends those little articles which he would soon no longer want. To one he gave his cigar case, to another his tobacco-stopper, and he charged his brother Henry with his latch-key, with instructions to deliver it, after all was over, with due solemnity to his landlady.

"The clock at length struck eleven; and at the same moment he was informed that a cab was at the door. He merely said, 'I am ready,' and allowed himself to be conducted to the vehicle; into which he got with his brother—his friends followed in others.

"Arrived at the tragical spot, a short but anxious delay of some seconds took place; after which they were joined by the lady with her friends. Little was said on either side, but Miss Gale, with customary decorum, shed tears. Pinkney endeavored to preserve a composure; but a slight twitching of his mouth and eyebrowls proclaimed his inward agitation.

"The ill-stared bachellor having submitted quietly to have a large white bow pinned to his buttonhole, now walked, side by side with Miss Gale, with a firm step to the altar. He surveyed the imposing preparations with calmness, and gazed unmoved, on the clergyman, who, assisted by the clerk, was waiting behind the railings.

"All requisite preliminaries having now been settled, and the prescribed melancholy formalities gone through, the usual question was put, 'Wilt thou have this woman for thy wife?' To which the rash youth replied in a distinct voice, 'I will.' He then put the fatal ring upon Miss Gale's finger; the hymeneal noose was adjusted; and the poor fellow was launched into matrimony."—Punch.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, OCTOBER 21 1847.

The aspect of affairs at Little Bassa has become so threatening, that some of the Factors there, have removed their families and apart of their effects.

We learn that Cape Palmas and the surrounding region, have been and are now suffering from an unusual drought, and in consequence there is a total failure of the crops.

Accidents.

The schooner Major Bowen owned by the Messrs Mc Gills, went ashore a few weeks ago, on the south beach of the cape, and is very much damaged.

The colonial schooner Cavalla, belonging to the Maryland Colonization Society, capsized near Cape Palmas, some time in last month. She subsequently sunk in deep water, and has not been found.

The revival and reformation which commenced at the Baptist Union Meeting, at New-Georgia, and of which we gave an account in our last number, have extended to other settlements and to other churches. At this time there are twelve candidates for baptism at New-Georgia: among them are two of the Africans by the Pons. There are nine in this place (Monrovia) and more are expected to come forward on Wednesday evening, and others are earnestly seeking the forgiveness of sins. We continue our meetings every evening for exhortation and prayer. Our Methodist brethren have shared in the gracious outpouring, and have had a considerable accession to their number. We attend these meetings regularly, and as we have to labor daily and diligently for the little food and raiment which fall to our share, we hope we will be judged leniently for the paucity of editorial.

SELECTED EXTRACTS

Tasso's Wish. — Tasso being told that he had an opportunity of taking advantage of a very bitter enemy—"wish not to plunder him," said he; "but there are things that I wish to take from him—not his honor, his wealth nor his life, but his ill will."—And that is the true philosophy. This meeting of hate with hate, cherishing a serpent in the besom to sting and goad us, is unwise and unprofitable, common though it be. The better plan is to endeavor, like Tasso, to prove to those who hate us that they are mistaken in their estimate, and to regard all personal hostilities in no other point of view, than as a stimulus to our own improvement. "Good haters," though Dr. Johnson admired them, are a very uncomfortable species of people, subjecting themselves to torments which might easily be avoided, and devoting time to self-annoyance, that might be much more pleasantly employed. And perhaps the same reasoning bears as strongly upon all other exasperations of temper. Having disposed of hate, what is really more ridiculous than this matter of getting one's self into a passion, which exhausts our health and vitality, injures digestion, spoils good looks, alienates friends, renders us dissatisfied with ourselves and all around us, and after all, does no good whatever. Rather let us have as many agreeable sensations as possible; and then how pleasantly we should go on, with our irregular passions and frantic fiercenesses all in subjection to moral government. This, indeed, is the only perfect sanity—all the rest—hates, envies, angers and the whole crowd of the malevolences, in whatever form they may present themselves—are really passing insanities—for if protracted beyond the moment—suppose us raging and hating for a continuous week—what is that but madness? And to call things by their right names, how would it do to say not that we were angry this morning, but that we were actually non. com., for a certain number of minutes? It might operate as a corrective.—Try it.

FORTUNE NOT BLIND.
OR THE AVARICIOUS MILLER.

Men are themselves blind, who describe Fortune without sight. No first-rate beauty ever had finer eyes, or saw more clearly: they who have no other trade but seeking their fortune, need never hope to find her; coquet like she flies from her close pursuers" and at last fixes on the plodding mechanic, who stays at home and minds his business.

I am amazed how men can call her blind, when by the company she keeps she seems so very discerning. Wherever you see a gaming table, be assured fortune is not there; wherever you see a house with the doors open, be very sure Fortune is not there; when you see a man whose pocket-holes are laced with gold, be satisfied Fortune is not there; wherever you see a beautiful woman good-natured and obliging, be convinced Fortune is never there. In short, she is ever seen accompanying industry, and as often trundling a wheel-barrow as lolling in a coach and six.

If you would make Fortune your friend, or to personise her no longer, if you desire, my son, to be rich and have money, be more eager to save than to acquire: when people say, "Money is to be got here, and money is to be got there," take no notice; mind your own business; stay where you are, and secure all you can get, without stirring. When you hear that your neighbor has picked up a purse of gold in the street, never run out into the same street, looking about you in order to pick up such another; or when you are informed that he has made a fortune in one branch of business, never change your own in order to be his rival—Do not desire to be rich all at once, but patiently add farthing to farthing Perhaps you despise the petty sum; and yet they who want a farthing, and have no friend that will lend them it, think farthings very good things. Whang, the foolish miller, when he wanted a farthing in his distress, found that no friend would lend, because they knew he wanted. Did you ever read the story of Whang in our books of Chinese learning? he who despising small sums, and grasping at all, lost even what he had.

Whang, the miller, was naturally avaricious; nobody loved money better than he, or more respected those that had it.—When people would talk of a rich man in company, Whang would say, I know him very well; he and I have been long acquainted, he and I are intimate; he stood for a child of mine; but if a poor man was mentioned, he had not the least knowledge of the man; he might be very well for for aught he knew; but he was not fond of many acquaintances, and loved to choose his company.

Whang, however, with all eagerness for riches, was in reality poor; he had nothing but the profits of his mill to support him; but though these were small, they were certain: while his mill stood and went, he was sure of eating; and his frugality was such that he every day laid some money by, which he would at intrevals count and contemplate with much satisfaction. Yet still his acquisitions were not equal to his desires he only found himself above want, whereas he desired to be possessed of affluence.

One day, as he was indulging these wishes he was informed that a neighbor of his had found a pan of money under ground, having dreamed of it three nights running before. These tidings were daggers to the heart of poor Whang. "Here am I," says he, "toiling and moiling from morning till night for a few paltry farthings, while neighbor Hunks only goes quietly to bed, and dreams himself into thousands before morning. O that I could dream like him! with what pleasure would I dig round the pan; how slily would I carry it home, not even my wife should see me; and then, O the pleasure of thrusting one's hand into a heap of gold up to the elbow!"

Such reflections only served to make the miller unhappy; he disscontinued his former assiduity; he was quite disgusted with small gains, and his customers began to forsake him. Every day he repeated the wish, and every night laid himself down in order to dream. Fortune, that was for a long time unkind, at last seemed to smile upon his distresses, and indulged him with the wished-for vision. He dreamed that under a certain part of the foundation of his mill there was concealed a monstrous pan of gold and diamonds, buried deep in the ground, and covered with a large flat stone. He rose up, thanked the stars that were at last pleased to take pity on his sufferings and concealed his good luck from every person, as is usual in money dreams, in order to have the vision repeated the two succeeding nights, by which he should be certain of its veracity. His wishes in this also were answered; he still dreamed of the same pan of money, in the very same place.

Now, therefore, it was past a doubt; so getting up early the third morning, he repairs alone, with a matock in his hand, to the mill, and began to undermine that part of the wall to which the vision directed. The first omen of success that he met was a broken mug; digging still deeper, he turns up a house-tile, quite new and entire. At last, after much digging, he came to a broad flat stone, but then so large, that it was beyond one man's strength to remove it.

"Here,' cried he in raptures to himself, 'here it is! under this stone there is room for a very large pan of diamonds indeed. I must even go home to my wife, tell her the whole affair; and get her to assist me in turning it up." Away therefore he goes, and acquaints his wife with every circumstance of their good fortune. Her raptures on this occasion easily may be imagined; she flew round his neck, and embraced him in an agony of joy; but those transports, however, did not delay their eagerness to know the exact sum: returning, therefore; speedily to the place where Whang had been digging, there they found—not indeed the expected treasure, but the mill underminded and fallen.—The Sun.

NEW GOODS!

The least that I can say is, that my stock is large in the total, being very near half the Barque Montgomery's tonage. But small in the variety varieties. It is therefore, useless to attempt to articulate the assortments of staple and fancy Dry goods the new fashions of both Europe and America, Groceries, Hardware, provisions, drugs, medicines, and dye stuffs. And that minutia of things which pertain to ladies taste. Let all imagine that they can get almost any thing at Roy's new store, on the fairest terms. And and every thing will be sold for cash down, or the products which will bear exportation. Store in Rev. B. R. Wilson's stone store house on Broad St.

EDWARD J. ROYE

Oct. 23rd, 1847.
Monrovia.

CO-PARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile business under the firm of Samuel F. Mc Gill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MC GILL,
R. S. MC GILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

ROSES FROM EARLY RISING

Belles that rise and walk apace,
Steal roses from Aurora's face;
But when they yawn in bed till ten,
Aurora steals them back again.

He was no Norman, who remarked, that going to law, was the art of cutting one's throat with a pen.

It isstated that when the first Congress met after adoption of the Federal Constitution, it was in contemplation, but afterwards abandoned, to have the seats of each delegation wrought with some device; descriptive of the staples of their several States. viz:

New Hampshire to be represented by a pine tree.

Massachusetts by a barrel of fish.

Rhode Island, a hamper of cheese

Connecticut an ox.

New York, a hogshead of flaxseed.

New Jersay, a bundle of flax.

Pennsylvania, a bag of wool.

Maryland, pig and bar iron.

Virginia, a hogshead of tobacco

North Carolina, a barrel of tar.

South Carolina, a bag of cotton.

Georgia, a barrel of rice.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	$	10
Beads, pound,	"	25	38
Beef, cargo No. 1,	Bb	16 00	17 00
Blue Baffs,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00
Butter,	Firkin	30	12 00
Boards,	1000/ft	30 00	35
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	40 00
Cheese,	"	none	50
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	18
Checks domestic,	Ps	12
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	12	14
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8	15 00
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	12 00
Guns,	Box	70 00	1 50
Iron, bars,	Cwt	none	75 00
Lead, pig,	"	none	50 00
Lard,	Keg,	15
Lime,	Bushel,	50	10
Molasses	Gallon	45
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	50
Nails	Keg	8 00	1 00
Oil paint	Gallon	none	00
Oil palm	"	33 1-3
Pork	Bbl	15 00	34
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	18 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	10 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none	16 00
Porter.	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2
Romauls	Ps.	1 00
Salt	Ton	none	1 25
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 00
Tobacco	1000/lbs.	none
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00	10 00
Wine hock	"	8 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	10 00
			20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Oct. 1. Am. Ship Madonna, R. E. Lawlin master, fifty days from New York.

" 4. Am. barque Montgomery, Hooper master, fifty four days from New York: passengers, Mr. Edward J. Roye son and daughter, and Messrs S. S. Herring, Archibauld and Wald.

" " British schooner Mary Ann, Walker master, from Grand Bassa.

" 5. Am. schooner I. B. Gager, J. R. Brown supercargo, from New York, via Sierra Leone.

" 7 Lib. Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, from leeward.

" " Lib. schooner Perseverance, Jones master, from leeward.

" 9. H. B. M. Sloop-of war Favorite, Murray Esq. commander from leeward.

" 15 Am. schooner I. B. Gager, J. R. Brown supercargo from Grand Bassa.

" 17 Lib. sloop Independence, Barbour master, from leeward.

" " Lib. schooner Teazer, Summan master, from leeward.

" " Am. ship Madonna, R. E. Lawlin master from Cape Palmas: passenger, Rev. F. Burns.

" 21 Hamburg brig Sylphide J. Sidles supercargo, from leeward.

DEPARTURES.

Oct. 4 Am. ship Madonna, R. E. Lawlin master, for leeward.

" 6. British schooner Mary Ann, Walker master, for Grand Bassa.

" 8. Hamburg brig Thora, A. E. Frahman master, for leeward.

" 10 Am. schooner I. B. Gager, J. R. Brown supercargo for Grand Bassa.

" 12 H. B. M. Sloop-of-war Favorit, Murry Esq commander, for windward.

" " Lib. schooner Perseverance, Jones master, for leeward

Am. barque Montgomery, Hooper master, for leeward

" 16 Lib. Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, for leeward

" 18 Am. schooner I. B. Gager, Brown supercargo for New York, via Sierra Leone.

" 19 Lib sloop Economy, Chase master, for leeward

" 20 Am ship Madonna, R E Lawlin master, for leeward: passenger, Rev F Burns.

POETRY.

From the Living Age

THE LONGING.

From out this dim and gloomy hollow,
Where hang the cold clouds heavily,
Could I but gain the clue to follow,
How blessed would the journey be!
Afar I see a fair dominion,
Through time and change all vernal still:
But where the power, and what the pinion;
To gain the ever-blooming hill!

Afar I hear the music ringing,
The inlong sounds of heaven repose,
And the light gales are downward bringing
The sweets of flowers the mountain knows.
I see the fruit all golden glowing,
Beckon the glossy leaves between;
And o'er the blooms that there are blowing,
Nor blight, nor winter's wrath hath been.

To suns that shine forever yonder,
O'er fields that fade not, sweet to flee:
The very winds that waft me wander,
How healing must their breathing be!
But lo! between us rolls a river,
A death in every billow raves;
I feel the soul within me shiver,
To gaze upon the gloomy waves.

A rocking boat mine eyes discover,
But, woe is me! the pilot fails!
In, boldly, in undaunted power!
And trust the life that swells the sails.
Thou must believe, and thou must venture,
In fearless faith thy safety dwells:
By miracles, alone, men enter
The glorious land of miracles!

MISCELLANEOUS

From the Friend.

ANCIENT EGYPTIANS NOT NEGROES.

The last number of "The Friend" contained a piece signed J. A. J., respecting the ancient Egyptians, which is very likely to mislead a great many readers as to a point, upon which the following extract from the works of Professor Heeren, of Gottingen, may be thought to throw some light. Indeed it appears to me to be conclusive and unanswerable. Heeren understands his subject perfectly, and is, moreover, distinguished by extensive learning, and an acute and philosophical mind. His researches into antiquity have been more successful than those of almost any other man, and his opinions are formed, not from a hasty view of detached morsels of evidence but from a diligent investigation and scrutinizing comparison of all the materials within his reach. PH.

"The first object of enquiry is the colour, the figure, in short, the whole exterior of the inhabitants; so far as it may enable us to unravel the intricate question respecting the race of mankind to which the ancient Egyptians belonged. A problem, indeed, much more difficult to solve than the reader at first sight could possibly imagine.

"There are two sources from which we may draw, in our endeavour to determine it: ancient writers and native monuments. Among the first, the testimony of Herodotus alone would seem sufficient to decide it. He, speaking as an eye-witness, expressly declares the Egyptians to be a black race, with woolly hair. It easily appears, however, that these assertions must be limited in two ways: first, they apply only to the great body of the people, and not to the upper classes; secondly, the expression does not exactly signify a completely black, but rather a dark brown, nor the hair completely woolly, (but rather curly.) Another ancient writer upon the colour of the Egyptians determines this, when he calls them brown. To me the Egyptians seem to have been exactly what the Copts, their descendants, now appear to the stranger who visits them. 'I believe,' says a modern who has seen them, 'the ancient race of the Egyptians to exist in the present Copts; a kind of dark-coloured Nubians, (basannes,) much as they are seen on the ancient monuments; flat foreheads, half woolly hair, the eyes rather staring, high lips, the nose rather short than flat, a large mouth with thick lips, placed rather distant from the nose, a thin and poor beard, few graces of body,' &c. 'The colour of the skin,' says a latter traveller, 'is nearly the natural colour, if we assume that the Egyptians were of the same colour as their descendants, the present Copts, of whom some are as fair as Europeans. However true, therefore, the statement of Herodotus may be, the reader must guard against giving it a meaning which it will not bear. Besides few countries are so much exposed to the invasion of foreigners, and therefore to so many intermixtures as Egypt, which is surrounded on three sides by nomaid hordes; nor so much visited by strangers, as it has always been a principal place of trade. To this it may be added, that the question here respects a period comprising above a thousand years (for so long certainly had Egypt been civilized before the time of Herodotus,) during which many changes must naturally have taken place.

"The truth of this remark will be best confirmed by the monuments of ancient Egypt which still exist; especially by those which have been lately discovered. A number of variously sized idols has hitherto been generally referred to, from which we should judge of the physigmony of the people. I confess, that in the least of these, I find somethin, of the negro kind, but then it must be considered, that we can neither fix the time when, nor the part of the land where they were made; a question of the highest importance, because, as will be seen hereafter, every part of the country had not always the same face with the rest. It is most agreeable to the rules of sound criticism, first to have recourse to those monuments—the temples and obelisks—of which we can with certainty pronounce, that they belong to the flourishing period of the Pharaohs. These are nearly all covered with works of art which contain a great number of human figures, either of deities or men, and on that account deserve first to be examined. They acquire, moreover, a great additional value, from their clearly indicating an endeavour in the artists to copy nature, and from their faithfully representing the peculiarities of the different people, their features, nature of their hair and so forth. The same proofs that this was the case are found here, upon the temples of Thebais, as upon the ruins of Persepolis in Asia; necessity must have led to it, if the historical meanings were wished to be really understood, and from this it probably became a rule of ancient art. It is impossible, however, to compare these monuments, as they are now deliniated, and to consider the people who erected them to have been negroes, or any thing like negroes. I appeal here to the great historical bas-reliefs upon the temples at Thebes, with which Denon has first made us acquainted. The figure of the king comes before us at different times, and upon different occasions. It is always the same head; so that, according to the writer himself, it seems to be a portrait—or rather an ideal portrait. But it is so far from having the least appearance of African liniaments, that it seems rather to approach the Grecian profile. Just as little resemblance is there to be seen of the negro in more than a hundred heads of his attendants, as well warriors as priests. I appeal as well to the other reliefs upon all the temples above Thebes, so far as they are made known to us in the great work upon Egypt. I appeal finally, to the very accurately finished plate of the representations upon the obelisks, for which we are indebted to Zoiga. Compare also the heads of the sphynxes and deities upon the top of the obelisk on Mount Citalorio, and the similar fragment of another in the museum of Cardinal Borgia, and see if there be any thing to be found of a negro character.

"Should even these proofs fail, the Egyptians have left us still another, in the pictures on the walls in their chambers of the dead. The colours in these are still so fresh and perfect, as to excite the astonishment of every one who examines them. The subjects mostly relate to the domestic life of the Egyptians: the human figure is consequently very frequent. Every thing else is faithfully copied from nature, and therefore it is fair to conclude that these are also. Bruce has already called the attention of the world to these pictures in the royal sepulchres of Thebes; but it was the French expedition that first gave us a clear notion of them, by the labours of the learned who took the pains to examine them. The first striking specimen of them is given in the sepulchres of Eluthias, in the Thebias, the true school for Egyptian antiquities, because they represent their whole manner of living, and almost every part of their domestic economy. Women as well as men are here portrayed; 'the men are red, the women yellow, the clothes white; the hair of the men is very dark, curled, but not short, as among the negroes.' Still clearer proofs are found in the royal sepulchres of Thebes, and, above all, in that most magnificent one which was opened by Belzoni. In these, the light and dark men are expressly distinguished; and indeed, in such a manner, that the former are represented as the victors, or rulers, and the latter as the conquered, or prisoners. 'I remarked,' says Denon, 'many decapitated figures; these were all dark; while those who had struck off their heads, and still stood sword in hand, were red.' But the most decisive proof is in that of Belzoni, where [illegible] the light and dark, but, in [illegible] victors, the three principal [illegible] brown, and black, are distinguished from one another with the [illegible] racy. Indeed, when Denon describes one of the openings, which lead to these subterranean abodes, he found are in a still more certain manner confirmed by nature. A number of mummies, which were not bandaged up, showed plainly that the hair was long and lank, and the shape of the head itself approximating to the beautiful. There is no need, however, to journey into Egypt to be convinced of this: the descriptions, and the mummies preserved at Munich, are quite sufficient to ensure conviction.

"To this body of evidence there are still documentary proofs to be added: two commercial contracts, of which the fac-simile of one is at Berlin, and the original of the other at Paris. We are indebted for their interpretation to Professor Boukh, and H. S. Martin. They certainly belonged to the period of the Ptolemys, but the names which occur, show that the persons were Egyptians. These, in both, are described according to their external appearance, and, of course their colour. In the Berlin document, the seller, Paninthes, is called of a darkish brown colour; and the buyer, honey coloured, or yellowish. The same epithet is conferred on the buyer, Osaneres, in the Parisian one. The shape of the nose and face is also stated, but so as not to raise the least idea of a negro physiognomy.

"Two facts may be deduced from all this, as historically demonstrating one, that even among the Egyptians themselves there was a difference of colour; as individuals are expressly distinguished from one another by being of a darker or lighter complexion. The other, that the higher cast of warriors and priests, according to the representations on all the monuments executed in colours, belonged to the fairer class. Their colour is brownish, something between the white and black, or swarthy. It cannot, indeed, be maintained, that the colour was exactly the same as that appropriated to them on the monuments; but it was become a fixed and settled type, and how could it have become so, if it had not followed nature, where there was no want of means to represent white and black colours. In like manner, the yellow or yellowish complexion became the standing type for women. The deities, on the contrary, both male and female, had no general distinctive colour but the individuals among them differ.

"These proofs, which seem to me irrefragable, will unquestionably acquire still greater force, when these monuments shall have been more carefully examined, and more completely copied. As it is, we may conclude, that, though it be allowed that there was a dark-coloured race in Egypt, it certainly was not the only one; but a tribe of fairer complexion, though not perhaps completely white, (for with the limited number of colours of which the Egyptians made use, and these without intermixing them, it was nearly impossible for them to give very exactly the colour of the skin,) had at least for a certain period, spread themselves over upper Egypt. We may, moreover, conclude, that this was the ruling tribe, to which the king, the priests, and warriors belonged and that the magnificent monuments of Egyptian art in this district, were erected by them."

Heads of Families. Observe the utmost respect for one anohter; maintain wholesome rule over your children; habitually inculcate good; do nothing that you would wish your children not to do; select the best school; provide school-books freely; pray occasionally with each child privaetly; maintain family worship; provide suitable religious newspaper; co-operrate with the day and Sunday School teachers; seek the spiritual good of servants; in a word, regard your own household as your principal sphere of usefulness, enjoyment and honor.

Church Members. Esteem your pastor very highly in love, for his work's sake: attend statedly on his ministrations; pray for him; sympathize with him; disclose your spiritual exercises to him; keep tattle from his ears; defend his reputation, co-operate in good plans; bring sinners to hear him preach; do a full share towards his support; lighten his burden by visiting the sick [illegible] ing in the Sunday School or Bible C and aiding the destitute poor; teach children and household to love [illegible] bring to him for conversation such as are seriously disposed.

Fasting. The duty of fasting is often forgotten. When days are appointed for this purpose few regard them. Few Christians fast privately. Alas! how many texts of scripture are thus set at nought! Read Zechariah xii. 10-14; Matt. vi. 16-18, and xvii. 21; Acts xiii. 2, 3, and xiv. 23; 2 Cor. xi. 27, and v. 3-6. When we keep a fast we should abstain from food as far as consistant with mental energy, and sometimes wholly. What we eat should be plain; be much in prayer and meditation; humble ourselves by special inspection of the heart and life; make acknowledgments not only to God; but to those whom we have offended, and relieve the suffering.

Growth in Grace. The Holy Spirit is the great efficient cause of growth in grace. It is usually effected by the diligent use of means. It is a blessing which is promised, and after which every Cristian is both commanded and inclined to aspire. HINDERANCES.—The influence of worldly relatives and companions; embarking too deeply in business; approximations to fraud for the sake of gain; foolish amusements; undue attachment to an earthly objects, neglect of prayer-meetings lanquid and formal observance, or frequent omission of religious duties; yielding to known sin.

The Rules of Giving. It has been frequently wished by Christians that some rule were laid down in the Bible, fixing the proportion of their property which they ought to contribute to religious uses. This is as if a child should go to his father and say, "Father, how many times must I come to you in the day with some testimony of my love? How often will it be necessary for me to show my love and affection for you?" The father would of course reply, "Just as often as your feelings prompt you, my child, and no oftener." Just so Christ says to his people, "Look at me, and see what I have done and suffered for you, and then give just what you think I deserve. I wish any thick forced."

It is a curious fact in natur[illegible] every colored woman of a hund[illegible] and upward, who dies any where at the South, was a servant in the house of Gen. Washington. His service appears to have been a patent for longevity.

"Genius will always work its way through," as the poet said, when he saw a hole in the elbow of his coat.

The late Lord ——, who hated his wife, whose name was Elizebeth, on her being taken suddenly ill, laid a wager she would die, which event taking place, one of his friends observed that his Lordship had won by the loss of his Bet.

"I say Bill, 'ave you seen Wotdyecallum?"

"Wot, do you mean Wots'isname?"
"O no, not'im,—that ere tother."
"Oh, ah! I seed 'im fast enuff."

A person being asked why a jail, in some parts of the United States, was called a Stone Jug," answered that it was because it sometimes contained Ardent Spitits.

There is a banker in London, who has two sons; one of them is extremely dissipated, and dresses in the pink of faskion; the other is domestic and strictly attends to the banking business; which peculiarities occasioned a wag to name the first Count, and the other Discount.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR. (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XV MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) NOVEMBER 5 1847. NO. 24

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLAR.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATE

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia,	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

For the Liberia Herald.

MESSRS EDITORS:

In an article published in Africa's Luminary of the 13th inst., signed "An Observer," impugning the labours of the ministers of Liberia; and as it appeared in the Luminary; I suppose that it was intended to effect those, who were employed in the M. E. Mission, as similar articles have heretofore been published, questioning the ability and fidelity of the ministry in Africa. I feel that we are called upon to defend ourselves from such unjust and unreasonable imputations. Modesty hitherto, have prevented me, but I can no longer be silent, though I feel myself incompetent for the task. I cannot, nor I will not, hold my peace, as the old adage is, that silence gives consent; and before God I believe it not to be true. Now let it be remembered that the ass spoke after having received several blows from his unholy master

Surely, then, there may be some allowance made for us, and let us express our opinion as well as others; and this we will endeavour to do as honestly as we know how: and sirs, you certainly do know that our motto is plainness; therefore we shall take up this subject in the most simple and plain manner, and do all the justice to it, and other matters that we are capable of

The cry is, there is no colored man to be found capable of taking charge of the African Mission, and if the attempt should be made, that such is the spirit of insubordination, that it would be a dangerous experiment. Now, sirs, my object will be to show what I believe to be true in reference to these assertions or opinions, and what I believe not to be true. To do this, so as to bring the subject fully before your readers, let us review the mission and the labourers who have been engaged in it, from the beginning to the present time;—who they were—and what they have done, and after that, I will give you my opinion of the whole matter; you will excuse day and date.

The first missionary properly authorised, coming to this country under the patronage of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was the Rev. M B Cox; this holy man arrived here in feeble health, I was the last man which shook hands with him in the U States, and he received a pledge from me, that I should join him on the shores of Africa if life last. This holy and good man, full of missionary zeal, was permitted to land here and cast his eyes upon the field, already white to harvest, but not permitted to thrust in the sickle, as he closed his eyes in death, and went to his reward, without as much as laying a foundation for others to build upon. The church here was still left in the hands of the citizens of this place.

I arrived here on the last day of December 1833, and in the same ship came Missionaries. The Rev. Rufus Spaulding and lady, and Rev. Mr Wright and lady, and Miss Farington of the M. E. Mission, and four white missionaries of the Presbyterian order: myself a visitor. At the same time I was a regular ordained Methodist Minister, but had no connection with the mission. We all came ashore with prospects quite pleasing:—soon the ministers residing in this colony, were called together in conference by the Superintendent. Here I cast in my lot as a labourer with the rest of the brethren, without promise or pay, as did many of my brethren of this place. I was then set off for Monrovia station, and here commenced my labours in Africa. Soon I was called in quick succession to conduct the bodies of the beloved Wright and lady to the silent mansions of the tomb, in the morning of their life. The Rev. Mr. Spalding and lady lingered under disease for a few months, then resigning their charge, returned to their home. Miss Farington remained about fourteen months, and was not able to accomplish any thing, on account of ill health. The missionaries of the other order, were cut down in like manner, only one of the four above mentioned, were permitted to return after suffering from the disease of climate a few months.

The Church though forsaken by her white brethren, the God of Jacob stood with us, and blessed our labours and revived his work.

In July 1834, Rev. John Seys, and Rev. Francis Burns arrived, and such was the state of the church on his arrival that he made no changes nor alterations, but laid too as a fellow labourer with the rest of the brethren. In reference to his labours, we will speak hereafter. The following year the Rev. John B. Barton, Missionary from the Georgia Conference, though a holy and good man, you well know that his time was very short with us;—after him Rev. Squire Chase, Burton, and Stocker, arrived, all good and holy men. But dear sirs, tell me how much labour were they permitted to perform, before they were all cut off or had to remove? You well know that some of them were sick the whole time: Pingree with the rest: here life and health were all sacrificed, and nothing accomplished by these dear brethren.

Now if the church depended on white men, where would it have been in all these disappointments? two years we were left without a Superintendent or a white missionary, and never was the work more prosperous than then; if for more than twelve years there has not been but one white man, who have been able to stand the climate, so as to do effective service, and he absent from time to time. Now, let me ask, who have kept up the church and mission in Liberia? At Cape Palmas, Tubman Town, Mount Emory, Barraka and Sardoka, &c. We hear of the work of God prospering; what white missionary have been labouring in these fields: or done more than make a visit?

At Sinoe, Edina, Monrovia, New Georgia, Caldwell, White Plains, Millsburg, Heddington, Robertsville, Morris-Burgh and Mount Andrew.

I would ask again what have white missionaries done in establishing at any of these stations? I can tell you perhaps as much about it as any body. We have done the work, and they have written; and still they tell us, the mission cannot go on, unless it is carried on by white men

Now let me ask again where is W. B. Williams, W. B. Hoyt, and their ladies, who in company with the Rev. John B Benhan, landed here in November, 1845; and how much were accomplished by them before cut down by death or had to remove on account of sickness? The Rev. Mr. Benham only is left as a labourer, and he undergoing from time to time, severe afflictions, from the disease of the climate, so as to disqualify him, from travelling to any considerable extent.

Now let me ask, who have been in the field all this time, and are still at their posts, carrying on the work? the answer is at hand:—a Williams, Wilson, Herring, Johnson Moore, Ware, Burns, Simpson, Roberts, Payne, Russel, Byrd, &c, who are all at this day at their posts.

Now I have taken this course to show that the work in Liberia do not depend upon white men, if it had, under these circumstances there must have been an entire failure long before this day,—but not so,—and to prove it is not so, let us examine the state of the Church at the present time, notwithstanding that the late "An Observer," have made some wonderful discoveries, which, by the way are not true, and I do hope that he will put on his specks when he makes his second tour, through the length and breadth of Liberia; so as to detect the evils therein and not to send forth to the world falsehoods upon the ministers, and citizens of the land.

In his first paragraph he tells us there are with us thieves, liars, tattlers, busy-bodies in other men's matters, and he takes the boldness to accuse the ministry because they are not exempted from these evils as a community. Now let me ask "An Observer," if he has not given fuel to none of these fires? If he has not, we shall expect his name in the next publication, so that we may send it forth to the world, that one Liberian has aspired to perfection's greatest height. I would ask him again has he ever visited the popular cities in the United States? and does he take the papers of England? and if he does, I will ask him what is the state of morals in these christian lands, where a single Conference of one denomination, sends forth from 150 to two hundred preachers? and numbers of others labouring within the same compass. Then let me ask him if the morals of these christian lands are better than in Liberia as a general thing,—the answer must be, from every man who has any knowledge of the fact, that in point of morals, Liberia stands on par with any community in the world. Now to prove this, in Liberia three fourths at least, of all persons who have reached to years of discretion, are regular members of some one of the christian churches. And the Governor with all the officers of State, bow at the sacred altar; all judges of courts, sheriffs, lawyers, and clerks of this county, belong to the christian church, and as far as I know, the same state of things exist in the other counties; with a single exception. Will you find this the case in any other country? Will not "An Observer" find himself among some of those classes, whom he named in his first paragraph? I think he will, for so wilfully slandering the people of this Republic, and so uncalled for.

Let us now see what he says in the second paragraph, now "An Observer" asks who are we to look to for reformation in these matters, and here he undertakes to accuse the ministry in a two fold sense; first with neglect of duty; secondly, with a want of ability: now let us ask by the way of comparison, if the ministers in Liberia are worse than elsewhere? and if it be true that they are, then I have mistaken my church history, or those who have published them have sent forth falsehoods to the world, and also the newspapers that comes to us constantly with the minutes, of the doings of religious bodies, are also engaged in publishing falsehoods. I will acknowledge that we are not without our faults, we are men who are subject to err as well as other men, this we will not deny. But it seems as though he would have the world to understand, that the ministers are not attending to their duty; now this is not true—now let me ask where are those men who are employed in the mission? I think at one glance I can see every man at his station. I have a tolerable good knowledge of the labourers who are now engaged in the missionary cause, of the M. E. Church, and I do affirm that they are less engaged in worldly matters at the present time, than at any other period since the establishment of the mission.

But he tells us the reading and the preaching are so poor, that men wish themselves at home, asleep, or something else. Now let me ask this "Censer" what he has been feeding upon, that his taste has become so exceedingly exquisite? at what place does he worship? if he worships in Millsburgh, Monrovia, Edina, or Cape Palmas, I am satisfied that he hears the gospel preached as well as else where, and that in its purity,—I will venture to say that he has heard more truth than he has reduced to practice, if it was not the case, he would have learned before this, that charity covereth a multitude of faults. Now I will acknowledge that our preachers are not all Solomon's for there was never but one Solomon in all Israel, but we preach the gospel, and the fruit of our labours bears testimony to our work. On this part we will say no more, as we have living witness that God's spirit attends our ministry. And if God be for us who can be against us, and it is manifest that he is for us, and he is now at work in various parts of the colony.

With a few exceptions, our preachers are certainly improving, there is one or two among us old preachers, who never studied the rules of Grammar, and cannot read well, and some times make a poor out at preaching, but have they not borne the burden and heat of the day? and kept the fire burning upon the sacred altar, before the Missionary labours occupied the field? And now what would "An Observer" have the church to do with these old labourers of the cross? will he have them to do with us, like the heathen round about us, do with their old people, build a hut in the bushes and carry them out to die, before their time comes? but to say that a majority of our preachers cannot preach the gospel clear and distinctly, is to say what is not strictly true.

I cannot say that in every place in the Conference, that Sabbath Schools and Pastoral visits are attended to as they should be, but this I know, that as far as my knowledge extends in this matter, that it is attended to, to a very happy extent.

I should like to know before I leave this subject, what they will have the preachers in Liberia to do,—will they have them to catch all the thieves, reform all drunkards, stop all busy-bodies, cut out the tongues of all the tattlers, and chain the Devil with a very short chain, or shut him up and set a seal upon him? will he have us to go about in sheep and goat's skins and our families to wander about the streets? we will not do it,—we will preach the gospel and attend to our families at the same time; this is a duty enjoined upon us from Heaven, and we will attend to it.

He tells us great sums of money are paid to the preachers for preaching the gospel, true; the Missionary Society have contributed large amounts for the support of the gospel here, but let him remember that these old preachers, preached the gospel before they were paid for it, and if the Missionary Society takes them from their families, and sends them where they think proper, they must be paid, and let him remember again, that a large amount of what is contributed goes to the support of school Teachers, building Churches, repairing of Mission Stations,—not one half goes to the support of preachers in Liberia.

He tells us in the last place that the preachers don't want any more "Pale faces" to come among them, let me ask him where did he get this low and insignificant expression from? if he originated it, we will give him the credit for it—but surely it could not originate from any minister of our body; now let me ask, if it is true, I believe not, if they can come, live and labour, I say let them come by hundreds, but if they are to come to die, get sick and return, and accomplish nothing, we think that the means of the Missionary Society; may be spent in a better way, and we do further say that we believe sincerely that the object of the Missionary Society in Africa can be carried out without so much sacrifice of life and health.—but if the Missionary Board thinks to the contrary, it is with them to do as they please,—but I think Divine Providence has marked out the course; the voice is from above and not from below; we have but one request to make, that is, not to charge us with ingratitude when we have expressed no such thing, we have always received the Missionaries with glad hearts, and have been sorry when they have failed to carry out their object. But never let it be said, that there are not suitable men in Liberia to carry out the object of the Mission, if the authorities chose to invest it in their hands. The opinion is certainly absurd, false and slanderous.

Let me draw a comparison which is evident to all; never did the affairs of Government go on so harmoniously and so advantageously to all, as it have under the administration of its own people, other institutions can find men to carry out their objects without any complaint.—The American Colonization Society, the Maryland Colonization Society, the United States Navy Department, the Southern Baptist Mission Board, all can find agents, and men to carry out their objects,—and in the name of common sense, are the Methodist Church, numbering more in society than any other christian body,—less in talent, less in honesty, and less efficient? I say in conclusion before Heaven it is not true. I am done for the present.

B. R. WILSON.

CONSUMING THEIR OWN SMOKE.—It appears from the newspapers that a number of persons have recently been fined, forty shillings each, at Manchester, England, for not consuming the smoke of their own engines, according to modern improvements in that matter, this surplusage of smoke being very properly regarded as a nuisance, when there are means of getting rid of it. It has also been suggested that it might be a good thing, especially as they seem so fond of the fume, if the individuals who luxuriate in the smoke of exceeding bad cigars, as they go streaming along the crowded thoroughfare, or work their way through the thronged market, were obliged to consume their own smoke, instead of compelling those to do it, who follow chokingly, in their wake. But there is a deal of smoke besides, which ought to be consumed by those who make it. Did it ever confuse your vision and cause your blessed little eyes to smart, that density of smoke, which politicans raise just on the eve of an election, until it is scarcely possible for you to tell who is who, or what is what! And the political newspaper, moreover, as it puffs and toils at the editorial bellows, what a thick pungent smoke rolls, from its forge, oftentimes darkening the whole land. Yet it is but smoke, after all, eddying and vaporing in its nothingness. And again, would it not be capital — capital punishment, may we not call it?—if the dealers in scandal who fire up false reports, and thus fill society with pestilential clouds, were forced to the consumption of their own smoke! It would contribute largely to the clearing up of the atmosphere! This same principle has likewise a still wider application. The world is full of smoke and of smoke makers. So much so indeed, that it is often difficult to tell what is smoke and what is reality. There is, for instance, a deal of smoke, shadowy and unsubstantial, in fame, through which men of ordinary figure loom out in gigantic proportions—Titanic, as it were. They understand the art of smoke-making; and if they should be compelled to consume their own smoke, what a "contraction of the currency" there would be. Popularity,—why what a smokeiness is here; with this peculiar feature in the smoke, that it often consumes itself. In fact more or less, we are all smoke-makers—little chimneys, striving to be as tall as we can—each in his respective stack—and each puff, puffing his pertly column of smoke into the air, as if he were a brother of Ætna or a cousion of Stromboli. Talk of throwing dust into people's eyes—nonsence!—everything is done nowadays by smoke. The modern world is ever in full blast; and perhaps it is useless to hope for a home consumption of all the smoke that is raised to keep so many balloons afloat. Stoop to it then—pile on your fresh fagots and your green wood, that you likewise may be able to create as much smoke about yourself as your neighbors. Why not?—Saturday Neal's Gazette.

From the Living Age.

ADVERTISEMENTS OF "THE TIMES."

In the wide range of periodical literature, there is no greater curiosity than the columns daily devoted to advertisements in the Times newspaper. From those ponderous pages to the future historian will be able to glean ample and correct information relative to the social habits, wants, and peculiarities of this empire. How we travel, by land or sea—how we live, and move, and have our being—is fully set forth in the different announcements which appear in a single copy of that journal. The means of gratifying the most boundless desires, or the most fastidious taste, are placed within the knowledge of any one who chooses to consult its crowded columns. Should a man wish to make an excursion to any part of the globe between Cape Horn and the North Pole, to any port in India, to Australia; to Africa, or to China, he can, by the aid of one number of the Times, make his arrangements over his breakfast. In the first column he will find which "A. 1. fine, fast-sailing, copper-bottomed" vessel is ready to take him to any of these distant ports. Or, should his travelling aspirations be of a less extended nature, he can inform himself of the names, size, horse power, times of starting, and fares, of numberless steamers which ply within the limits of British seas. Whether, in short, he wishes to be conveyed five miles—from London to Greenwich—or three thousand—from Liverpool to New York—information equally conclusive is provided here.

The head of the second, or sometimes the third column, is interesting to a more extensive range of readers—namely, to the curious; for it is generally devoted to what may be called the romance of advertising. The adverti ements which appear in that place are mysterious as melodramas, and puzzling as rebuses. Some of them are worded after the following fashion:—

"TO CHARLES.—Be at the pastry-cook's at the corner of S——street, at two. Jemima is well —Alice."

Out of such an advertisement, a novelist of ordinary tact might construct a whole plot. "Charles" is a lover; the course of whose love has been crossed by some inquisitive papa or guardian; he has been forbidden the house of his adorned Jemima. Correspondence by post is also impracticable; so the lovers advertise one another in the Times. Happily, the lady has a confidante to whom is intrusted the advertising department of the affair. The above is an assignation concocted by her ingenuity, and signed with her name.

Perhaps a week after, another announcement in the same column will furnish the novelist with the catastrophe. It runs thus:—

TO THE YOUNG LADY who was last seen at the pastry-cook's at the corner of St——street. You are implored to return home immediately, and all will be forgiven."

The fact is, Jemima met Charles punctually, and employed with him from the bun-shop. Her father has relented; and as no further advertisements can be detected from the same parties, it is fair to infer that their little family differences have been made up; that Charles and Jamima are married, and are as happy as they deserve to be. Occasionally, however, we find this interesting column occupied with notices which force upon us more painful inferences. A young man has defrauded his employers, and absconded; and his parents invoke him, by the initials of his name, to disclose the amount of his defalcations. In other instances, a cowardly bankrupt has run away from his creditors, and left his wife to bear the brunt of their importunities. She implores him, through the Times, to return and help her through the difficulty.

Beneath such brief tales of mystery are usually advertised articles which have been lost or stolen. These vary in style, from the coarse and mercenary offer of "One sovereign reward," to the delicate hint that "If the lady who took the ermine cloak away by mistake from the Marchioness of Crampton's rout on Thursday evening will send the same to the owner, her own camlet wrapper will be returned to her." One of the most refined of this class actually appeared in its proper place a few months since. As a superfine appeal to the susceptible sentiments of a couple of pickpockets, it has no equal in the history of advertising:—

"If the clever artists, male and female, who combined to relieve an elderly gentleman of his letter-case and purse on Friday evening last will return the former, with the papers it contained, they will oblige. The case and papers are of no use to them."

Succeeding the "Lost and Stolen," it is usual to find one or two of those heart-stirring appeals to the benevolent which—despite the efforts of the Mendicity Society—have maintained many an impostor in idleness for years together. Like Puff, in Sheridan's "Critic," these advertisers support themselves upon their (assumed) misfortunes, by means of the proceeds of addresses "to the charitable and humane," or "to those whom Providence has blessed with affluence." The account which Puff gives of his fictitious misfortunes so little exaggerates the advertisements which appear occasionally in the Times, that we quote it. "I suppose," he boasts, "never man went through such a series of calamities in the same space of time. I was five times made a bankrupt, and reduced from a state of affluence by a train of unavoidable misfortunes. Then, though a very industrious tradesman, I was twice burnt out, and lost my little all both times. I lived upon those fires a month. I soon after was confined by a most excruciating disorder, and lost the use of my limbs. That told very well: for I had the case strongly attested, and went about to collect the subscriptions myself! Afterwards, I was a close prisoner in the Marshalsea for a debt benevolently contracted to serve a friend. I was then reduced to—oh no—then I became a widow with six helpless children. Well, at last, what with bankruptcies, fires, gouts, dropsies, imprisonments, and other valuable calamities, having got together a pretty handsome sum I determined to quit a business which had always gone rather against my conscience." The police reports testify that pathetic advertisements, equally unfounded, find their way into the third column of the Times, despite the utmost vigilance of the clerks. Some, on the other hand, are manifestly, from objects worthy both of credit and of relief. Of the latter, we select one which appeared on the 7th of February, 1844, and which bears evident marks of genuineness. Addressing the sympathies of the benevolent by the borrowed aid of a popular fiction was a happy thought:—

TO THE BROTHERS CHEERYBLE, or any who have hearts like theirs. A clergyman, who will gladly communicate the name and address, desires to introduce the case of a gentleman, equal at least to Nicholby in birth, worthy, like him, for refinement of character, even of the best descent; like him, of spotless integrity, and powerfully beloved by friends who cannot help him, but no longer, like Nickleby, sustained by the warm buoyancy of youthful blood. The widowed father of young children, he has spent his all in the struggles of an unsuccessful but honorable business, and has now for eighteen months been vainly seeking some stipendiary employment. To all who have ever known him he can refer for commendation. Being well versed in accounts though possessed of education, talents, and experience, which would render him valuable as a private secretary, he would accept with gratitude even a clerk's stool and daily bread. Any communication addressed to the Rev. B. C.' post-office, Cambridge, will procure full particulars, ample references, and the introduction of the party, who is now in town, and ignorant of this attempt to serve him."

The succeeding couple of columns in the first page of the Times usually display the multifarious "wants" which an endless variety of desiderators are anxious to get satisfied. Situations by far outnumber the other wants. A governess, a gardener, an editor, a schoolmaster, a tailor, a clerk, or a shopman, who is in want of employment, seeks it through the pages of the Times newspaper. The accomplished, intellectual, honest moral, in short, "unexceptionable" characters, who thus paint their own portraits, give to the fourth and fifth columns of the leading journal the semblance of a catalogue of spotless worthies.

Some, again, try to gain employment by eccentric appeals. Foremost among these we place the annexed little autobiography from a person who advertised himself on the 22d of last February as

A CHARACTER.—The noblemen and gentlemen of England are respectfully informed that the advertiser is a self-taught man—a 'genius.' He has travelled (chiefly on foot) through the United Kingdom of Great Britian and Ireland, in Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Belgium, France, and Italy. He has conducted a popular periodical, written a work of fiction in three vols., published a system of theology, composed a drama, studied Hamlet, been a political lecturer, a preacher, a village schoolmaster, a pawnbrooker, a general shopkeeper; has been acquainted with more than one founder of a sect, and is now (he thanks Providence) in good health, spirits, and character, out of debt, and living in charity with all mankind. During the remainder of his life he thinks he would feel quite at home as secretary, amanuensis, or companion to any nobleman or gentleman who will engage a once erratic but now sedate being, whose chief delight consists in seeing and making those around him cheerful and happy. Address A. Z., at Mr. P——'s, B——street, Regent's Park."

It would appear that the self-surprise thus published sometimes requires a little help; hence, besides, "undoubted ability" and "unexceptionable references," a douceur is occasionally offered "to any one who will produce the advertiser a respectable situation." This "sweetener" we have known to vary from five to five thousand pounds, "according to the emoluments." Despite, however, all eccentricities, deception, and other evils, there can be no question that through the advertising columns of the Times many a servant has procured a good situation, and many a master has been indebted for a valuable servant. As a specimen men of the appeals, the truth of which it is difficult to doubt, we print the following. The fickleness of fortune is strongly exemplified by the fact of a gentleman of "high rank" seeking the humblest employment:—

"It would be a noble act of humanity if any generous and kind-hearted individual would procure or grant employment to a suffering individual, in whose behalf this appeal is made. He is of high rank, education, and manners, and in every point of view fit to fill any situation. He is without influential friends, and, from complicated frauds and misfortunes, is unable to continue the education of eight lovely children. He seeks nothing for himself, except to be so placed, giving to the hands of his kind benefactor all he receives for his children's present and future support. This will save him from a broken heart. Any situation that will enable him to effect this object will be received with heartfelt gratitude, and filled with honor, assiduity, and fidelity. Most respectable reference. &c. N. B. No pecuniary assistance can be received."

The "want" which usually succeeds that for situations is common at some time or other of his life to every living being. The bottom of the fifth column of the Times generally contains some half-dozen announcements that X. Y. or A. B. wants money. In a modern comedy, one of the characters, with a view to borrowing, tells a rich friend "that he is terribly in want of a thousand pounds." The other, with a comprehensive experience of the world, replies, "I have no doubt of it; for you may take it as a rule that every man wants a thousand pounds." Of this vast multitude of mankind, there are, it appears, only a few superlatively sanguine individuals who hope to obtain required cash by advertising. "Ample security" or usurious interest is generally that bait held forth to lenders; but we are able to produce one remarkable instance in which the advertiser expresses a wish for the loan of a bagatelle of four thousand pounds without security; and which he proposes to repay, not with interest, but with gratitude:—

"A MAN OF RANK, holding a distinguished public office, moving in the highest society, and with brilliant prospects, has been suddenly called upon to pay some thousands of pounds, owing to the default of a friend for whom he had become guarantee. As his present means are unequal to meet this demand, and he can offer no adequate security for a loan, the consequence must be ruin to himself and his family, unless some individuals of wealth and munificence will step forward to avert this calamity, by applying £1900 to his rescue. For this he frankly avows that he can, in present circumstances, offer no other return than his gratitude. A personal interview, however painful, will be readily granted, in the confidence that the generosity of his benefactor will be the best guarantee for his delicate observance of secrecy. He hopes his distressing condition will protect him from the prying of heartless curiosity; and to prevent the importunities of money-lenders, he begs to repeat that he can give no security. Address to 'Anxious,' ——shire Post-office, London." The "anxious," man [illegible] known his trifling want in the Times [illegible] January, 1844.

The [illegible] last column of the first page of the Times is [illegible] devoted to equestrian and vehicular advertisements. Any gentleman who may want a clever hack, a quiet cob, a powerful horse of splendid action, warranted to ride, or drive; or any tradesman requiring a team of superior young cart-horses, has only to consult his newspaper.

Over leaf, on the second page of the Times, persons in want of "apartments" or lodgings, "with or without board," will find many places to choose from. Announcements of public companions which are of a more general interest come next. Amongst them sometimes appear singular effusions, chiefly consisting of the schemes of enthusiastic patriots and headlong politicians, who invent plans for setting everything to rights in this complicated community, as fast as the horses announced for sale in a previous column, can gallop. One, which was published about twelve months since, we have carefully preserved. It is by a political regenerator who dates from Cheapside:—

"TO THE MINISTERS OF STATE, NOBILITY, AND COMMUNITY AT LARGE.—A remedy for the distresses of England.—Every considerate person admits the present condition of society to be perfectly anomalous. A remedy has at length been discovered—a remedy which would effectually arrest the progress of pauperism, confer incalculable benefits upon the industrial community, and diffuse joy and gladness throughout the length and breadth of the land, making England (without exaggeration) the envy of surrounding nations, and the admiration of the world. The plan possesses the peculiar merit of being practicable, and easy of application, without in the slightest degree infringing the rights of property as by law established, or in any way disturbing the present relations of society. The advertiser will communicate his discovery either to the ministers of state, nobility, or those who may take an interest in the well being of society, on condition of his receiving (if his plans are approved, and made available for the purposes contemplated) £100,000. 'If the nation be saved, it is not to be saved by the ordinary operations of statesmanship,' —Lord Ashly." The modesty of the advertiser prevents him from adding in words what he evidently wishes the reader to conclude; namely, that the nation is only to be saved by E. S., of No. 14, Cheapside.

The rest of the columns of the times usually occupied by advertisements are filled with announcements of new works, either just out, or in preparation, patent medicines, and sales by auction. One department is benevolently set aside for the insertion of short applications for places from domestic servants. These advertisements are received at a price which little more than covers the duty, and expense of composing.

Lastly come the rhetorical advertisements. These flow from the fervent pens of imaginative auctioneers "who"—to quote Mr. Puff once more—"crowd their announcements, with panegyrical superlatives, to exhibit above the other, like the bidders in the open auction room;" infusing "their phraseology with variegated chips of exotic metaphor." The skill with which their descriptions of houses or of lands magnify excellences and conceal defects without making an entire sacrifice of truth, is on some occasions wonderful. When a mansion is dilapidated, that is described as a lucky circumstance, for, "with a trifling outlay, the fortunate purchaser will be afforded a fine opportunity of exercising his taste in restoration, alteration, and decoration." Sometimes the auctioneer is "happy" to announce that a large portion of the estate, now for sale is in a completely uncultivated state, so that the possessor will have a fine field for the introduction of those wonderful improvements in draining and agricultural chemistry which are now at his disposal. We must admit, however, that these wordy announcements are less frequent in the Times, than in the other newspapers although the above expressions are copied from its pages. The truth is, the prices of that one are not exempted from the high charges of that densely filled journal, but cost as much per line as the veriest cheesemonger's puff. Economy therefore obliges the verbose auctioneer to be sparing of adjectives, and to cut out his most exalted superlatives. It is only when the magnitude of the transaction enables him—heureusement—to puff off the property "regardless of expense," that he is able to make a high light in a long advertisement.

We have now reviewed the various announcements which, taking the average, daily appear in the Times newspaper. By an orderly arrangement of the printer, the different kinds we have advertised to appear as nearly as possible in the portions of the vast sheet which we have described, so that a practised reader can tell, within a column or so, where to pitch upon this sort of announcement he may wish to peruse. No one possessed of a spice of philosophy can glance over those broad sheets, without extracting a deep meaning from the mass, and without getting a strong insight into human nature from many of the individual advertisements. Had the Acta Diurna of the Romans contained similar announcements, we should have learned more of their private life and habits from one of its numbers, than from all the classical works which have been handed down to us.

ROMANCE OF A BEDSTEAD.—The inn where Richard III. abode during his brief sojourn at Leicester, even the very bed on which he there reposed, are not exempt from the tales of horror which are associated with the memory of this prince. On his departure for Bosworth it appears from the record that he must have left many articles of value, either too cumbersome to be removed, or in themselves ill-suited for a temporary encampment, at the house of entertainment where he had been abiding, and which, as being the chief hostelrie in Leicester, was distinguished by the appellation of Richard's badge, "the Silvery Boar:" but on his defeat and death, and the dispersion of his followers, the victorious army, with the invariable [illegible] which in all ages accompanies any popular movement, compelled the owner of the inn to pull down the emblem of the deceased king, and to substitute the blue for the white boar. The apartments which the king had occupied were pillaged and ransacked, and the hangings of the richly-carved bed on which he had slept during his stay in the town were torn off, and either carried away as booty with other portable articles, or were destroyed on the spot. The bedstead, however, being large and heavy, and apparently of no great value, was suffered to remain undisturbed with the people of the house; thenceforth continuing a piece of standing furniture, and passing from tenant to tenant with the inn; for King Richard and his secretary being both slain, and all his confidential friends executed, imprisoned, or exiled, it could not be known that the weight of the bulky wooden framework left in his sleeping apartment arose from its being in reality the military chest of the deceased monarch. It was at once his coffer and his couch. Many years, however, rolled on before this singular fact became known, and then it was only accidentally discovered, owing to the circumstances of a piece of gold dropping on the floor when the wife of the proprietor was making a bed which had been placed upon it. On closer examination a double bottom was discovered, the intermediate space between which was found to be filled with gold coin to a considerable amount.

The treasurer thus marvellously obtained, although carefully concealed, helped in time to elevate the humble publican, "a man of low condition," to the proud station of chief magistrate of his native town. But at his death the vast riches that accrued to his widow excited the cupidity of menials connected with her establishment; and the wilful murder of their mistress, in 1613, led to the execution of her female servant, and of seven men concerned with her in the ruthless deed: thus adding another tragedy to the many of heigher import which are inseparably connected with the recollection of this unhappy prince.

The inn itself, rendered so remarkable as the last abiding place of the last monarch of the middle ages, "a large, handsome, half-timber house, with one story projecting over the other," remained, for upwards of three centuries unchanged, an interesting relic alike of the architecture of its period as of the remarkable epoch which it perpetrated. But in the year 1836, although undecayed, uninjured, and defying the ravages of time, this venerable fabric was razed to the ground, to the regret of all who hold sacred such historical memorials, and hallow the relics which link bygone ages with the present time. Its site, with the appellation of an adjoining thoroughfare to which it formed an angle, and which still retains the name of "Blue Boar lane," together with the description and delineation of its picturesque appearance, are now all that connects King Richard with this interesting memorial of his last days at Leicester.

Not so, however, the bedstead. That appendage to the inn, although three hundred and fifty years have elapsed since it was used by the sovereign, is still in existence, and in the most perfect state of preservation. Richly and curiously carved in oak with flour de-lis profusely scattered over it, its panels inlaid with black, brown, and white woods, the styles consisting of Saracenic figures in high relief, it proves, from the sigularity of its construction, the true purpose for which it was designed, every portion of it but the body being fabricated to take to pieces and put up at will; so that for travelling it speedily became transformed into a huge chest, although ingeniously framed for the twofold purpose which led to its preservation. This relic instructive in itself, is the only know memorial connected with the personal history of Richard III, --Caroline Halstet's Richard III.--Living Age.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, NOVEMBER 5 1847.

Religious.

In our last, we put down as the fruits of the present revival and reformation, nine candidates for baptism in this town. It is with unspeakable pleasure and gratitude to God, that we are now enabled to report fifteen more in this place, making in all twenty four who, on the ensuing Sabbath will put on Christ by baptism. On last Sabbath, our Methodist brethren immersed five professing believers in the Messurado. We were privileged to be present at the scene—which afforded matter for both rejoicing and regret—rejoicing at the progress of principles which we so dearly cherish—regret that there was a manifestation of levity during a ceremony, so clearly prescribed in the book of God. We trust no baptist will be guilty of such unreasonable merriment. The burial of a conscientious believer with Christ in baptism, is an act too solemn—the exalted opinion and the motive of the administrator, notwithstanding, to engender mirth in the mind of an intelligent and Bible Christian. Especially should baptism receive it with gratitude, and encouragement, and look it as the dawn of the day, in which there shall be one Baptism as there is but one Lord and one Faith.

On Wednesday evening last the Church assembled in conference, to hear the experience of those who had made application for baptism. Three Americans had been received. The Moderator by way of encouraging others, said "We have done as Thou hast commanded, and yet there is room." When, lo! to the astonishment of all in the large assemblage, "Jumbo" came pressing his way through the crowd, seated himself by the side of the moderator. "Jumbo" is one of the Africans by the "Pons"—he is an apprentice, and his master was then in the house and is a member of the church. His opinion was asked of "Jumbo's" state and religious character. He stated that he was at first sceptical as to "Jumbo;" that he regarded him more phrenzied than religiously affected, but that subsequently the man's deep seriousness, continued earnestness, humility and consistency had forced that opinion from him--that a manifest change had been wrought in Jumbo--so great a change as filled him with astonishment. Jumbo came forward not only unsolicited by any one, but without the knowledge of his guardians. He related his experience which convinced all who heard him, that the Spirit which "bloweth wheresoever it listeth," has been working on his soul. He was received and numbered among the people of God. The extraordinary manner in which he came forward, suggested the propriety of changing his name, which his friends agreed to, and henceforth he will be known as John the Baptist. It is proper, however, to remark that he will not be first of the company by the "Pons" that is baptised. A young woman of that company was immersed last Sabbath by Rev. Mr. Benham, of the M. E. Church. It is singular and also worthy of remark, that when the offer was made in church to sprinkle her, she resolutely refused to submit, and said "I want to go big water" pointing to the river. The work is still going on, At New Virginia, the station of brother F. S. James, saints are enjoying a season of refreshing, and sinners are enquiring the way to Zion. We received an encouraging letter from him a few days ago, giving an account of the state of things there, and requesting us to go up and help; but our time is so wholly occupied here and New Georgia, we are unable to go. We regret much that we are not able to give more of our time to the work, but we are consoled when we recollect that the same authority which imposes the duty to preach the gospel, makes it a duty to provide for a family.

Trade.

Letters from the leeward are very disencouraging in regard to Oil. Nothing is doing at present.

Slave Trade.

We learn from some Kroomen who have been some time residing at the Gallenas, that the slavers have resorted to the expedient of shipping their slaves at night, and that recently they have sent off two cargoes while the cruisers have been lying there.

We are happy to say that there is a probability that the anticipated difficulties at Little Bassa, will be avoided. The natives of that place are beginning to understand each other, and will probably terminate their quarrels without open hostilities.

PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, it is provided by the 6th section of the Act of the Legislature, passed January 1847, entitled "An Act making provisions for a Convention" That in case "there shall be a majority of votes in favor of adopting the Constitution," which may be drafted by said Convention, "the Governor shall immediately on ascertaining the fact, declare the same by proclamation, to be the law of the land."

And, whereas, it appears by official returns, that the polls were opened in the various towns and villages of this Republic, on the 27th ultimo, and that the citizens, by a large majority, have adopted the Constitution submitted to them by said Convention, as the future goverment of this Republic, —Therefore:—

I Joseph J. Roberts, Governor of Liberia, do hereby proclaim that, from the date of these presents, the said Constitution shall be the Supreme Law of the land; And that all laws, ordinances and regulations, repugnant thereto shall cease. And it is also enjoined and required that all officers, both civil and military shall conform to the same.

Given under my hand at Monrovia, The Second Day of October A. D. One Thousand, Eight Hundred and Forty Seven, and of the Independence Of the Republic, the First.

J. J. ROBERTS.

By the Governor,

J. N. LEWIS,

Colonial Secretary

SELECTED EXTRACTS

ADVICE TO YOUNG UNMARRIED LADIES.

If you have blue eyes, you need not languish.
If black eyes, you need not leer.
If you have pretty feet, there is no necessity to wear short petticoats.
If you are doubtful as to that point there can be no harm in letting them be long.
If you have good teeth do not laugh.
If you have bad ones, do not laugh less than the occasion may justify.
If you have pretty hands and arms, there can be no objection to your playing on the lute, if you play well.
If they are disposed to be clumsy, work tapestry.
If you have a bad voice rather speak in a low tone.
If you dance well, dance but seldom.
If you dance ill, never dance at all.
If you sing well, make no previous excuses.
If you sing indifferently, hesitate not a moment when you are asked; for few people are judges of singing, but every one is sensible of a desire to please.
If in conversation you think a person wrong rather hint a difference of opinion than offer a contradiction.
If you discover a person to be telling an absolute falsehood, unless it is particularly injurious, let it pass in silence; for it is not worth your while to make any one your enemy, by proving him or her a liar.
Never touch the sore place in any one's character; for be assured, whoever you are, that you have a sore place in your own; and a young woman is a flower that may be blasted in a moment.
It is always in your power to make a friend by smiles—what a folly then to make enemies by frowns.
When you have an opportunity to praise do it with all your heart.
When you are forced to blame, appear at least to do it with reluctance.
Make it a rule to please all, and never appear insensible to any desire of pleasing or obeying you, however awkwardly it may be executed.
If you are disposed to be pettish or insolent, it is better to exercise your ill-homours on your dog, your cat, or your femme de chambre, than on your friends.
If you would preserve beauty, rise early,
If you preserve esteem, be gentle.
If you would obtain power be condescending.
If you would live happy, endeavour to promote the happiness of others.

EMPLOYMENT FOR POOR EMIGRANTS.—A Farmer residing near Morristown New Jersay, has hired thirty-five of the able bodied poor Germans who were in the New York Alms House. They wer overjoyed to get work. The men receive $6 per month, and the women $2'50, the farmer agreeing to provide for their children. There are some hundred more in the Alms House anxious for work on the same terms. Farming is now the most profitable of all occupations, and a man who can buy or lease a farm near the city and get able bodied hands at six dollars per month, can make an independent fortune in a few years. A gentleman of Revenswood, L I suggests that the city should purchase a large tract of will land, say from 1000 to 5000 acres in Western New York, erect saw and grist mills, and plain buildings for the convenience of the paupers, and set the men at work tilling the land, and of the mechanical pursuits necessary to provide for their own wants, and the women to be engaged in "spinning and knitting," weaving, &c. To this we would add a proposition to pay each of them in proportion to his labor, and thus give them the means of earning an independence.

Unless something is done to provide work for the poor daily arriving here, our own working people will all be reduced to poverty. During Saturday alone, eleven hundred and twenty-six passengers arrived at this port, many of them in distress, and this in winter! We may look for multitudes next summer. Well, we have plenty of land, and if means can only be devised for getting work for them upon the land, the country will be greatly benefitted by this influx of population.—The American Sun.

IMPORTANT FROM THE ARMY.

WASHINGTON, Feb 21, 1847.

Tampico dates of the 6th have been received at New Orleans, with intelligence of the loss of the ship Ondiaka, about 30 miles south of Tampico, having on board the volunteers under Col. DeKussy. The troops and crew got safely on shore, and have since arrived at Tampico, except the Captain of the ship. It is not known that he left the ship at all. It is said, but not believed, that part of the volunteers fell into the hands of the Mexicans. On hearing of the loss of the Ondiaka, the steamer Undine, with the 8th company of the 3d artillery on board, was dispatched from Tampico to render assistance. The Undine had not returned but it was rumored that this company were cut off by a body of eight hundred of the enemy's cavalry, and another rumor is that the Mexicans attacked the volunteers after landing, and that this led to a dispersal of our forces and a forced march to Tampico. These rumors are doubted, but they came through three different channels. Two ships were off Tampico with sixty troops on board. A report had been received at Tampico by a Commercial house, of a fierce encounter in the North West between the Mexicans and a portion of Kearney's command, supposed to be Missourians under Col. Price. Many are represented to have been killed on both sides, but the Americans were victorious and took possession of the city of Chihuahua. Rumors had reached Tampico, understood to have come from the squadron, that Commissioners had been sent from Mexico to arrange the difficulties between the two Governments. Letters received at New Orleans also memtion a battle near Chihuahua, and partially confirming the news received, which is entitled to more credit than Mexican news hitherto put in circulation. Gen. Patterson is of opinion that the only fight of consequence must have been in the pass leading to the city, and that the loss sustained by us was very light. It was supposed that Gen. Scott would not be ready to leave Tampico in two or three weeks. Information has been received that a malignant fever is prevailing in the Hospital at Tampico, from which our soldiers are suffering.—It is pronounced by physicians a mild type of the yellow fever and is attributed to the inordinate use of fruit. Gen Patterson issued orders in regard to the exorbitant demands of the Mexicans for rents and dues, when all come down to a reasonable value. The Gen. has information that there was much neglect on the part of the officers and crew of the Ondiaka, and shall keep them in custody until the matter is investigated. Oaders were received at Tampico on the 6th instant, supposed from Gen. Scott, to get all the wagons in readiness. The Quarter Master was very busy, and the wagons at hand were sufficient to transport the baggage and provisions of the entire force at Tampico, who are evidently preparing for a long march—Ibid.

NEW GOODS!

The least that I can say is, that my stock is large in the total, being very near half the Bark Montgomery's tonnage. But small in the various varieties. It is therefore, useless to attempt to articulate the assortments of staple and fancy Dry goods, the new fashions of both Europe and America, Groceries, Hardware, provisions, drugs, medicines, and dye stuffs. And that minutia of things which pertain to ladies tastes. Let all imagine that they can get almost any thing at Roy's new store, on the fairest terms. Any and every thing will be sold for cash down, or the products which will bear exportation. Store in Rev. B. R. Wilsos's stone store house on Broad St.

EDWARD J. ROYE

Oct. 23rd. 1847.
Monrovia.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile business under the firm of Samuel F. Mc Gill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MC GILL,
R. S. MC GILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	$ 10
Beads, pound,	"	25	38
Beef, cargo No. 1,	Bo	16 00	17 00
Blue Baftz,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	30	35
Boards,	1000ft	30 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb	45	40 60
Cheese,	"	none	50
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	18
Checks domestic,	Ps	13
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	13	14
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8	15 00
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	12 00
Guns,	Box	70 00	1 50
Iron, bars,	Cwt	none	75 00
Lead, pig,	"	none	50 00
Lard,	Keg,	15
Lime,	Barrel	50	16
Molasses	Gallon	45
Mackerel	Bbl	8 00	50
Nails	Keg	8 00	1 00
Oil paint	Gallon	nne	60
Oil palm	"	33 1-3
Pork	Bbl	15 00	34
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	18 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	10 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none	16 00
Porter.	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2
Romnals	Ps.	1 00
Salt	Ton	none	1 25
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 00
Tobacco	1000lbs.	none
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00	10 00
Wine hock	"	8 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	10 00
			20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Oct. 22. Hamburg brig Laurenee, H. Ewald supercargo from leeward

" 24. H. M. C, M. Schooner of war Hirondelle, E Belligeice commander from Grand Bassa: sailed 26th for same place.

" 28. H. B. M. Brig ——, —— commander from the leeward: sailed same day for windward.

DEPARTUES.

" 22. Lib. sloop Nathan Bangs, Ammons master, for the leeward.

" 23 Hamburg brig Sylphide, J. Sidles sepercar, go for windward.

" 25 Lib. sloop Independence, Barbour master, for the leeward.

" 25. Lib. schcooner Teaser Summer master, for leeward.

" 31. Hamburgh brig Laurense, —— master, for leeward.

POETRY.

From the Living Age.

THE BROOKLET.

FROM "SACRED POEMS," BY SIR ROBERT GRANT.

Sweet brooklet, ever gliding,
Now high the mountain riding,
The lone vale now dividing,
Whither away?
"With pilgrim course I flow,
Or in summer's scorching glow,
Or o'er moonless wastes of snow,
Nor stop nor stay;
For oh, by high behest,
To a bright abode of rest
In my parent Ocean's breast
I hasten away!"

Many a dark morass,
Many a craggy mass,
Thy feebie force must pass;
Yet, yet delay?
"Though the marsh be dire and deep,
Though the crag be stern and steep,
On, on, my course must sweep,—
I may not stay;
For oh, be it east or west,
To a home of glorious rest
In the bright sea's boundless breast,
I hasten away!"

The warbling bowers beside thee,
The fragrant flowers that hide thee,
With soft accord they chide thee,
Sweet brooklet, stay!
"I taste of the fragrant flowers,
I respond to the warbling bowers,
And sweetly they charm the hours
Of my winding way;
But ceaseless still, in quest
Of that everlasting rest,
In my parent's boundless breast,
I hasten away!"

Know'st thou that dread abyss?
Is it a scene of bliss?
Ah, rather cling to this,
Sweet brooklet, stay!
"Oh, who shall fitly tell
What wonders there may dwell!
That world of mystery well
Might strike dismay;
But I know't is my parent's breast—
There held, I must needs be blest;
And with joy to that promised rest
I hasten away!"

THE RESURRECTION.

My life's a shade, my days
Apace to death decline;
My Lord is life, he'll raise
My flesh again, e'en mine—
Sweet truth to me,
I shall arise;
And with these eyes
My Saviour see.

My peaceful grave shall keep
My bones till that sweet day,
I wake from my long sleep,
And leave my bed of clay.
Sweet truth to me &c.

My Lord! his angels shall
Their golden trumpets sound;
At whose most welcome call,
My grave shall be unbound!
Sweet truth to me, &c.

I said sometimes with tears,
Ah, me! I'm loath to die;
Lord, silence thou these fears,
My life's with thee on high.
Sweet truth to me, &c.

What means my beating heart
To be thus shy of death?
My life and I shall part,
Though I resign my breath!
Sweet truth to me, &c.

Then welcome harmless grave,
By thee to heaven I'll go;
My Lord! his death shall save
Me from the flames below.
Sweet truth to me,
I shall arise!
And with these eyes,
My Saviour see.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS

From the Living Age.

THE MONSTER MISERY OF LITERATURE.

Be under no apprehension, gentle public, that you are about to be kept in suspense touching the moral of our argumentation, as too often in the pamphlets addressed in Johnsonian English to Thompsonian understandings, wherein a penny-worth of matter is set forth by a monstrous quantity of phrase. We mean to speak to the point; we mean to enlighten your understanding as by the smiting of a lucifer-match. Refrain; therefore, from running your eye impatiently along the page, as you are doing at this moment in hopes of discovering, italicized, the secret of the enigma; for we have no intention of keeping you another moment ignorant that the monster-misery of literature is—guess! Which of you hath hit it? The monster misery of literature is—The Circulation Library.

In this devout conviction, devote we to the infernal gods the memory of the Athenian republic, the first keeper of a circulating library. Every tyro is aware that this Sams or Ebers of antiquity lent out to Ptolemy of Egypt, for a first-rate subscription of fifteen talents, the works of Euripides, Eschylus, and Sophocles; thereby affording a precedent for the abominable practice, fatal to bookmakers and booksellers which has converted the waters of Castalia into their present disgraceful puddle!

Every scribbler of the day who has a Perry ian pen in hand, is pleased to exercise it on the decline of the drama; one of the legitimate targets of penny-a-liners. But how inadequately are the goose quills, and ostrich quills, phœnix quills, and roc quills, of the few standard critics of the age, directed towards the monstrous abuse of public patience which will render the Victorian age the sad ahtitnesis of the Elizabethian in the literary history of the land! Content so long as they can get a new work, tale quale, as a peg whereon to hang the rusty garments of their erudition, not a straw care they for the miserable decline and fall of the great empire of letters; an empire overrun by what Goths—what Huns—what Vandales!—by the iniquitous and barbarous hosts of circulating libraries!

It has been agreed for some centuries past, that the only modern Mæcenas is the publisher. The days of patrons are past; and the author is forced to look for the reward of his labor to the man who, by selling the greatest number of copies to the public, can bestow the greatest number of pounds upon his pains. In order to augment this amount, the bibliopole naturally consults the taste of his customers; and nearly the sole remaining customers of the modern bookseller are—the circulating libraries. For what man in his senses who, for an annual mulct of half-a-dozen sovereigns, commands the whole range of modern literature, would waste his substance in loading his house with books of doubtful interest? Who that, by a message of his servant into Bond street, procures the last new novel cut and dry, instead of wet from the press, and demanding the labor of the paper-knife, would proceed to the extremity of a purchase? And the result is that Messrs Folio and Duodecimo, in order to procure satisfactory orders from the circulating libraries of the multitudinous cities of this deluded empire, issue orders to their helots, Mr. Scribblescrawl and Mrs. Wiredrawn, requiring them to produce per annum so many sets of three volumes, adapted to the atmosphere wherein they are fated to flourish.

It is an avowed fact, the publishers of the day will purchase the copyrights of only such works as "the libraries will take;" which libraries, besotted by the mystic charm of three volumes, immutable as the sacred triad of the Graces or Destinies, would negative without a division such a work as the Vicar of Wakefield were it now to undergo probation. Robinson Crusoe, or Paul and Virginia, would be returned unread to their authors, with a civil note of "extremely sorry to decline," &c. "The Man of Feeling" would be made to feel his insignificance. "Thinks I to Myself" might think in vain; and the "Cottagers of Glenburnie" retain their rural obscurity. So much for the measure of the maw of the circulating library. Of its taste and palate it is difficult to speak with moderation; for those of Caffraria or Otaheite might be put to the blush.

The result, however, of this fatal ascendency is, that not a publisher who has the fear of the "Gazette" before his eyes, presumes to hazard a guinea on speculations in the belles-lettres. Poetry is seldom, if ever, published except at the cost of the poet; and the foreman of one of the leading London houses is deputed to apprize aspiring rhymesters, that "his firm considers poetry mild species of insanity"—Anglic, that it does not suit the appetite of the circulating library! For, behold! this despot of bookmakers must have length, breadth, and theikness, to fiill the book boxes dispatched to its subscribers in the country, as well as satisfy in town the demands of its charming subscriber, Lady Sylvester Daggerwood, and all her daughters.

It happens that the said Lady Sylvester does not like Travels, unless "nice little ladylike books of travels," such as the Quarterly informed us last year, in a fit of fribbledom, were worthy the neat little crowquills of lady-authors. Nor will she hear of Memoirs, unless light, sparkling, and scandalous, as nearly resembling those of Grammont as decency will allow. Essays she abominates; nor can she exactly understand the use of quartoes, unless, as Swift describes the merit of,

"A Chrysostom to smooth his band in"—to serve for flattening between the leaves her rumpled embroidery or netting!

Now you are simply and respectfully asked, beloved public, what must be the feelings of a man of genius, or of any sensible scholarly individual, when, after devoting years of his life to a work of standard excellence—a work such as in France would obtain him access to the Academy, or in Russia, and Prussia, a pension or an order of merit—he is told by the publisher, who in Great Britain supplies the place of these fountains of honor and reward, that "the public of the present day has no taste for serious reading;" for Messrs Folio and Duodecimo cannot, of course, afford to regard a few dons of the universities, or a few county bookclubs, parsonically presided, as representatives of the public? What the disappointed man, thus enlightened, must think of "glorious Apollo" when he goes to bed that night, we should be sorry to conjecture!

"The public of the present day"—Ang. the subscribers to the circulating libraries—constitute, to his cultivated mind, a world unknown. The public he has been wasting his life to address, is such a public as was addressed by Addison, by Swift, by Steele; or by the greater writers of the days of Elizabeth. "Bless his fine wits," we could laugh at his misconception, were we not rather inclined to cry! In instances easy to be cited, (but that there were miching malecho in the deed,) insult has been added to injury, and the anguish depicted in the face of the mortified man of letters been assuaged by friendly advice to "try his hand at something more saleable—something in the style of Harrison Ainsworth or Peter Priggins!"

O ye Athenians! to what base uses have we come, by the influence of your malpractices of old!

But all this is far from the blackest side of the picture. You have seen only the fortunes of the rejected of the circulating libraries, wait till you have studied the fate of their favorites—victims whom, like the pet-dogs, of children, the publishers force to stand on their hind-legs, and be bedizened in their finery; or pet pussy-cats, whom they fondle into wearing spectacles and feeding on macaroones, instead of pursuing their avocations as honest mousers. The favorite author of the circulating libraries has a great deal to envy in the treadmill!

In the days when there existed a reading, in place of a skimming public—in the days when circulating libraries were not—the writer who followed his own devices in the choice of the subject, plot, title, treatment, and extent of his book, and made his labor a labor of love, had some chance of being cherished as the favorite of the freside; installed on the shelf, and taken down, like Goldsmith, or Defoe, or Bunyan for an hour's gossip; cried over by the young girl of the family, diverting the holiday of the school-boy, and exercising the eyesight of the good old grandmother. But how is this ever to be achieved now-a-days? Who will ever be thumped over and spelled over as these have been?

"Invent another Vicar or another Crusoe," say the critics, "and you will see."

We should not see! No bookseller would publish them; because "no circulating library would take them;" for these bibliopoles know to a page what will be taken. Several of them have got, and several others have had, the conduct of a circulating library on their hands; and so far from venturing to present a single-volumed or double-volumed work to their subscribers, they would insist upon the dilution of the genious of Oliver or Daniel into the adequate number of pages ere they risked paper and print. O public! O dear ingenuous public! Think how you might have ceased to delight in even the cosmogoyman, if his part had been a hundred time rehearsed in your ears; or what the matchless Lady Blarney and the incomparable Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs, (I love, as old Primrose says, to repeat the whole name, might have become, as the "light conversationists" of three octavo volumes! Shakspere was forced to kill Mercutio early in the play, lest Mercutio should kill him. We fell a devout conviction that Miss Caroline Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs would have burked Goldsmith!

And then the incomparable Robinson! Conceive the interlarding of a funny Mrs. Friday to eke out matter, with a comical king of the Cannibal islands "to lighten the story"—according to circulating library demand! Unhappy Defoe! thy standing in the pillory had been as nothing compared with such a condemnation!

We beseech you therefore, deluded public when assured by critical misiearimant that such writers no longer exist, do, as you are often requested to do by letters in the newspapers—from parties remanded by the police-offices for some hanging matter—"suspend your judgment," or you will deserve credit for very little. We promise you that there are giants on the earth in these days, ay, and famous giants of their cubits! But when a giant is made to drivel, his drivelings are very little better than those of a pigmy! And we swear to you, (under correction from the parish vestry which is entitled to half-a-crown an oath,) that circulating libraries would make a driveler of Seneca! Under the circulating library tyranny, Johnson himself would have been forced to break up his long words in to smaller pieces, to supply due volume for three volumes.

Above all, we have no hesitation in declaring that the circulating libraries are indictable for man-slaughter, in the matter of the death of Scott. They killed him, body and soul! In better times, when books were bought, not hired, the sale of the first half dozen of his mighty novels would have sufficed both the public and the author for thrice as many years. They would have been purchased by all people of good condition, as the works of Richardson were purchased; and read, and conned, as got by heart. But behold! the circulating libraries "wanted novelty." It suited them better to invest their capital in a half dozen new and trashy books; such as extend their catalogue from No 2,470 to 2,500; instead of half a dozen copies of the one sterling work, which increases their stock in trade and diminishes their stock in consols; but leaves the catalogue, which is the advertisement of their resources, hutting at No. 2,470.

Now, as it happened that the same boss of constructiveness which has endowed our language with such a world of creations from the pen of Scott, betrayed him also into inventiveness per force of brick and mortar—just as the same bent of genius which created the Castle of Otranto, created also that other colossus of lath and plaster Strawberry Hill—the author of the Scotch novels was fain to sacrifice to the evil genius of the times; and behold! as the assiduous slave of the circulating libraries, he extinguished one of the greatest spirits of Great Britain. But for the hateful factory system of the twice three volumes per annum, he would have been still alive among us—happy and happy-making, in a green old age—watching over the maturity of his grandchildren, and waited upon by the worship of the land.

Therefore again we say, as we said a short time ago—O ye Athenians! what have ye not to answer for in the consequence of your malpractices of old!

The only great success of the day in works of fiction, (for the laurels of Bulwer have been spindled among the rest by the factitious atmosphere of the circulating libraries,) is that of Boz. And we attribute in a great measure, the enormous circulation of his early works, to their having set at defiance the paralyzing influence of the monster-misery. Shilling numbers were as the dragon's teeth. They rose up like armed men, and slew the circulating librarians. People were forced to buy them if they wanted to read them; and they were bought. Those who desired to read "Night and morning," were not forced to purchase it, and it was not bought; and the circulation of the two works consequently remains as 2,000 to 35,000 copies.

(To be Continued.)

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XVI MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) NOVEMBER 19 1847. NO. 1

THE LIBERIA HERALD

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months Two DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLAR.

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. MCGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. De LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. Wm. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

OUR FAMILY: A DOMESTIC NOVEL

CHAPTER XVI —A MYSTERY.

Our family was inbed. My mother had sobbed herself to sleep; my father lay dreaming by her side; the twin infants were in their cradle: the whole house was quiet, excepting only the ticking of the clock in the hall, the chirping of the cricket in the kitchen, and a dull intermitting sound from one of the upper bed-rooms, as if from some-body imitating through his nose the croaking of a frog in the fens.

The clock had struck one, and was about to strike again, when the door of the back attic opened, and Kezia stepping forth in her night clothes, and without any candle, walked deliberately down the stairs to the room door of the in the first floor appropriated to the nursery. Here for a moment she paused, the attraction within having overcome or diverted her original impulse; but her true errand speedily recured to her, and descending the other flight, she crossed the hall, and entered the surgery, to the extreme alarm and astonishment of the two persons who were conversing therein.

The one was a female in a flannel wrapper, tied with green ribbon, and occupying the wooden arm-chair devoted to the accommodation of patients or impatients awaiting the making up of their prescriptions: the other, a strange man, with his hat on, was seated on the counter, whence, with his elbows resting on his knees, he stooped down towards his companion, his face close to hers, in earnest communion. At a glance, he was what was called in the slang of those days a Blood or Buck; in the cant of our own times, a Swell. Cigars were not yet in vogue; or, to a certainty, he would have had one between his lips: but he wore his beaver with the rakish jaunty air still affected by gentlemen and journeymen who conceive themselves superior in acuteness, spirit, and an extensive knowledge of life, to the rest of the world. His clothes were expensive and fashionable. Round his throat he wore a very fine white cravat so ample that his neck seemed poulticed, the ends being tied in a large ostentatious bow. His coat was blue, with fancy gilt buttons, a deep turned-down collar, and lappels, that for size might have served for ears to a Newfoundland dog. His waistcoat of buff or primrose color, was doublebreasted, long in the waist, and flapped, with a black ribbon crossing it from the left shoulder to the gold-mounted quizzing-glass in the left-hand pocket. His lower limbs were clad in gray stocking-pantaloons, tight as skin, and cased up to the well-made calf in Hessian boots, but somewhat deficient in polish, minus one tassel. His coat, too, had the fluffy, tumbled appearance of having occasionally taken its own nap with its master's on a featherbed, or one of flock; his waiscoat was ill-washed; his pantaloons were soiled in sundry parts, and especiallyat the knees; and his cravat, besides its dingy hue, was wrinkled and flaccid. Altogether, there was as much of the sloven as of the beau in his costume—in his physiognomy, a corresponding mixture of the gentleman and the reprobate. His face was handsome; but had the faded, jaded look consequent on habitual debauchery. His large dark eyes were dry and bloodshot, with crow-foot wrinkles at the corners; and under each organ a flabby bag, as if for secreting the tears to be shed in the maudlin stage of intoxication. His cheeks were of a dull white, blotchey with yellow and red, that deepened in his prominent nose to a crimson. His lips were parched and cracked; his chin was neutral-tinted by a blueish beard of two day's growth; and his long black hair and whiskers were foul and matted. Smart and slovenly; well featured, but with a sinister expression; dashing, but dirty; unbrushed, unwashed, uncombed, unshorn, he looked the rake, with a strong spice of the ruffian, whose attribute, a thick knotted bludgeon, lay handy beside him on the counter. On the other side, stood something of indefinite shape tied up in a cotton shawl; and near the bundle, the nursery rushlight, and an empty rummer, with a silver spoon in it. There could hardly be a greater contrast than between the female in the armed-chair and her nocturnal visitor; and yet the time, the scene, and the manner of their tete-a-tete, inferred the most confidential and familiar intercourse. Was it possible that the repulsive, dissolute; villanous-looking man on the counter, was anything near or dear to the genteel, sweet-spoken, well-bred, lady-like Mrs. Prideaux?

To confirm and justify an affirmative answer, certain chronological characteristics must be taken into consideration. In these, our own times, remarkable for a refined taste in art and literature, in manners and morals, the Court Calender possesses more attractions for females than the Newgate one. There is no longer a rage for genteel highwaymen or eminent housebreakers. As pets, Brazilian monkeys are preferred to malefactors, and parrots to jail birds. Our mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters no longer admire the chivalrous courage of a horse-pad, whose utmost deed of daring—the presentment of a loaded pistol at an unarmed man—has been outdone by every light or heavy dragoon who has seen service. They no longer fall in love with a Knight of Roads for robbing them like a gentleman, and paying compliments to their beauty, and calming their feminine fears, at the cost of their purses, watches, brooches, bracelets, and finger-rings and earrings. A vulgar burglar, renowned for breaking into houses and out of prisons, is hardly reckoned on a par with the hero of successful seiges and sorties; or an obdurate ruffian who goes to the gallows with a bold face as a rival of the gallant veteran who leads a forlorn hope. A common murderer is no longer a lady-killer to boot; nor does a dashing pickpocket triumph in female preference over a plain honest man "innocent of stealing silver spoons." But it was otherwise formerly; when, in the current phrase, a daring felon became a darling fellow, and a precious rascal a charming rouge. It was then quite usual for ladies of rank and breeding, of family and fortune, to visit condemned criminals in Newgate—entwining with fair and noble arms the neck destined to an ignominous rope,—beseeching keepsake locks from the head soon to be shrouded in an infamous night-cap; and hanging with arristocratical fondness on a plebian body about to swing shamefully from Tyburn Tree.

Thus, as worn-out fashions descend, like cast-off clothes, from mistress to maid, the example set by a lady of quality in the time of the First George, might very well be followed by a nurse in the reign of George the Third. However, robber or rake, there was the strange man, admitted, in the middle of the night, to a mysterious interview in the surgery, the door of which opened, round the corner of the house, into a lane.

At the entrance of Kezia the parties both started, and the man would have sprung up and spoken but for the warning of the nurse, who raised one hand with its fore-finger on her lips, whilst she held him down with the other. In truth, the figure of the housemaid in its white garments, obscurely seen by the dim gleam of the rushlight, was quite spectral enough to shake the courage of a dissolute man, with nerves unsettled by drink. His frame trembled, his face turned ashen pale, and his teeth chattered as he exclaimed in a hoarse whisper—

"A stiff-un walking—by G—d!"

The nurse, with a dissenting shake of the head and her lips indicting a silent "No!" repeated her warning gesture to her companion, who, openmouthed but breathless, watched with straining eyes every movement of the apparition. In the mean time Kezia, walking behind the counter, took her usual station beside the desk, but in silence, as if awaiting the leisure of her confidential adviser in all difficulties, Mr. Postle.

"All safe!" said the nurse in a very low but distinct whisper; "she's sleep-walking!"

The man, as if suddenly relieved of a pectoral spasm, immediately drew his breath in a long deep sigh, and set himself intensely to watch and listen to the sayings and doings of the somnambulist, who at length spoke.

"This is a dreadful mysterious business, Mr. Postle. Twenty invited, and only four to come! What can it all mean?" and she paused for a reply, which having dreamed, she resumed;—

"No, the night was not bad enough for that. Besides, the Cobleys have their own carriage, and so has the colonel and the squire, who would have brought the curate along with him. Then the Biddles have the mule cart, and the Ruffys always hire a po-shay. As for Mrs. Trent and the rest, they don't mind wind, and rain, but lap up and visit in all weathers. No, —it could n't be that! And such a beautiful supper too! And such a splendid turkey—with a giver under one wing, and a lizard under the other—I should say quite the reverse. And then the sweets! I could have cried into hysterics myself, to see all the nice jellies, and creams, and custards, and nobody to eat them, for they was nice—if they did taste a little of the shop, as that odious Doctor Shackle said, meaning, I suppose, the almond flavor you was so kind as to oblige me with out of the surgery."

The imaginary Mr. Postle here probably vented an oath, for which she checked him.

"Yes, he certainly is malicious—but don't imprecate. It's profane, and forbid in Scripture. Swear not at all—no, not even at an enemy, or a buzzum friend. To be sure, the doctor was very sneering and provoking, and especially about the wine being good enough to need no bush except out of our own garden. I could have found in my heart to drop a blank mange on his medical head! And that foolish young Fitch, to affront Mr. Uncle Rumbold to his very beard, instead of having a perfect haw of it, as any one would in their senses, it makes him look so like a conjurer. And then, that abominable Mrs. Spinks, as would n't let the thing drop, but kept counting the empty chairs, and saying that every one had a banker's ghost in it—Banko's I should say—I declare she made the hair stand upright on my very head. Though for that matter, I would almost as soon have seen a ghost in every seat, and Scratching Fanny among them, rather than nobody at all! I never knew such a case afore—never, except once,—and that was at my first place."

The ideal assistant, of course, asked for the story.

"Why, the way was this. Master had come home with a prodigious wealth of money from foreign parts, and, on setting up his establishment in London, determined to give a very grand party, by way of housewarming, to his neighbors. Well, the night came, with the rooms chalked for dancing, and all lighted up with wax candles and cut glass chandelies, and the most elegant supper set out, only for seventy people, instead of twenty,—but nobody came. Nine o'clock, ten, eleven,—the same as at our own unfortunate regalia, but not a soul—not a knock or a ring, except the cook's cousin, the footman's sister, and the house-maid's brother and uncle—at least not till about twelve, when a single gentleman asked to speak with master in private, and then, out it all came, for we listened at the study-door. Some spiteful person, in revenge for not being invited, had ferreted out master's secret history, and had whispered about, in unanimous letters, that he were a returned convert—I should have said a convict—from Botany Bay. He had been sent there for some errors in youth, but had reformed himself, and got rich by opulence, like Dick Whittington, and so got leave to come home again. But, of course, that don't apply to us, whom have never been arranged in court or transported, though fought as shy of by society as if we had. What is your own notion of it, Mr. Postle?"

A long silence ensued, of which the nurse took advantage to whisper to her companion, whom she beckoned with her finger, and then pointed to the door. "She must not awake and see you. Come; but move cautiously—as quiet as death."

"Is this all?" asked the man, in a low grumble, and with a motion of his head towards the bundle.

"It must serve for this turn," whispered the nurse. "Quick! and away!"

The fellow instantly slid gently down from the counter and clutched the bundle, whilst the nurse turned down the rushlight in the socket. Then there was a slight rustle, with the sound of two or three hasty kisses. The next moment, the outer door was partially opened—a cool gust of air came inwards as the dark figure of the man passed outwards—the door slowly closed again, and the fastenings were replaced with less noise than is made by a mouse. The nurse then groped to the counter where she found her candlestick and the empty rummer, but not the spoon, a loss she instantly comprehended—the bundle had not quite served for the turn; but her equanimity was undisturbed, and, cautiously feeling her way out of the surgery, she crept, silent as a spirit, up the stairs to the nursery, leaving Kezia to her dreaming conference with Mr. Postle.

"Yes," she said, "there is some dreadful misfortune happening over us, no doubt. My poor dear master! Mrs. Prideaux foretells he is a ruinated man. But, oh, Mr. Postle!"—and the tears oozed from her eyelids, while she clasped her hands in earnest appeal to him—"whatever comes of it, don't let nothing tempt us two to leave and better ourselves and forsake them, whose bread we eat, in their adversity. For my part, I'm ready and willing to take a solemn religious oath on my bended knees,"—and she suited the action to the word,—"and trust you will do the same; never, never, never to give warning, nor take it neither, but to stand by the family and do for it to my last grasp, namely, my poor dear master and missis, and them two lovely, helpless, innocent, twin babes!"

What promise the imaginary Mr. Postle made, and whether with the prescribed ceremony, is unknown; but it gave the liveliest satisfaction to the devoted maid of all work. The expression of her features, was, indeed, invisible in the dark; but Heaven, with its starry eyes, beheld her face shining with joy and gratitude.

"The Lord bless you, dear, dear Mr. Postle, for that comfort," she said, rising from her knees, and wiping her eyes with the sleeve of her only garment. "It's exactly my own feeling and sentiments. Yes if I was courted, at this very moment by twenty prostrated lovers at my feet, with bags of gold in one hand, and wows of constancy in the other. I would n't change my state but refuse them all, and live single for the sake of my family—and which reminds me it's eight o'clock, and breakfast to make."

So saying, led by that mysterious guidance which directs the somnaubulist—whether some supernatural clairvoyance, or, more probably, an internal geographical scheme, corresponding with the external locality, and producing an exquisite consciousness by touch, independent of sight, of long familiar distances and habitual turns and windings—however, without blunder or collision, the sleeping Kezia passed hastily from the surgery, through the hall, into her kitchen, to prepare the morning meal to which she had referred. But here the guiding faculty was at fault. Besides the old furniture and utensils, on every article of which she could, blindfolded, have laid her hand, the floor was occupied by sunday novel and strange contrivances for holding the superabundant relics of the festival overnight. Against one of these extempore dressers she walked, with a force and a clatter that startled her wide awake, with one hand in a jelly, and her nose seemingly testing the sweetness of a boiled ham. The darkness, the cold, her undress, and the remembrance of former nocturnal excursions, instantly suggested the truth; her mind, however, retaining no trace of her recent dream; so, after a single exclamation of surprise, she quietly groped for the tinder-box, lighted a square candle, and, yawning and shivering, crept up stairs to the back garret, to get a brief rest, before the very early hour at which she regularly resumed the multifarous labors of her industrious days.

CHAPTER XVII.—A CLUE.

In the surgery—so lately the scene of a double mystery, of a clandestine midnight meeting and unconscious somnambulism—of treacherous, heartless vigilance and honest devotion faithful even in sleep—at his old desk stood Mr Postle, apparently studying some medical work, but in reality thinking over the supper of the night before, and puzzling himself to account for the absence of the guests. But his meditations were in vain: to use one of his own favorite illustrations, he might as well have tried to make a nosegay with flowers of sulphur.

Meanwhile, in looking at his old prompters, along the wall from shelf to shelf, with all the parade of nice-looking nastiness arranged thereon in rows of glass bottles and white jars, marked with cabalistical signs,—his eye detected one receptacle breaking the uniformity of the series by being turned with its label to the wall. But he did not need to see the gilt scroll to know its inscription—"Tinct. Opii."

"Confound that idiot!" he muttered. "He will poison himself yet with his sweet tooth and his tastings. I can trace the mark of his wet finger on the bottles and drawers like the track of a snail. Only yesterday I had to teach him that Ferrum Tart, does not stand for pastry, nor Ceart. Plumb, for almonds and raisins,—and now he has been at the laudanum!"

For once, however, Catechism Jack was mistakenly accused. No finger of his, wet or dry, had approached the dangerous narcotic. Another pupil-teacher, rather sharp than dull of intellect, had removed the stopper for a less innocent purpose than to test the flavor of the tincture. The dear twins owed their very sound sleep in the night to a minute dose from that displaced bottle.

The assistant carefully rectified its position, and returning to his desk began, with pen and ink, to sketch—another of his habits—on the quire of blotting paper before him, his designs being generally of the anatomical class, outlines of bones, muscles, and organs, rarely deviating into landscape or rather scraps of foliage, and even then what was meant for a tree resembled rather a drawing of the Vena Porta or Vena Cava, with its branching veins. This time, however, his subject was the human face, not dissected, but in its natural state; and as very commonly happens to artists, fine or unfine, the features took the form and expression of a countenance remotely present to his thoughts, so that without any premeditated protraiture, he had just achieved a rather striking but ugly likeness of Doctor Shackle, when a shawdow fell across the paper, and looking up, he beheld the original of the picture standing right before him.

The doctor was accompanied by a Mr. Hix, a parish official, and a very active one—but especially notable for a double propensity to turn private business into public, and public business into private—at once an indefatigable meddler in, an advertiser of the personal concerns of his neighbors, and the uniform advocate of select vestries, secret committees, private reports, sealed books, suppressed accounts, the exclusion of reporters, and closed doors. Indeed, so far did he carry this love of mystery that, when certain parochial notices were to be posted, according to law, for the benefit of the community at large, he was said to have seriously recommended their being pasted up with their printed sides to the wall.

The ostensible errand of Doctor Shackle was merely to ask, in a friendly way, after the heads of the family, and now they had passed the night the trying disappointments they had endured: an injury urged with such seeming interest, that in the absence of any authentic bulletin, Mr. Postle deemed it expedient to fetch my father himself to reply personally to the application.

His back was no sooner turned, than Shackle, reaching his long arm over the low rail in front of the desk, snatched up something which he exhibited to his companion—namely, a fragment of French gray cloth in one hand, and in the open palm of the other two silver-washed nails. The pantomime that followed was silent, but expressive. "Do you see these, and understand what they mean!" asked the fixed significant look of the doctor, as plainly as in words.

"I do," replied the intelligent nod of Mr. Hix.

The doctor raised his eyebrows and shrugged his shoulders. "Could there be a clearer case?"

The churchwarden shook his head and made a grimace—"Nor a more ugly business."

"I'm sorry for it—very!" said Shackle, hastily replacing the cloth and nails on the desk, and then suddenly turning his back on them, and fixing his eyes on a large glass jar full of snow-white magnesian bricks, as if projecting how to build with them some castle in the air. So intensely, indeed, was he occupied with this ideal fabric, as not to be aware of the entrance of my father, till the latter came close up to him, and shook him cordially by hand. Then he awoke, and how delighted he was, or said he was, to find my father not merely as well but better than could have been expected, after the late untoward events—a series of disappointments borne, he must say, with a equanimity worthy of the palmy days of the Stoic Philosophy.

"Had it been my own case," said Shackle, "to say nothing of the dead convival failure, yet to meet with such a slight from the whole neighborhood, as it were—the cut wholesale as well as direct—I really think, with my own more sensitive, irritable temperament, I should either have gone there,"—and he pointed to the laudanum bottles—"for oblivion, or there"—and he indicated another drug—"for annihilation."

"No, no," said my father, "you know better. And besides, there was no great stoicism needed in the matter. A medical man, and a Christian, who had walked the hospitals and the poor-house, and seen human misery and anguish in all their complicated shapes, and who could not bear such a petty mishap—provoking as I profess it was—would be a disgrace to his profession and his religion. As to the absence of our friends, no doubt it will be accounted for."

"No doubt," said Dr. Shackle.

"For the rest," continued my father, "the worst we are threatened with is to be cloyed with sweets for a few days to come, or sufeited with cold victuals; evils for which, between young folks and poor ones, we may easily find a remedy."

"I am glad to find you so well armed against trouble," said Dr. Shackle; "and wish I had a little of your philosophy. I have equal need of it—for we are likely to be mutually involved in a very disgraceable business."

"A parochial, and perhaps a public business," said Mr. Hix. My father looked inquiringly from one speaker to another.

"The short of the matter is this," said Dr Shackle. "You have heard, of course of the pauper family, who gave their dead child that ridiculous funeral?—

"The Hobbeses," said Mr. Hix. "Indulged themselves with a genteel burial—and on our books for three shilling a week!"

"Yes, inconsistent enough," said my father. "I was accidentally an eye-witness of the procession."

"Well," said Shackle, "the grave was robbed the other night, and the child's body stolen. The whole village is in ferment about it—the poor especially, the paupers outrageous, and the Hobbeses rampant."

"Poor things," said my father.

"Yes, poor enough," said Shackle; wilfully wresting my father's phrase of commiseration into another sense.

"And idle enough and troublesmoe enough, and more than enough," added Mr Hix."

"And scandalous enough," said Shackle, "to say that their beggarly corpses are less cared for than the carcasses of brute beasts."

"The coarse expression," said my father, "of a strong but natural prejudice,"

"Oh, quite natural," sneered Doctor Shackle; "and quite harmless, if their prejudices went no farther. But as human corpses are not eaten, except by ghouls, hyænas, and beasts of prey, of which there are none in this blessed Lincolnshire, the natural inference is that graves are robbed, and bodies snatched for other than pantry purposes. In short, in their own low language, that the poor are only poked into pit-holes, to be poked up again and cut and hacked about like dog's meat, by raw, 'prentices and sawbonesses,—and heaven knows what vulgar libels besides."

"Well, and what then!" asked my father. "As a surgeon, you are not going, I presume, to deny the practices of the resurrectionists, or the uses to which the articles they deal in are applied?"

"Not I," said Shackle. "The thing is too notorious; and, as you say, too surgical: though I never had directly, a finger in any cold meat pie of the kind. Probably you have. However, the popular suspicion necessarily falls on the medical men of the place; under which category we share the odium between us; at least, pro tempore; for, as regards myself, as we doctors say, I shall very soon remove all that; and hope you are in as good case."

"Most decidedly," said my father.

"So much the better," said Shackle. "Your official connection with the poor, as parish doctor, makes your exculpation of even more importance than my own."

"There must be a parochical inquiry! exclaimed Mr. Hix.

"Of course, with closed doors," said Shackle; unable to resist a sarcasm, even on a friend and ally—a propensity that explained his otherwise unaccountable influence in a place where so few persons liked, but so many feared him.

"In fact," he continued, "the wretches do not scruple to say that the anatomizing of their remains is winked at by the workhouse authorities."

"And if we did," cried Mr. Hix, "every ounce of flesh on their bones was composed of parish victuals. There is n't a pauper dies, man, woman, or child, but in equity we have a mortgage, as I may say, on their bodies."

"That's undeniable," said Shackle. "However, the paupers are all up in arms, and declare openly, that they won't work; and even that they won't die, unless assured of decent and safe interment,"

"Won't die!" exclaimed Mr. Hix.

"So they say," answered Shackle.

"Won't die!" repeated the churchwarden. "That must be looked to."

My father, who had been lost in thought, here awoke from his reverie, and addressed himself to Shackle.

"Yes, docter, you are right. This is a very disagreeable business, and a very serious one, at least for me."

"And for the parish too," said Mr. Hix, "to have such a slur on it."

"Especially," said Shackle, "as it is not a matter that can be shelved, or cushioned, or hushed up."

"And ought not to be," said my father, "must not! Last night's mystery is now solved. I am socially excommunicated. How or why, I know not, but a suspicion has fallen upon me, which I must remove, or give up my practice, and quit the neighborhood. A public inquiry will be necessary, for my own sake."

"And for mine too," said Shackle.

"For all our sakes!" cried Mr. Hix. "The excitement of the lower orders will be sure to fall first on the authorities—the churchwardens and overseers. The least I expect is, to be hung or burnt in effigy, or to have my windows smashed!"

My father mechanically looked up over the surgery-door at the yellow glass globe, so often broken; and true to his misgivings, if not actually smashed, it was starred in all directions by some missile that had struck it in the centre. He pointed it out to his visitors.

"There is a token of the popular feeling—the local current that has set in against me. For some time past I have fancied myself treated with coldness and aversion by the humbler class of the inhabitants; but a clear conscience and my good will towards them repelled the supposition. Now, however, there is a direct imputation on me which I must at once rebut, or be a ruined man."

"The Board sits this morning," suggested Mr. Hix.

"In that case," said my father, "I will at once go before it, and clear my character. I need not say, I hope, that I am altogether innocent in the matter—as innocent as those leeches," and he pointed to the bottle—"of the blood of Julius Cæsar."

"I am truly happy to hear you say so," cried Shackle, seizing and squeezing my father's hand; "and shall be still more happy to hear you prove it."

The churchwarden expressed a similar wish, but instead of shaking hands, contented himself with a stiff bow, externally taking a simple leave of my father, but internally bidding good-bye to him though somewhat precociously, as the parish doctor. The real functionary, in his eyes, was the medical gentleman with whom he walked off arm in arm.

A clue at last!" cried my father to Mr. Postle, whose entrance into the surgery was synchronous with the exit of Dr. Shackle—a hint that Animal Magnetism ought properly to have two poles,—of repulsive Antipathy as well as of sympathetic Attraction. "A clue at last! We have found out the disease!" And my father imparted to his assistant the substance of the information he had just obtained.

"Say I told you so!" cried the assistant; an exclamation he would have made, however, if just informed of a shower of addled brains from the moon. "And that, then is why we were sent last night to Coventry—to sup by ourselves! Not that they would have touched the supper if they had come—they would have fancied human brains in the blanc mange, and coagulated blood in the currant jelly. Yes—for the future we are ghouls, vampires, carrion vultures—and nobody will come near us. There is nothing that unscientific people are so squeamish about as violating graves and desecrating their remains—though why the suspicion should fall on us, more than on Doctor Shackle he knows best. If any one wants a refresher in anatomy, he does. And what, sir, do you mean to do!"

"Confront the report," said my father. "Go before the Board and demand an inquiry. Is not that always the best course—to take the bull by the horns?"

"Perhaps so—except you'er run at by a polled cow," answered Mr. Postle. "For my part I'd as soon go at once at Farmer Nokes' bull with a board over his eyes, with 'ba vare' upon it. It's the Board, or a parcel of it, that wants to get you out, and have Shackle in your place."

"I don't—I can't—I won't believe it!" cried my father.

"As you please," said Mr. Postle. "If they don't, the paupers will, which comes to the same thing. I know them well: when the poor once catch a prejudice in their heads, it's as obstinate as ringworm. I lost my own practice by it when I was a doctor on my own account. My patients were mostly provincials of the lower and middle class, but all brutally ignorant, and of course superstitious, and devout believers in witchcraft. And how do you think I lost them? by a joke,—sir a mere joke—through telling a credulous old woman—ass as I was!—that I could show her Mindererus' spirit, dancing with Saint Vitus, round Saint Anthony's Fire!"

"But surely a just," said my father, "might have been explained."

"Not it," said Mr. Postle. "To the vulgar, a doctor with his hieroglyphics on his bottles, and his Latin, is already half a conjuror, and I had made myself a necromancer outright. There was no revoking it. You may make an ignorant stomach give up its poison, but an ignorant faith never gives up a legend it has once swallowed."

"I should like to hear your definition of an ignorant stomach," said my father, straying, as he was too apt, from serious matters after a whim.

"We are likely to know practically," answered the assistant, in a gloomy tone, "if ignorance and emptiness be synonymous, as they are in the head for I don't suppose, as the practice goes, that the Board will board us."

"That is true," said my father. "I must go to the workhouse." And with a smile at the unintentional equivoque, he put on his hat, and set out for the parochial meeting.

Had he delayed a minute longer, he would have been startled and stopped by a sound ringing in his own house from hall to attic,—that sudden, shrill cry which only comes from a female in distress, anguish, or alarm,—and electrifies the hearer like a flash of lightning turned from visible into audible. As it flew first from the kitchen to the surgery close at hand, Mr. Postle was soonest at the spot, where, close to the ironing-board, the movable supports of which she had knocked away in her fall, lay Kezia in a strong hysterical fit, in the middle of a chaos of crockery, glasses, decanters knives forks, tongue, cold fowls, tarts, salad cakes, and jellies,—amidst which she kicked and struggled like a passenger desperately swimming, or trying to swim, from the wreck of some well provisioned steamer.

Having dashed into her face the first water at hand, the assistant stepped back into the surgery for the Sal. Vol. or Liq. Vol. C. C., but with so much professional deliberation—knowing such fits may be safely left to run their course—that when he returned to the kitchen, he found the patient propped up against the wall, in a sitting posture, between Mrs. Prideaux and Uncle Rumbold; the first loosening the sufferer's dress and the last, having lent a hand in her removal, gazing calmly on, very like a bearded Turk confiding in Predestination, and still more like himself "trusting to Nature." Mr Postle nevertheless plied the stimulants.

"One more application of the restoratives," said Mrs. Prideaux, "and she will revive. There!... she is resuming her senses."

As she spoke, the color began to return to the claret-bald cheeks of Kezia, who, after a gasp or two, opened her eyes, sneezed, stared at each person in turn, then suddenly turned pale again, closed her eyes, clasped her hands wildly together and shrieking "the plate! the plate!" relapsed into insensibility.

The restorative process was again applied, and with success. The maid-of-all-work, after a short struggle, sprang up, as if galvanized, on her feet; and amidst gulps, sobs, broken, ejaculations, and distracted gestures, informed her audience by bits and snatches that "there had been thieves in the house, and Mr. Ruffy's silver tankard, and the Reverend Curate's silver-gilt salts, and all Mrs. Trent's school spoons, were missing!"

Poor, faithful, devoted Kezia! No hand had she in that felonious abstraction; and yet, for all her innocence, how fearfully within the range of suspicion, whilst Guilt stood by in comparative safety, without a tremor in her silvery voice, or a faltering in her correct carriage! Had some wakeful ear, startled by the unseasonable issuing of the housemaid from her bedroom, heard her descending the stairs, marked her passage from hall to surgery, from surgery to kitchen, and recognized, by listening, her voice in conversation though but with a shadow, and then her stealthy retreat before dawn to her own attic, she was in all human probability a lost, undone ruined creature. Like other somnambulists, who, in their nocturnal, unconscious wanderings, step, dream-led, on the narrow window-sill or perilous parapet, she had walked to the very verge of a moral precipice, would she keep her footing, or fall?—Living Age.

Krettel.

A TALE OF WOMAN'S WIT AND COURAGE.

It was the year 1832, towards the close of November; a light snow, mingled with sleet, was whirled about by the wind, and pierced through every crevace of a roadside inn situated between Hornburg and Bottwell, on the frontiers of the duchy of Haden.

Two travellers, driven by the bad weather to the shelter of this humble hostelry, were forgetting hunger and weariness in the comforts of a hearty repast of smoked beef. The hissing and roaring of a large stove contrasted agreeably in the traveller's ears with the loud moaning of the north wind without, and disposed them still more to enjoyment of the good things within.

The innkeeper and his wife, had, for their only domestic, a young girl of Baden, whom they had brought up from childhood. Krettel, for such was her name, was a host in herself: housekeeper and maid to her mistress, cook in the kitchen, valet de-chambre to the stray visitants in the one best room the groom in the stable—the hardy, active and good humored German girl fulfilled all the duties usually shared by a large establishment of servants.

Ten o'clock struck, and the travellers, having finished their supper, drew nearer to the group which had collected around the stove—Father Hoffkirch, the minister, their host, and some neighbors who had entered by chance. The conversation turned on the fearful and murderous events of which the neighboring forest had been the scene, and each one had his story to tell, surpassing the rest in horror—Father Hoffkirch was among the foremost in terrifying his audience by the recital of different adventures, all more or less tragical. The worthy father had just finished a horible story of robbers—quite a chef d'œuvre in its way. The scene of the legend was a little more than gun shot from the inn door: it was a tradition unfortunately, but an ancient one, which still remained on the identical spot, given to the narration a gloomy verity, which no one dared to question. This place was, in truth, made for a table throughout the province as being, it was said, the rendezvous of a troop of banditti, who held there every night there mysterious meetings. As the guests were still under the influence of the terror which the story of Father Hoffkirch had caused, when one of the travellers before mentioned offered to bet two ducats that no one dared to sett off at that moment to the fatal spot, and trace with charcoal a cross on the gibbet. The very idea of such a proposition increased the fear on the company.—A long silence was their only reply. Suddenly the young Krettel, who was quietly spining in a corner rose up and accepted the bet, asking her master's consent at the same time. He and his good wife at first refused, alleging the loneliness of the place in case of danger; but the fearless damsel presisted and was at last suffered to depart.

Krettel only requested that the inn door should be left open till her return: and taking a piece of charcoal, to prove on the morrow that she had really visited the spot, she rapidly walked towards the gibbet. When close beside it she started fancying she heard a noise; however, after a moment of hesitation, she stepped forward ready to take flight at the least danger. The noise was renewed. Krettel listened intently, and the sound of horses' feet struck upon her ear. Her terror prevented her at first from seeing how near it was to her; but the next moment she perceived that the object of her fear was fastened to the gibbet itself. She took courage, darted forward, and traced the cross. At the same moment the repot of a pistol told her that she had been noticed. By a movement swift as thought she unloosed the horse, leapt on the saddle, and fled like lighthing. She was pursued, but, redoubling her speed, she reached the inn yard, calling out to them to shut the gate, and fainted away. When the brave girl recovered, she told her story, and was warmly congratulated on her courage and presence of mind. All admired the horse, which was of striking beauty. A small leathern valise was attached to the saddle; but Father Hoffkirch would not suffer it to be opened, except in the presence of the burgomaster.

On the morrow, which was Sunday, the innkeeper and his wife, and their guest, all set off to a neighbouring town, where they intended, after service to breakfast the burgomaster with the last evening's adventure. Krettel, left sole gaurdian of the house, was [illegible] to admit any one until her master's, [illegible] Many a young girl would have trembled at being left in such a situation; but this young servant maid, having watched the party disappear, fearlessly set about her household duties singing with a light heart and a clear voice some pious hymn, which her kind mistress had taught her.

An hour had scarcely passed by when there came a knock at the outer door; it was a traveller on horseback, who asked leave to rest awhile. Krettel at first refused him, but on the promise of the cavalier that he would only breakfast and depart, she agreed to admit him; beside, the man was well dressed and alone, so there seemed little to fear from him. The stranger wished himself to take his horse to the stable, and admiring the noble steed which had arrived the previous evening in a manner so unexpected. While breakfasting, he asked many questions about the inn and its owners; inquired whose was the horse that had attracted his attention so much; and, in short, acted so successfully, that the poor girl, innocent of all deceit, told him her late adventure, and ended by the confession that she was all alone. She immediately felt a vague sense of having committed some imprudence, for the stranger listned to her with singular attention, and seemed to take a greater interest than simple, curiosity in what she was saying.

The breakfast was prolonged to its utmost length; at last, after a few unimportant questions, the traveller desired the servant girl to bring him a bottel of wine. Krettel rose to obey; but on reaching the cellar, found that the stranger had followed her, and turning around, she saw the glitter of a pistol handle through his vest. Her presence of mind failed her not at this critical moment. When they had reached the foot of the stairs, she suddenly extinguished the light, and stood up close against the wall; the man muttering imprecations, advanced a few steps, groping his way. Krettel, profiting by this moment, remounted the steps agile and noiseless, closed and firmly bolted the door upon the pretended traveller, and then barricaded herself securly in an upper chamber, there to wait her master's arrival.

Krettel had not been long ensconced in her retreat when a fresh knocking resounded at the inn door, and she perceived there two ill-looking men, who asked her what had become of a traveller who had been there a short time before. From their description of his appearance, the young girl immediately discovered that the person sought for was the stranger whom she had locked in the cellar; nevertheless, she thought it most prudent to make no admission on the subject. On her refusing their request to open the door, the two men threatened to scale the wall. The poor girl trembled with fear; her courage was nigh deserting her; for she knew they could easily accomplish their project by means of the iron bars fixed to the windows of the lower story. In this perplexity, Krettel looked around her, and her eye fell on a musket which hung from the wall, a relic of her master's younger days. She seized it, and pointing the [illegible] out of the window, cried out that she would [illegible] first man who attempted to [illegible]

[illegible] for at such they were could [illegible] struck dum at the sight of [illegible], experiencing no resistance, they had [illegible] confounded by such in- [illegible] the most fearful [illegible] again in greater [illegible] remained [illegible] peak. An hour passed away in this critical position, at last the girl perceived her master and his friends coming in sight, accompanied by the burgomaster and some officers.

The brave Krettel rushed to the door, and her fear amounting almost to despair, gave place to the liveliest joy. To the wonder and admiration of all, she related what had happened; the burgomaster especially lavished on her the warmest praise for her heroic conduct. The officers went in search of the robber whom Krettel had imprisoned with so much address and presence of mind. After a sharp resistance, he was bound and secured, and soon after recognised as the chief of a band of robbers who had for some time spread terror over the country. His men, wandering about without a captain, were quickly either taken or dispersed. The burgomaster decided that the horse and the valise, which contained a great number of gold pieces should be given to the young Krettel, whose courage had so powerfully contributed to rid the country of a banditti who had infested it for so long a time.—American Volunteer.

THE IMPORT OF A LADY'S DRESS.

Let no woman suppose that any man can be really indifferent to her appearance. The instinct may have been deadened in his mind by a slaternly, negligent mother, or by plain, maiden, lowchurch sister; but she may be sure it is there and, with a little adroitness, capable of revival. Of course, the immediate effect of a well-chosen feminine toilet operates differently in different minds. In some it causes a sense of actual pleasure; in others, a consciousness of passive enjoyment. In some it is intensely felt while present; in others, only missed when gone. None can deny its power over them, more or less, or, for their own sakes, had better not be believed if they do. Such being the case, the responsibilities of a wife in this department are very serious. In point of fact, she dresses for two, and in neglecting herself, virtually defrauds her neighbour. Nature has expressly assigned her as the only safe investment for his vanities; and she who wantonly throws them back from their natural course, deserves either to see them break out on his own person, or appear in that of another. But independent of the plain law of instinct, there is one for the promotion of dress among ladies which may be plainer still to some—and this is the law of self-interest. It is all very well for bachelors to be restricted to a costume which expresses nothing beyond a general sense of their own unfitness to be seen—since they can be safety trusted for publishing their characters to the world with that forwardness which is their chief element; but heaven forbid that the spinsters should ever take to the same outward neutrality. With their habitual delicacy of mind, and reserve of manner, dress becomes a symbolical language.—a kind of personal glossary—a species of body phrenology—the study of which it would be madness to neglect. Will Honeycomb says that he can tell the humour a woman is in by the colour of her hood. We go farther, and maintain that, to a proficient in the science, every woman walks about with a placard, on which her leading qualities are advertised. [Quarterly Review.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, NOVEMBER 19 1847.

New Cesstere.

It is gratifying to us to be able to announce to our readers, that New Cesstere, is now, a part and parcel of Liberia, by a regular purchase of it, from the Chiefs of the country. Several attempts have been made to gain this important track of country, but the slave traders established there, have by a profusion of presents to the chiefs, been enabled to exercise great influence over them, and until now, have thwarted every scheme of the authorities to obtain a conference with the chiefs. A few days ago, the gentlemen who were charged with this duty succeeded in procuring an interview with them, without the knowledge of the slavers, and purchased this much desired tract of country. View it in every form and this addition to our purchased territory, must be regarded as a very important acquisition. We hope soon to hear that the Executive has ordered away those dealers in human flesh and we feel confident in asserting, that their baneful presence will not again prevent the prosecution of legitimate commerce at that place. It is a large country, and we earnestly invite the attention of our merchants to it—the forest abounds with palm trees, and all that is necessary to make it an important palm oil mart, is, for them to make trading establishments there, as they have done on other parts of the coast.

We have learned with considerable pleasure, that the commissioners despatched by the Executive, a month ago, to the leeward, to negotiate for territory, have made some important purchases. They have succeeded in obtaining the remainder of the Timbo country, and two other points lying between it and the River Cesters, and which make that noble river one of our boundary lines. The chiefs of "River Cesters" seem desirous to sell, and we hope soon to hear, that that interesting country has been negotiated for.

Gallinas.

Captain Murray commanding the British naval forces on this part of the coast, is we are creditably informed about to attempt the demolition of the slave establishments at the Gallinas. The object will be to destroy effectually every vestige of that abominable traffic in that neighborhood. To effect this, Captain M. is now endeavouring to form treaties with the chiefs residing near the Gallinas, to get them to agree, not to permit the slavers to live in their territories, after they have been expelled from their old places. If he succeeds in procuring such conditions, the slavers will be obliged to leave that part of the coast. We wish for Captain Murray every success in his laudable and praiseworthy exertions to exterminate that nest of free-booters.

We give below the returns of the election, as far as they have been received. Sinoe county is yet to be heard from—the returns from there, we presume, will soon come to hand. Much anxiety is manifested here, to know who will be sent from there to the Legislature.

President,
Joseph J. Roberts.

Vice President,
Nathaniel Brander.

FOR THE LEGISLATURE.

Montserrado County,

Senators.
John N. Lewis,
John B. Gripon.

Representatives,
Dixon B. Brown,
Daniel B. Warner,
William Draper,
James B. McGill.

Grand Basea County.

Senators.
John Hanson,
William L. Weaver.

Representatives.
Henry B. Whitfield,
Mathew A. Rand,
Edward Lyles.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

Selfishness.

God has written upon the flower that sweetens the air—upon the breeze that rocks the flower on its stem—upon the rain drop that refreshes the sprig of moss that lifts its head in the desert—upon the ocean that rocks every swimmer in its deep chambers—upon every pencilled shell that sleeps in the caverns of the deep, no less than upon the mighty sun which warms and cheers millions of creatures that live in its light—upon his works he has written—"none of us liveth to himself." And probably were we wise enough to understand these works, we should find that there is nothing—from the cold stone in the earth, or the minutest creature that breathes—which may not, in some way or other, minister to the happiness of some living creature. We admire and praise that flower that best answers the end for which it was created, and bestows the most pleasure. We value and praise the horse, which best answers the end for which he was created, and the tree that bears fruit the most rich and abundant. The star that is the most useful in the heavens is the star that we admire the most

Now is it not reasonable, that man, to whom the whole creation, from the flower up to the spangled heavens, all minister—man who has the power of conferring deeper misery or higher happiness than any other being on earth—man, who can act like God if he will—is it not reasonable that he should live for the noble end of living, not to himself but for others.

A POINTED HIT.—An invalid once sent for a physician, and after detaining him for some time; with a description of his pains; ichesetc. he thus summed up:

"Now doctor you have humbugged me long enough with your good for nothing pills and worthless syrups, they don't touch the real difficulty. I wish you to strike the cause of my ailements if it is in your power to reach it." "It shall be done." said the doctor at the same time lifting his cane and demolishing a decanter of gin that stood on the sideboard!

Religion is, indeed, essential to the strength, the real refined strength, as well as the purity and elevation of the mind.

Riches hide vice, and poverty conceals virtue.

He is the best accountant who casts up correctly his own errors.

Kindness in the heart is a gem of the first maguitude. Whoever possesses this trait, will sail smoothly over the ocean of life leaving behind a memory that will never cease to be cherished.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH WORKMAN.—You see in the working classes in Paris the cheerfulness of countenance and the liveliness of manner which characterise the French as a people; but you cannot, at the same time, fail to observe indications of physical feebleness about them. They have none of the firmness of step, of the muscular energy, or of the general hardiness of appearance, which are usual characteristics of English labourers. They want even the manliness of aspect which is so strongly exhibited by the working [illegible] in this country. Constitutionally the French people are inferior to Englishmen in physical energy; but I am satisfied that [illegible] the marked difference there is in the food of Englishmen and Frenchmen, is chiefly to be ascribed the much greater feebleness of the latter,—Barbin.

NEW GOODS!

The least that I can say is, that my stock is large in the total, being very near half the Bark Montgomery's tonnage. But small in the various varieties. It is therefore, useless to attempt to articulate the assortments of staple and fancy Dry goods, the new fashions of both Europe and America, Groceries, Hardware, provisions, drugs, medicines, and dye stuffs. And that minutia of things which pertain to ladies tastes. Let all imagine that they can get almost any thing at Roy's new store, on the fairest terms. Any and every thing will be sold for cash down, or the products which will bear exportation. Store in Rev. B. R. Wilson's stone store house on Broad St.

EDWARD J. ROYE

Oct. 23rd. 1847.
Monrovia.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile business under the firm of Samuel F. Mc Gill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MC GILL.
R. S. MC GILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

MARRIED.

Wilkes-Barre Luzrine Co: Penna., November 19th 1846, by the Rev. John Dorrance; J. Lawrence Day, M. D. of Madison, Morris Co. N. J. to Miss Sarah B. Hibler eldest daughter of Wm. Hibler Esq. of the former place.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	8	10
Beads, pound,	"	16	20
Beef, cargo No. 1.	Bb	10 00	12 00
Blue Bafts,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	30	35
Boards,	1000/t	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	none
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12	15
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 12
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Pg	8
Camwood,	Ton	80 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	10 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	9 00	10 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	9 00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1-3	35
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1-2
Romauls	Ps.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Ps.	3 00
Tobacco	1000lbs.	none
Washhand bowls	Dozen	2 00	10 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	10 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Nov. 10. Lib. sloop Nathan Banga, Ammons master, from the leeward.

" " H. M. C. M. Schooner of war Hirondelle, E. Beligeice commander from leeward.

" " Lib. Cutter Eliza Frances, Howard master, from the leeward.

" 11. British schooner Mary Ann, Walker master, from the leeward: passengers from Grand Basa, Mr. C. R. Johnson and lady, Mrs Benson and Miss C. Weaver.

" " French barque ——, —— master, from the leeward: sailed same day for the windward.

" 14. Am. brig Hollander, Lovit master, from the leeward.

DEPARTUES.

Nov. 11. Lib. schooner Pedler, Carroll master, for leeward.

" 13 British schooner Mary Ann, Walker master for Sierra Leone.

POETRY.

MEMORY'S SPELL.

She started from her cheerful dream,
And by the moonbeams' aid,
Crept to the nearest casement blind,
To list the serenade.

The stranger's voice, so soft and clear,
Bore impress of the mind;
But round the cheerful tones, to her,
A sadness was entwined.

That oft-heard, lively, well-known strain,
Called back the happy past;
Gaily it echoed on her ear—
A joy that would not last.

E'en as a record fraught with love,
And traced in vanished hours,
Will dim the eye with sadning spring,
That gush in childish showers.

Or passing scene of blooming plant
Recalls departed things,
With all the strong o'erwhelming force
Of memory's imagings.

These links that fetter—oh, how firm!
All other thoughts outweighed;
And thus her beating, throbbing heart
Welcomed the serenade.—Richmond Enquirer.

MISCELLANEOUS

(Concluded from the last.)

The state and prospects of authors; however, concerns you less, dear public, than the state and prospects of literature. You are a contemplative body of men, and can see into a millstone as far as most nations. You make leagues and anti-leagues for the sake of your morsel of bread; and teach the million to sing to your own tune; and weary of keeping your heads above water, tunnel your way below it; nor will you allow the suffering shirtmakers of your metropolis to be put upon, nor Don Carlos, nor Queen Pomare, nor any other victim of oppression. You applauded Alice Lowe, and shook hands with Courvoisier at the gallows; and it is clear you stand no nonsense, and bear no malice.

Be so good therefore, as seriously to consider what sort of figure you will cut in the eyes of posterity, if this kind of thing is suffered to go on.

There is not one published in the three kingdoms (we throw down the gauntlet) who would give an adequate sum of money for any new historical work. There is not one publisher in the three kingdoms who would give even a moderate sum for a poem. We state the case liberally: for our conviction is, that they would refuse one poor half-crown. So much for the prospects; for without a premium production is null.

As regards the state of literature, take out your pencils, (you all carry pencils, to calculate either the long odds or the odds on Change,) and make out a list of the works published during the last five years, likely to be known, even by name a hundred year hence! It is some comfort to feel, that by sight they cannot be known—that few of them will survive to disgrace us—that the circulating libraries possess the one merit of wear and tear for the destruction of their filthy generation, like Saturn of old; for it would grieve us to think of even the trunks of the two thousandth century being lined with what lines the brains of our contemporaries. So that in the year of grace two thousand and forty-four, we shall have the Lady Blarney of Kilburn Square (the Grosvenor Square of the epoch) inquiring of the Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs of croy den Place (the Belgium Square)—„My dear soul, what could those poor people do to amuse themselves? They had positively no books! After Scott's time till the middle of the nineteenth century not a single novelist; after the death of Byron, not a poet! I believe there was an historian of the name of Hallam, not much heard of; and the other day, at a bookstall, I picked up an odd volume of an odd writer named Carlyle. But it is really curious to consider how utterly the belles-lettres were in abeyance."

To which, of course, Miss C. W. A. S. —(even Dr. Panurge could not get through the whole name again!)—"My dear love! they had Blackwood's Magazine, which, like the Koran after the burning of the Alexandrian library, supplied the place of ten millions of volumes!"

But, alas! some Burchell may be sitting by, to exclaim "Fudge!" Some groper into archievs will bring forth one of those never-to be sufficiently abominated catalogues of Bond and other streets, showing that, on a moderate calculation, twenty books were published per diem, which, at the end of three months, possessed the value of so many bushels of oyster-shells!

And then, pray, what will you have to say for yourselves, O public! from your tombs in West-minister Abbey, or your catacombs at Kensal Green? Which among you will dare to come forward, with blue lights in his hand and accompanied by a trombone, like the ghost of Ninus in Semiramide, and say—"We warned these people to write for immortality. We told them it was their duty to stick in a few oaks for posterity, as well as their Canada poplars and Scotch firs. It was not our fault that they chose to grow nothing but underwood. It was the fault of the circulating libraries, which, instead of allowing the milk of human genius to set for cream, diluted it with malice prepense, and drenched us with milk and water even to loathing!"

No, dear public! you will put your hand in your breeches' pocket like a crocodile, as you do now, and say nothing. You are fully aware how much of the fault is your own; but you are stultified and hardened to shame. With the disgrace of your National Gallery, and National Regency Buildings, and Pimlico Palace, and all your other vulgarisms and trivialities on your shoulders, you bully your way out of your disgrace of dunce hood, like Mike Lambourne forgetting his part in the Kenilworth pageant. "For your part, you can do very well without book-learning. You've got Shakspere, and if with that a nation can't face the literature of Europe, the deuce is in it! With Cocker's arithmetic and Shakepere, any public that knows what it's about, may snap its fingers at the world!"

Such, such are the demoralizing results of the ascendency of the circulating libraries! Such is the monster-misery of literature!"

Again, therefore, we say, confound those fifteen talents! What have ye not to answer for, O ye Athenians! in the consequences of your malpractices of old!—Living Age.

THE ORIGIN OF COAL.—The following novel legend is given in illustration of one of the plates of Whitfield's "North American Scenery:"—

The Maid of Lackawana—One night, when Ininee and her lover parted, she did not enter the lodge, but waited until he had gone a little distance, and then followed him to see which way he went. She walked a long time, till she came to the foot of a mountain, and then he disappeared. She cast her eyes upon every side, but he was nowhere visible, and she reached the lodge just as the gleams of the early morn shone through the hemlock boughs. To her great joy her mother still slept.

The next night Ininee followed her lover again. She did so many nights in succession, and saw him always disappear at the foot of the mountain. She was at length able to detect the precise spot, and, grown more bold at each attempt, she was once close to his feet, and saw him enter the hill-side just behind a dwarf pine. She waited a moment, and then saw a light gleam from within. Gathering courage, she stooped down to see if she could discern anything of her lover, supposing he had his lodge here in the side of the mountain.

Judge of her horror, when she found she was in love with a Jeebi, (or ghost of the Indian.) Yet she could not turn away her eyes from the sights within the great cave, which spread away in the distance, arch beyond arch, until the eye ached at stretching itself through the interminable vistas, diverging from every side, and all glowing with a noon-day radiance. There were crystal columns from floor to roof, gleaming with the colours of amethyst, emerald, and ruby. Ferns of gigantic size, and trees such as she had never before seen, waved in the air, and the sound of water falling from cascades over glittering stones, rolled away in never-ceasing melody. Animals of great size and foreign shapes moved about—cups of diamond sat upon tables of jasper, and fruits were reflected in translucent pools.

In the midst of these strange and gorgeous objects, moved the lover of Ininee, more beautiful than she had ever beheld him. Suddenly a troop of Jeebiug (plural of Jeebi) approached, and thrust at him with their spears. He did not speak, but smiled in scorn, for he had grown to be a Manito, and was beyond their power. Then came others, and shot at him with arrows. Ininee almost fainted with terror; but when others came with burning torches, and piled the flames about him, though he smiled as before, poor Ininee shrieked in horror and dismay.

Her Jeebi lover sprang forth and caught her in his arms. As he fled to the north, Ininee saw that they were followed by billows of flame—the Jeebiug running and shouting in their midst. They fled and fled for a long time, still followed by the flames, which came nearer and nearer. At length Mannabozho (a water spirit) lifted up his head, and grew enraged to see what the fire gods were doing; and he spouted up the waters which overflowed the whole country, driving the flaming Jeebiug quite to the centre of the earth.

But poor Ininee, who was no Manito, like her lover, became scorched and shrivelled by the heat which the Jeebi perceiving he laid her down at the top of these falls, just as Mannabozho had stopped the progress of the flames. He folding her in his arms, and called her by name. Ininee smiled faintly, and yet turned her eyes in terror in the direction of the Jeebiug. The Jeebi saw it was too late, and he breathed into her lips, still calling her "Ininee, Ininee," in the vain hope that she would revive; but finding she did not he used the power which he had acquired as a Manito, and changed her into a flower, first seen by the side of these falls.

Ages after, when man began to dig into the side of the mountain, they found that the flames quenched by the waters of Mannabozho had hardened into a substance which can still be made into fire; and the flower into which poor Ininee had been converted spread itself over the whole region where this substance exists, as if the poor Indian girl still wandered among the mountains in search of her Jeebi lover.

The above legend, or Indian metamorphosis, is a singular tradition as to the origin of coal, which, it seems, was not entirely unknown to the Aborigines, and the flower to which it refers is a well-known indicator of coal.—The Home Journal.

AN UNFINISHED SENTENCE—Louis Phillipe is one of the richest Kings in Europe; but the scions of the royal stem, that he calls his sons, like the sons of many other rich papas, do not flourish as luxuriant establishments, as they desire; or as their rank and splendid expectations would seem to warrant. Their slender fortunes compel them to economise, and instead of the splendid fetes which are supposed to become the dignity of a Prince, they content themselves with less costly entertainments until their full grown fortunes shall enable them to support their rank and station in a more sumptuous manner. This is peculiarly the case with the Duke de Montpensier, whose marriage with the Infanta of Spain, however fortunate in other respects, did not turn out so profitable a speculation in a pecuniary point of view as was expected. A funny story respecting the negotiation connected with that important event is told at the French Court, which is mentioned by the amusing correspondent of Le Franco American, and of the pith of which we take the trouble to give a very free translation. The story proves that the root of evil —the love of money, has its radicles as widely spread and as firmly fixed in royal affections as in the most inveterate money broker in the land.

When the question of marriage between the Duke and the Infanta was proposed, the agents appointed by Queen Christina to negotiate this delicate matter, declared that the young Princess would bring her husband a dowry of thirty-four millions.—The French deputies, eager to defy the great power of England, and seduced by the magnificence of the sum, struck the bargain without waiting to hear the sentence finished. They calculated that this sum invested in safe securities, at five per cent, would yield an interest of one million, seven hundred thousand livres, and that with such a revenue, the Duke could properly maintain his princely rank, and have a considerable overplus at the end of the year. The magnificent rotundity of the sum decided the matter, and the French government cocked its hat and dared the resentment of England. The ceremony of the marriage was accordingly performed, and the French deputies asked for the money. Then it was that Queen Christina completed the sentence unfinished by her agents. She told them to send to her treasurer, and the money should be immediately paid.

"Thirty-four millions," said the Duke's agents.

"Yes," added the Queen, "we desire not to reduce the amount a single figure; we will pay the stipulated sum of thirty-four millions of—reals."

Here was a thunder-stroke to the French negotiators, the real being worth but twenty-five centimes of French money. This terrible termination of the unfinished sentence reduced in a deplorable manner the fortune promised to the hopes of the young Prince.

"There was not a word said about reals," resumed the Frenchmen as soon as they could find breath.

"Did any one speak of francs?" quietly asked the Queen.

"In France, when we speak of thirty-four millions, the word francs is always understood."

"In Spain we understand reals We have spoken in our language, you have understood in yours. The mistake is on your side."

"This is a shift on your part to avoid the payment of the full amount."

"No, it is a misunderstanding on yours; that is all the money we have. The most accomplised princess in the world can give no more than she has got."

The explanation that ensued showed that the Frenchmen were too hasty in their conclusion, but the marriage was completed and it was necessary to submit to the lamentable reduction.—Public Ledger.

TO REMOVE DUST OR MOTES FROM THE EYE. Many persons are often so exposed in their labors as to get dust or motes in their eyes, and frequently suffer considerably before they can find any means of relief. The following simple remedy is almost always near at hand, and in most cases will prove effectual: Fill a cup or goblet with clear cold water, quite to the brim and place the eye in distress in such a position as to be completely within the water in the cup; then rapidly open and shut the eye a few times, and the dust or mote will be immediately washed away. If a cup or other vessel be not at hand, the eye may be placed in a spring or bucket of water.—Spirit of the Times.

RECIPE FOR MAKING BISCUIT. One quart of milk, four even teaspoonfuls of cream, of tartar, two even teaspoonfuls of carbonate of soda—the soda to be disolved in the milk, and the cream of tartar to be thoroughly mixed dry with the flour, and a little salt. Mix it as soft as it can be baked. In this way you have biscuit mixed and ready for the table in half an hour.—Ibid.

TO CLEANSE THE TEETH AND IMPROVE THE BREATH. To four ounces of fresh prepared water, add one drachm of Peruvian bark, and wash the teeth with this water in the morning and evening, before breakfast and after supper. It will effectually distroy the tartar on the teeth, and remove the offensive smell arising from those that are decayed—Ibid.

EXCUSABLE—Whilst a regiment of volunteers were marching through Camargo, a captain, (a strict disciplinarian,) observing that one of the drums did not beat, ordered a lieutenant to inquire the reason. The fellow, on being interrogated, whispered to the lieutenant, "I have two ducks and a turkey in my drum; and the turkey is for the captain. This being whispered to the captain, he exclaimed "Why did'nt the drummer say he was lame? I do not want men to do their duty when they are not able."—Democratic Press.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XVI MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) DECEMBER 3 1847. NO. 2

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, semi-monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two DOLLARS a year payable in advance.—If not paid within six months TWO DOLLARS AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year THREE DOLLAR,

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearges are paid.

Advertisements, for the first insertion One DOLLAR a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same matter, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Sinoe,	Mr R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN B. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia,	Rev. W. MYLNE,
Norfolk "	W. DE LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	WM. CRANE, "
Philadelphia,	Rev. J. M. ALLEN,
New York,	Rev. S. H. CONE,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia,	Mr. WM. W. COPPINGER

LIBERIA HERALD.

Cases of Circumstantial Evidence.

BRUNELL'S CASE.

In the year 1742 a case of a very remarkable nature occurred near Hull. A gentleman travelling to that place was stopped late in the evening, about seven miles from the town by a single highwayman with a mask on his face, who robbed the traveler of a purse containing twenty guineas. The highwayman rode off by a different path full of speed, and the gentleman, frightened, but not injured, except in purse, pursued his journey. It was growing late, however, and being naturally much agitated by what had paseed, he rode only two miles further, and stopped at the Bell Inn, kept by Mr. James Brunell. He went into the kitchen to give directions for his supper, where he related to several persons present the fact of his having been robbed; to which he added this peculiar circumstanse, that when he traveled he always gave his gold a peculiar mark, and that every guinea in the purse taken from him was thus marked. Hence he hoped that the robber would yet be detected. Supper being ready he retired,

The gentleman had not long finished his supper; when Mr. Brunell came into the parlor where he was, and after the usual inquiries of landlords as to the guest's satisfaction with his meal, observed, "Sir I understand you have been robbed not far hence this evening!" "I have, sir," was the reply—"And your money was marked?" continued the landlord. "It was," said the traveller.—"A circumstance has arisen," resumed Mr. Brunell, "which leads me to think that I can point out the robber. Pray at what time in the evening were you stopped?" "It was just setting in to be dark," replied the traveller. "The time confirms my suspicions," said the landlord; and he then informed the gentleman that he had a waiter, one John Jennings, who had of late been so very full of money, and so very extravagant; that he (the landlord) had been surprised at it, and had determined to part with him, his conduct being every way suspicious: that long before dark that day he had sent out Jennings to change a guinea for him: that the man had only come back since the arrival af the traveller; saying he could get no change; and that seeing Jennings to be in liquor, he had sent him off to bed, determining to discharge him in the morning. Mr Brunell continued to say, that when the guinea was brought back to him, it struck him that it was not the same which he had sent out for change, there being on the returned one a mark, which he was very sure was not upon the other; but that he should probably have thought no more of the matter, Jennings having frequently had gold in his pocket of late, had not the people in the kitchen told him what the traveller had related respecting the robbery, and the circumstances of the guineas being marked. He (Mr. Brunell) had not been present when this relation was made, and unluckily, before he heard of it from the people in the kitchen, he had paid away the guinea to a man who lived at some distance, and who had gone home.—"The circumstance however," said the landlord in conclusion, "struck me so very strongly, that I could not refrain, as an honest man, from coming and giving you information of it."

Mr. Brunell was duly thanked for his candid disclosure. There appeared from it the strongest reason for suspecting Jennings; and if, on searching him, any other of the marked guineas should be found, and the gentleman could identify them, there then would remain no doubt in the matter. It was now agreed to go up to his room. Jennings was fast asleep: his pockets were searched, and from one of them was drawn forth a purse, containing exactly nineteen guineas. Suspicion now became certainty; for the gentleman declared the purse and guineas to be identically those of which he had been robbed. Assistance was called: Jennings was awakened, dragged out of bed and charged with the robbery. He denied it firmly; but circumstances were too strong to gain him belief. He was secured that night and next day taken before a justice of the peace. The gentleman and Mr. Brunell deposed to the facts upon oath; and Jennings having no proofs, nothing but mere assertions of innocence, which could not be credited was committed to take his trial at the next assized.

So strong seemed the case against him, that most of the man's friends advised him to plead guilty, and throw himself on the mercy of the court. This advice he rejected, and when arraigned, plead not guilty. The prosecutor swore to the fact of the robbery; though as it took place in the dusk, and the highwayman was in a mask, he could not swear to the person of the prisoner, but thought him of the same stature nearly as the man who robbed him. To the purse and guineas, which they produced in court, he swore as to the purse positively, and as to the marked guineas, to the best of his belief; and he testified to their having been taken from the pocket of the prisoner.

The prisoner's master, Mr Brunell, deposed as to the sending of Jennings for the change of a guinea, and to the waiter's having brought back to him a marked one, in the room of one he had given unmarked.—He also gave evidence as to the discovery of the purse and the guineas on the prisoner. To consummate the proof, the man to whom Mr. Brunell had paid the guinea, as mentioned, came forward and produced the coin, testifying at the same time that he had received it on the evening of the robbery from the prisoner's master in payment of debt; and the traveller, or prosecutor, on comparing it with the other nineteen, swore to its being, to the best of his belief, one of the twenty marked guineas taken from him by the highwayman, and of which the other nineteen were found on Jennings.

The judge summed up the evidence, pointing out all the concurring circumstances against the prisoner; and the jury, convinced by this strong accumulation of circumstancial evidence, without going out of court, brought in a verdict of guilty. Jennings was executed some little time afterwards at Hull, repeatedly declaring his innocence up till the very moment of his execution.

Within a twelvemonth afterwards, Brunell the master of Jennings, was himself taken up for a robbery committed on a guest in his house, and the fact being proved on trial, he was convicted and ordered for execution. The approach of death brought on repentance, and repentance confession. Brunell not only acknowledged he had been guilty of many high way robberies, but owned himself to have committed the very one for which poor Jennings suffered.

The account which Brunell gave was, that after robbing the traveller, he had got home before him by swifter riding and by a nearer way. That he found a man at home waiting for him, to whom he owed a little bill, and to whom, not having enough of other money in his pocket, he gave away one of the twenty guineas which he had just obtained by the robbery. Presently came in the robbed gentleman, who, whilst Brunell, not knowing of his arrival, was in the stable, told his tale, as before related, in the kitchen. The gentleman had scarcely left the kitchen befere Brunell entered it, and there to his consternation, heard of the facts, and of the guneas being marked. He became dredfully alarmed. The guinea which he had paid away he dared not ask back again; and as the affair of the robbery, as well as the circumstances of the marked guineas, would soon become publickly known, he saw nothing before him but detection, disgrace, and death. In this dilemma, the thought of accusing and sacrificing poor Jennings occurred to him. The state of intoxication in which Jenning was, gave him an opportunity of concealing the money in the waiter's pocket. The rest of the story the reader knows.

ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.

One of our french papers published in New York, the Courier des Etats Unis, relates a story of the marriage of Listz, the painist, which, if true, is certainly very remarkable and uncommonly romantic. It is as follows:

Listz was at Prague last fall. The day after his arrival, a stranger called upon him and represent himself as a brother artist in distress, having expended all his means in an unsuccessfull law suit, and solicited aid to enable him to return to Nuremberg, his place of residence. Listz gave him a hearty reception, and opened his desk to get some money; but found he possesed only three ducats.

"You see," said the generous artist, "that I am as poor as yourself. However, I have credit, and I can coin more money with my piano. I have here a miniature given me by the Emperor of Austria; tho painting is of little value, but the diamonds are fine; take it, sell the diamonds, and keep the money."

The stranger refused the rich gift, but Listz compelled him to take it, and he carried it to a jeweller, who, suspecting from his miserable appearance, that he had stolen it, had him arrested, and thrown into prison. The stranger sent for his generous benefactor, who immediately called upon the jeweller and told him that the man was innocent, that he had given him the diamonds.

"But who are you?" said the jeweller.

"My name is Listz."

"I know of no financier of that name."

"Very possible."

"But do you know that these diamonds are worth six thousand florins?"

"So much the better for him to whom I gave them."

"But you must be very rich to make such presents?"

"My sole fortune consist of three ducats!"

"Then you are a fool."

"No. I have only to move the ends of my fingers to get as much money as I want."

"Then you are a sorcerer!"

"I will show you the kind of sorcery that I employ."

Seeing a piano in the back parlor of the jeweller's shop, the excentric artist sat down to it and began to improvise a ravishing air. A beautiful young lady made her appearance, and at the close of the performance exclaimed.

"Brave! Listz!"

"You know him, then?" said the jeweller to his daughter.

"I have never seen him before," she said, "but there is no one in the world but Listz who can draw such sounds from the piano."

The jeweller was satisfied, the stranger was released and relieved, the report of Listz being in the city flew, and he was waited upon and feted the nobles, who besought him to give a concert in their city. The jeweller seeing the homage that was paid to the man of genius, was ambitious of forming an alliance with him, and said to him:

"How do you find my daughter?"

"Adorable."

"What do you think of marriage?"

"Well enough to try it."

"What do you say to a dowry of three millions of frances?"

"I will accept it, and thank you too."

"Well, my daughter likes you, and you like her—the dowry is ready. Will you be my son-in-law?"

"Gladly,"

And the marriage was celebrated the week following.—Democratic Union

A HINT TO PREACHERS.

We are told that when Kean first came out on the London stage, the veteran Kemble, who had retired from it, went to see him, and being asked afterward by his friend Boaden, how he liked him. "Why," said he, "his manner is so totally different from mine, that you can hardly expect me to like him altogether; but I must say one thing for him—he is always terribly in earnest. This was the remark of a player; but it may serve to suggest a good hint to preachers. There is manifestly no point of public speaking so important and effective as earnestness, and it happens, somehow or other, most unfortunately, that it is the very one in which the generality of our performances in the pulpit appear to be most deficient. Another player said of them. "They speak of the most awful realities as if they were indifferent fictions."—They do not appear, at least, to be in earnest; when we are bound to believe that they are most entirely so. The fault lies no doubt, in the delivery, rather than in their hearts, but it should be corrected, if possible, without delay. They ought, in fact not only to be, but to appear also to be always thoroughly, and sometimes even "terribly in earnest."—Southern Baptist.

BEAUTY.

There are many things set before us as we pass through this state of existance of more or less intrinsic value, and pursued by us with more or less of earnestness and energy, according to circumstances and character. Some of these, when obtained, are considerably better than others, and others again, disappoint us wholly, either because they are truly nothing worth, or because sought and found singly, without attention to the moral chemistry necessary for the perfection and preservation of their value, they turn to dust and ashes, just when we ought to find them a healing balsam for all the sorrows of life. Of all such disasters, sought and found, there is, perhaps, none more utterly valueless, when its first charm has passed over and faded from the imagination, than mere personal beauty; where there is no intellect, no heart, no sweetness of temper, no cheering gaiety of spirit, no generous mind, nor precious moral worth, to enclose and preserve it from wearying the sense, and palling the affection. The bleakness of disappointment which follows the extinction of its power is little less than tremendous! This is experienced often, sadly, often; when aburst of genuine passion has been felt, strong enough to create by its exaggeration of love, all that is wanting to make the beauteous idol perfect; but still more surely does distaste follow the evanescent pleasure of gazing on what is only beautiful, when admiration has been simply admiration, with little or no mixture of passion at all. —Ibid.

GIVE NO PAIN.

Breathe not a sentiment—say not a word—give not an expression of the countenance that will offend another, or send a thrill of pain to their bosom. We are surrounded by sensitive hearts, which a word, a look even, might fill to the brim with sorrow. If you are careless of the opinion and expressions of others, remember that they are differently constituted from yourself, and never, by a word or sign, cast a shadow on a happy heart, or throw aside the smiles of joy that love to linger on a pleasant countenance. —Ibid

MARRIAGE TIES.

No deliberation or circumspection can be too great in a transaction of such importance as the choice of a partner for life. An error here leads to the most awful consequences. It is fatal and irretrievable. The Christian is concerned, in a particular manner, to proceed with peculiar caution in forming this delicate and important connection. No personal attractions, no brilliancy of talents, no elegance of manners, no polish of education should induce him to form such a connection till he has unquestionable evidence that these pleasing qualities are connected with real and genuine piety. This is the gem which sparkles with undiminished lustre in the darkest seasons of adversity, and in the broad sunshine of prosperity, which illumines the cottage and adorns the palace, which outshines the brightest diamonds upon the earth, and which will emit eternal splendor from the crown of glory in heaven. The possession of the "pearl of great price" is essentially requisite to the enjoyment of conjugal felicity; but an abundance "of this world's goods" is far from being requisite.

Such abundance generally increases the cares and anxieties of life, but seldom if ever adds to its real comfort. All who enter into the marriage state from mercenary motives, though they may enlarge their possessions, and increase their fortunes, live in splendid misery, and find that they bartered happiness for wealth. The connection which is truly desirable, is pure and disinterested; it unites hearts and hands in the bonds of mutual love. Human life has few enjoyments so exquisite as that of loving and being beloved. No pleasures are comparable to pleasures which affect the heart. Such, in a peculiar manner, are the plasures which are found in the sweeter retirement of domestic life. They are simple, they are innocent, they are virtuous —Stowell.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

THE grandest of all the tombs in the Chapel or the whole Abbey, is that of Henry the Seventh by whom the Chapel was erected, and Elizabeth his queen, the last of the House of York who wore the English crown. The tomb is in the body of the Chapel, enclosed in a brass chantry ornamented with statutes, of which only those of St. George, James, Bartholomew and Edward, (the confessor) now remain. Effigies of the king and queen in their royal robes, lie on the tomb of black marble; the heads supported by a dragon, the ensign of Cadwallader the last king of the Britons, from whom Henry was proud to trace his descent. Several devices are represented on the tomb, one in particular, of a pair of scales in which good and evil are struggling for mastery. The scales are held by a saint; Good has the "down weight," while a nice looking devil is reaching toward the scale in which sits Evil, as by his personal force to remove the balance, but it is no go! Another figure is that of "St. Barbara to which this romantic story is appended. St. Barbara was the daughter of a pagan and dwelt with her father in a certain tower. To this tower adjoined a garden in which the father determined to build a bath, with the necessary accommodation of rooms, and therein to make windows for the number of two only. Being to undertake a journey, he left his instructions with the artificers, which his daughter presumed to vary by directing them, instead of two, to make three. Upon her father's return, he inquired into the reason of this deviation from his orders; and being told, that in allusion to three persons of the Holy Trinity, his daughter had directed it, he found that she was become a convert to christianity; and being exasperated thereat, stimulated the emperor to a persecution of the christians, in which she became a martyr to the faith." There is still another figure designed for Mary Magdalen holding the "box of ointment." In this Chapel are the remains of a monument to Edward the Sixth, which the Puritans multilated because it bore an image they deemed too pagan. Indeed the hand of Cromwell is every where visible, and the broken toes, fingers and noses of the "select company" sleeping in the Abbey, give token at every turn that he cared little for the sculptors art. Whatever of the cherub-wings or other "graven images" the round-heads could beat down and despoil, they did; even to rare and beautiful paintings whose loss was irreparable, they carried their zeal and fury, as intolerant in its excess as that of the classes against whom they rallied. There might come a "restoration" of government, but never of those exquisite creations of genius which are born at no royal summons and obedient to no imperial edict! Irrecoverable relics! we are gone from the proud Pantheon, and all human might may evoke you in vain.

The north aisle, into which we next pass, is most noted for the magnificent tomb of Queen Elizabeth. The epitaph is vaunting in her own praise; its burthen relates the glory of her rule, in "delivering France from intestine troubles; supporting the Netherlands; defeating the Spanish Armada; recovering Ireland; improving the revenues of the Universities, and in every way enriching England." Here too, is the tomb of Edward the Fifth and his brother, who were murdered by their uncle, Richard the Third. Their bones lay 190 years among rubbish under the White Chapel stairs in the Tower, where they were found and re-buried in their present tomb.

We pass from these memorials of blood and crime to the Chapel of St. Paul. Here rests a hero who fell at Badajos under Wellington, and there is a monument to an old knight which bears this sensible epitaph.

"The public cares and laws engaged my breast;
To live was toilsome, but to die is rest.
Wealth, maces, guards, crowns to others, things of state,
The prey of time and fable deaths are made."

Here also is a grand statute by Chantry, to James Watt, the improver of the steam engine. He is seated on a marble pedestal and his figure is colossal. It reminded me of the Washington at Greenough; and the head strongly resembles Dr Watt Clinton's, one of the few who may justly be compared with Watt. There is not a monument in the Abbey more simply imposing; and every one pauses before it to do homage to the great genius it represent. The next Chapel is St. Edwards, the last of the Saxon race of Kings. Pope Alexander Third canonized him, and enjoined in a bull, "that his body be honoured here on Earth as a soul is glorified in heaven."

Rather a doubtful construction might be put upon the epitaph. In this chapel are the coronation chairs. The oldest was brought with regalia from Scotland by Edward the first, in 1297, after he had beat Baliol King of the Scots, and offered at St. Edward's shrine. There is a stone under the seat, said to be the veritable "Jacob's pillow;" it would be a capital relict for Barnum. The other was made for Queen Mary the 2d, and both are well enough guarded by a circle of dead Kings. The chairs resemble our old Knicker-bockers, and I have had the almighty honor of sitting in them both. The tomb of St. Edward was opened in 1774 after the lapse of 700 years, by Dean of Westminister and the body found perfect, having on two robes of gold and silver tissue, and crimson velvet; a sceptre four feet long in each hand and a many jewelled crown on his head, whether the exulting antiquarians felt the jewels in the tomb, is not stated; but in his age, when Irreligion is fermenting, and humanity generally none too well off, I should think them doing a far better service "in the range."—N. Y. Evang.

CIVILISATION.—Nothing affords a theme of so much boasting, as the progress of society towards the climax of civilisation—and yet, what proofs, aside from the improvements of science and intellect, arts and freedom, can be adduced in support of the theory! If civilisation was a mere progression towards this intellectual point, we grant that there exists ample cause for gratulation in this matter. But that is not the test of civilisation. Moral progression, not intellectual advancement, is the great test of civilisation. There can be no other. We live to no purpose, if we do not advance society in the true social happiness, as the means of bettering the condition of mankind. One of the most essential elements of civilisation, is that prefect subordination, order and harmony, that induces to public peace and tranquility—and this can scarcely be enjoyed without the general prevalence of temperance habits. Riot and disorder, anarchy and bloodshed, are not the features of social life, that indicate a perfect state of civilisation; and all these are the inseperable consequences of the habitual use of intoxicating liquors, and the legal sanction of their abuse. If we refer to the statute book, for an evidence of the civilisation of the age, this one law, in relation to the use of poison would, overthrow all our pretensions to this glorious distinction. No age could put forward such pretensions, that created a law for the commission of all the crimes, that disfigure humanity, by means of temporary madness and lasting misery. Christianity must remain ever imperfect, until it exterminates this blotch from the face of society. Man ceases to be in the image of God, while he sinks prone as the brute, under the full sway of the king of madness. Who will venture to claim for any people the meed of civilisation, when that people are lost to the control of reason—and insensible to the laws of nature! Whilst hourly reports ring in our ears of the want of order in society—while the young break down all the barriers of sobriety, and the mass of men rival each other in deeds that strike a shudder through humanity, it would appear absurd for any one to claim for the present generation the fame of civilisation! The characteristic of all barbarous ages is the habit of intoxication, for the use of deleterious beverages; and in proportion as we banish these vices, do all the virtues of civilisation advance. The fate of Colton, the author of Lacon, is but an illustration of the doom of society, when addicted to the use of this poisonous beverage. Colton, the great moralist of the age, first became a drunkard—from that he grew to be a gamster—and finally became a suicide. And society can also become a suicide. It is a suicide now. It drinks in the poison that kills the soul, and fills the world with howling fiends.

The first element of civilisation is Temperance.—The Sun

A MODERN TELL.

Many who read romances about the days of the Crusades, and whose hearts beat over the romance of history—the narratives of heroes like William Tell, who waged a holy war against the invaders of their country—are unaware that as great a hero lives in our day, and is conducting as holy and undoing a struggle. How few care to read of Abd el Kader! yet who will venture to say that William Tell was nobler! The Emir Abd-el-Kader is the indomitable foe of the French, who have conquered Algiers, and colonised, or attempted to colonise, the neighborhood. He is a native, and hates the intruders. He is a prince, and hates the conquerors his country. He cannot drive them out; but he has done everything short of it. He leaves them no peace or rest. They in fact own no land but what they stand on. Every head that is put out beyond the cordon is cut off. Every straggler from the camps disappears. They dare not cannot till the fields, nor go on commercial errands; for Abd el-Kader comes down upon them whichever way they go. A company cannot pass from camp to camp without its numbers being thinned. If there is a burning sun, Abd-el-Kader pounces upon the troops in their hour of lassitude. If a heavy mist come up from the mountains, Abd-el-Kader comes with it, as if he rode upon the blast. If snow block up the way, Abd-el-Kader issues from the thickest drift. If there is a drought, he drives the foe far from the water brooks encamping them, flank and rear. He is always on the eve of being caught; but no man has ever caught him yet, nor touched his white banner. His tribes are dispersed, his stores taken, his supplies cut off, his horses shot under him, his allies bound over to deliver him up: but he has always yet escaped. He is reported dead; but is presently seen and felt again. He is worn out and brought to disgrace French field marshals; and cause, destitute as he himself is of expenditure of men and money such as no nation can long endure for the sake of so wretched a colony. He has now sent a summons to the tribes of the south to be ready to renew the war against the invaders; and all but those who are within immediate reach of the French, answer with favor to the call. One cannot but look forward wistfully to see the issue—to divine the lot and the death of such a man;—to watch whether his power of hope can sustain itself against such odds; whether he dies on the field, or in a cave of the rocks—as a warrior, or a prisoner, or as one of Nature's princes in one of Nature's palaces. The only thing we know is that the man himself—his soul—will never be conquered. Being well assured of this, it would be unbearable that his country and native tribes should be brought under European sway, if there were a fair probability that it would be ultimately for their real good. But it is for their invaders to show that it would be so; and till they do, our sympathies must inevitably be with the indomitable Abd-el Kader, before whose majesty—the native majesty of the soul—every Mahommedan bows his head and every invader quails

A NOBLE STORY.—"I will shew you a man worn-spent; the body outline of a human thing, with toil and what cut, as with an iron tool, upon him; a man to whom the common pleasures of life are our mortal heritage are unknown as the joys of paradise This man toils and starves, strives and toils, even as the markets vary. Well, he keeps a heart, sound as oak, in his bosom. In the sanctity of his soul he bestows the kiss of peace upon a grudging world—he compels the homage of respect, and champions himself against the hardness of fortune. In his wretched homestead he is throned in the majesty of the affections. His suffering patient, loving wife his pale faced, ill-clad children, are his queen and subjects. He is a king in his heart, subduing and ruling the iron hours; unseen spirits of love and goodness anoint him; and, 'sir,' said the hermit in a solemn voice, 'as sure as the kingdom of God is more than a fairy tale, so surely do God's angels sing that poor man's jubilate.'"

NEW MODE OF EXTINGUISHING FIRES They have recently made in Germany a discovery which has made a great sensation. It is extinguishing fires by means of cut straw. At first sight this seems so extraordinary that we would be justified in doubting it, were it not that experiments made before a great number of persons, and which any one can repeat themselves, remove all objections. The following are some of the experiments: They threw several handfuls of cut straw upon a bright fire in a fire-place and it was immediately extinguished. Several boxes of straw itself were set fire and then covered with cut straw, the fire was again put out and without burning the cut straw. A bar of redshot iron was plunged into a heap of cut straw; this did not take fire, while the iron grew rapidly cold, from which it seems to follow that cut straw is an excellent conductor of caloric

FORGIVE.—Speak forgiveness to the offender Will you hold back, when he sees and acknowledges his error? Brute your are, if you can be unmoved. Hear his language and let your heart melt: "I bitterly regret the course I have pursued. In the dust have I repented. Receive me and forgive the past. Forgive me:

"——in pity speak, and cease
This breaking heart."

Can you be indifferent to an appeal like this? Extend the hand—bury the past, and you will stand high in the estimation of God, angels and men. It is glorious to conquer a world, but more glorious to overcome hate and prejudice, and to forgive cheerfully and heartily, the wrong that has been heaped upon us. Let this victory be yours.—Portland Bulletin.

ANGLING.—Plutarch tells a very amusing story of Mark Antony, who was a keen angler. One day while Cleopatra and he were indulging in this sport, he was unusually unsuccessful. Hurt at this disappointment in the presence of his mistress, he gave secret orders to some of his fishermen, to dive under water, and to fasten, unseen, to his hook, some of the finest, and largest fishes, still alive, and which they had taken in their nets. With due execution they obeyed his orders. Every time he drew up his line, he succeeded. The cunning Cleopatra in rapturous language, extolled his art, his address, and his fortune. Acquainted however with the artifice he was using, she had recourse to the ingenious countermine of desiring one of her own attendents to dive secretly, and attach to his hook a large dried Pontic fish. At last, when pulling up the line, at the sight of the heavy salted fish, spectators expressed their surprise by a loud laugh. Antony did not relish the joke, and seemed highly displeased. The queen observing him in his mood, immediately took him in her arms, and fondly exclaimed: "Leave dear general, angling to us petty princes of Pharos and Canopus! your game is cities kingdoms, and provinces.

MAKE PROGRESS

Let us strive every day for some superiority to the preceding day, something that shall visibly mark the passing years with progress; something that shall assure an humble hope that we are rather less unfit for heaven to-day that we were yesterday. The celebrated Zeuxis who was recorded that he passed no day without drawing a line, drew it not for repetition but for progress not to produce a given number, but to forward his work, to complete his design. The Christian, like the painter, does not draw his lines at random, he has a model to imitate, as well as an outline to fill.—Every touch conforms him more and more to the great original. He who has transfused most of the love of God into his soul, has copied it the most successfully.—H. Moss.

UNEXPECTED AND LAMENTED DEATH.

Died on the evening of the 27th, ult, at his residence in Monrovia, Hon. J B. GRIPON almost instantly. He had been rather feeble for several weeks, but had continued to perform his duties as principal of the Liberia Conference Seminary without interruption up to the day in his death.

He was visiting at the neighbor's until late in the day, on which he died; nothing unusual apparent until a few moments before he fell from his chair a corpse, when he seemed unusually restless, and anxious to be left alone; and at his request his wife retired into an adjoining room and almost immediately heard him fall.

He had recently been elected Senator, under the new Constitution which he assisted in framing—was associate judge of Montserado County. He has been an exemplary member and steward in the M. E. Church for many years; and has been more or less intimately connected with the Liberia Mission since its first organisation; as teacher at New Georgia, teacher at White Plains Manual Labor School, and since June, has been connected with the Seminary as its principal; and with our paper as one of its joint publishers.

On the 28th, ult., his remains were conveyed to the M. E. Church, where upon us, and his intimate friend and neighbor, Rev. A. D. Williams, devolved the responsible duty of improving upon this very unexpected and lamented death. Other congregations in the place, with one consent, met on the occasion, and gave evidence of unusual solemnity, respect and sympathy. Twenty-four hours from the time he was familiarly conversing with intimate friends, he was buried out of our sight. Reader "as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between thee and death." Another of our teachers in the Seminary is gone. Where shall we find a successor! He has left a deeply afflicted wife and one child; who should receive the sympathy and prayers of all.

This very brief and imperfect notice, is written just on the eve of our departure to one of our Quarterly Meetings. We are expecting that some one of his many intimate friends will furnish us his obituary for publication, if not in the present, at least in the next number.—Luminary.

LIBERIA PACKET.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, DECEMBER 3 1847.

The Liberia Packet.

This splendid vessel, after a long, tedious passage of 51 days from Baltimore, anchored in our harbor on the 23d, ultimo, and although the passage was extraordinary long, the passengers speak of it, upon the whole, as being far from disagreeable, as Captain Goodmanson exerted himself to make them comfortable. They were obliged to call in at Sierra Leone, to add to their stock of water.

We greeted with indescribable pleasure the safe return of Mrs. Governor Roberts, and daughter, and Dr. S. F. Mc Gill.

The Packet after landing for this place a part of her freight and the 43 emigrants, sent out by the American Colonization Society, anchored on the 25th inst. at Cape Palmas, where she left Rev. Messrs. Bassa and Simpson, to land the rest of her cargo, and Maryland State Colonization Society, 40 [illegible] subsequently of freight, and with, on her return to this place, to take on the remainder of the emigrants to this port.

We are highly pleased with the general appearance of the emigrants.

The U. S. Sloop-of-war Jamestown, Captain Pinkney, bearing the broad pennant of Commodore [illegible] arrived in our port on the 25th, ultimo. Officers and crew all well.

On the 25th, the Commodore with a number of officers visited the shore, and the Governor's House. A salute from Central Hill announced the visit of the Commodore and his suite.

Com: Felton succeeds Com: Read in the command of the U. S. squadron on this coast.

Election Returns

We have received the returns of the election from the County of Sinoe, and the successful candidates are as follows.

Senators
JAMES BRYON,
EDWARD MORRIS.
Representative.
DANIEL C. Mc FARLAND.

His Excellency the Governor, with a party of gentlemen, visited the "Jamestown" on the 28th, ultimo, and was received with the honors becoming his rank.

A Mr. Tills, of the county of Sinou, a few days ago, while hunting in the neighborhood of Greenville, accidently shot a Sinou man. Mr. T. without the least expectation of there being other hunters near him, fired at a deer, and in doing so, wounded this African. We are informed, that tho' the wound is not dangerous, his friends speak boldly of "making a big palaver about it," so soon as the wounded man is well enough to walk to the settlement to have it talked. The Africans act upon the principle, that if a man injure another, no matter under what circumstances, he must make reparation. A circumstance similar to this, happened at Marshall a few years ago.—One of our citizens and a Bassa man frequently tried their strength at wrestling with each other—they were considered well matched; the last time they were thus engaged, the Bassa-man was thrown—he fell on his head, and his neck was broken. The chiefs of his country immediately sent messengers to the Governor, informing him of the circumstance, and demanding, that a large sum be paid to the family of the deceased. Every argument was used to convince them of the unreasonableness of the demand—but to no purpose—at last they were told that if they did not cease with their unjust and sore-tions demand, for they would be looked upon as our enemies, and treated as such—this threat settled the matter—they had nothing more to urge or say about it. —And we suppose these Simon people will have to be talked to in the same significant way before they will abandon the hope of extorting money for this act of accidental shooting.

Salutes.

At noon on the 24th, ultimo, the U. S. Ship Jamestown, honored the flag of the Republic with a salute of 21 guns. The compliment was promptly responded to by a salute from Fort Norris, gun for gun.

PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, it is provided by the Constitution of the Republic, "That when a vacancy occurs in the representation of any county by death, resignation, or otherwise, it shall be filled by a new election:"—Therefore, I Joseph J. Roberts, Governor of Liberia, do hereby proclaim, that the polls, will be opened in the different towns and villages in the County of Montserrado, on Tuesday the 21st, inst, for the election of a Senator, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of John B. Gripon, Esquire.

Given under my hand at Monrovia This third day of December, in the Year of our Lord, one thousand eight Hundred and Forty Seven, and of the Independence of the Republic the first.

J. J. ROBERTS.

By the Governor.

J. N. LEWIS,

Colonial Secretary

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

"WOODMAN SPARE THAT TREE."

Captain Nathaniel Portlock, who circumnavigated the globe in the ship King George, in company with the Snow Queene Charlotte, Captain George Dixon, during the years 1785, '86 '87 and '88, visited Port Etches, on the North west Coast of America, in the latitude of 50 min. 10 sec. N. and longitude 115 deg. West, where he remained some time, for the purpose of refitting his ships and refreshing their crews. Before leaving that port, on the 22d day of July, 1787, having previously planted a small garden, with the seeds of esculent plants of Europe, he caused to be lopped off all the branches of the highest tree," on Gaidon, a small island in the port on which "he fixed at the top, a staff about ten feet long, with a wooden vane on, and near the bottom of the tree, inscribed in large letters, the name of the ship, with the year and day of the month."

Fifty years after Captain Portlock had caused the tree to be engraved on the tree in that little island, on which he had fixed a "staff with a wooden vane," Captain now Sir Edward Belcher, in H. B. M. Ship Sulphur visited the same Port. (in the summer of 1837,) for the purpose of surveying the harbor and obtaining astronomical and magnetic observations.

Like Portlock, on the eve of departure, having completed his observations, Captain Belcher was desirous to leave some mark to perpetuate to future navigators the visit of her Majesty's ship in that port; and for this purpose, had directed a tree which was overgrown and which had been deprived of its bark by some cause not then conjectured, to be hewed to the ground. The woodman's axe was raised; its keen edge was descending fast to the fated tree, when, at that critical moment, the attention of Captain Belcher was attracted, and he had barely time to arrest the sacrilegious order," as his eye caught the traces of letters on its sides, which, at a moment more he traced to be:

Port Etches, Ship King George,
North Pacific, Colonial,
July 22d, 1787

Yes, there stood the identical tree, on that little island, on which Captain Portlock, fifty years before, had engraved his name with that of his ship. There it had defied the rude blasts of that tempestuous clime, and there, time, that destroyer of all things, had suffered it to live on and grow old, stripped as it had been of its bark, for half a century, by the ruthless hand of man. The staff, and wooden vane of Portlock were gone, and but for the piercing eye of Sir Edward, that tree hallowed tree, rendered sacred by inscription, which, on fifty years, it had borne on its trunk, would have been hewed to the ground by the axe of the woodman, uplifted by his own, as he had been pleased to call it, "sacrilegious order."

THE EXTENT OF CREATION.

THE ancients held the idea that there were four elements; that is, four distinct substances which could not be resolved into any others—fire, air, earth, and water. Modern science has sworn that this opinion is incorrect. Water and air are composed of two gasses; earth is formed of a great variety of substances; and fire is probably but an effect resulting from the compression of air. It is now supposed that there are 55 elements, of which 42 are metals, and 13 are other substances—These combined, in various ways, form all material things in our world, whether visible or invisible. When destitute of life they are termed inorganic; when possessing it, organic bodies. Organized bodies, or those which possess life, are divided into vegetable and animal. Of the former there are about 56,000 species, or different kinds, from the almost imperceptible mould, which covers decaying substances, to the giant Banian tree, sending forth its shoots till it covers a circumference of 2,000 feet, and shelters 7,000 men beneath its branches. Of animals there are said to be about 50,000 species, some inhabiting the air, some the sea, some the land. The gigantic elephant, and monstrous whale; the tiny mint, and the tribes of animalculæ, invisible to the naked eye, some so small that 30,000, it is said, can be contained in a single drop of water. But we cannot dwell upon this subject; however interesting. We leave it, exclaiming with the great bard—

"These are thy glorious works, Parent of good,
Almighty! thine this universal frame.
Thus wondrous fair: Thyself how wondrous then!
To us invisible or dimly seen,
In these thy lowest works, yet these declare
Thy goodness beyond thought, and power divine."

PAR. LOST, B. V.

While, however, we suppose, our earth, and perhaps the system to which it belongs, alone referred to in the six days' creation, it may not be improper to consider the extent of the universe, at least so far as it is known to us. While it seems to us absurd to suppose all space filled with material substance since, in such a case (as might easily be demonstrated,) there could be no such thing as motion, yet so vast is the known extent of creation, as to overwhelm the mind in the effort to conceive of it. Our earth forms one of the eleven planetary bodies, which, with their 48 secondaries, revolve around the sun. That vast body is one million times larger than our earth, and occupies a space more than 500,000,000 miles in circumference; yet probably it, with all the bodies which move around it would appear but a faint speck of light if seen from some of the fixed stars. Our earth is supposed to be placed in a vast nebula, or cloudy substance called the milky way. This luminous belt, which appears to us like a fleecy cloud in the blue vault of heaven, is said to contain about 40,000,000 of stars, probably each of them suns, with attendant planets.

——"A broad and ample road, whose dust is gold,
And pavement stars as to us appear."

Yet this is but one of 2,500 similar nebulæ which have already been observed, and it is almost certain that with improved instruments, more would be perceived. Supposing each of these nebulæ to be as large as the milky way, the number of stars would be 830,000,000,000 or nearly one billion.

Let us avert to the distance of these bodies. The earth is 95,000,000 miles distant from the sun; but this appears small compared with the distance of Herschel the most remote planet, which 1800,000,000, a distance so great, that a cannon ball flying at the rate of 480 miles in one hour, or 8 miles in every minute, would not reach it in 410 years; or that of the comets, one of which, (1580,) at the greatest distance, is 11,200 millions of miles from the sun But what are these distances compared with the space which separates us from the fixed stars, the nearest of which is at least twenty billions of miles from us, a distance through which light, (a substance travelling at the rate of 200,000 miles in a second) could not pass in 3 years; or a cannon ball, going at the rate of 500 miles an hour, would occupy 4 millions 500 thousand years. Now all the fixed stars are probably separated from each other by distances as great as this, though to us they appear so close together. How inconceivable is this to our feeble comprehensions. Let us advert to the velocities of these bodies the swiftness with which they move. Our earth revolves upon its axis once in 24 hours, so that each point on the equater moves about 1000 miles every hour. It revolves round the sun once in a year, passing, in that time over a distance of 587,000,000 of miles, moving therefore, at the rate of 6,800 miles every hour, or more than 1,000 miles every second. But the sun itself, with all the planets, and their moons, is supposed to be moving around some central body at the rate of 60 000 miles an hour. Some of the fixed stars revolve around each other, and probably all of them have some motions similar; no doubt, to those impressed on the bodies of our system.

Finally, let us take a brief notice of the extent of the known universe. The nearest fixed star; Sirus, is not less distant than 20 billions of miles; and the most remote, it has been estimated, are nearly 10, 000 billions. Suppose we take the circumference of the distance, and we have about 60,000 billions and this filled with innumerable bodies of immense sizes, and prodigious velocity. We find some suns of a blue colour, revolving around suns of a white or ruddy colour, illuminating, with contrasted light, their encircling worlds. It has been estimated that there are more than 2 billions such bodies: suppose one to pass before us every minute, it would require nearly 4,000,000 of years before we could see them all. Yet this is not universe—new discoveries are made with every improvement in the telescope. This is but a part of God's works, perhaps but the "hiding of his power." Our earth, it has been estimated, contains about 30 billions of sentient beings, including men, quadrupeds, birds, fishes insects; yet it is one of the smallest bodies in the assemalage. Supposing, however, that an equal number of animated beings exist in the other worlds, we would have the immense amount of more than 60 quartillions. Amid such a number of beings, what a variety of orders may exist, from the archangel seraph, to the worm or the microscopic animalcule. O! what thought is the vastness of the universe. What must be the powes of that God who has made it, preserves it, governs it! "O, Lord! thou art worthy to receive glory, and honour, and power, for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created."—Rev iv. 11.—Banner of the Covenant.

From the Kentuckey Intelligencer.

THE BROKEN PLEDGE

A Tale of Truth.

The friendships formed in our early youth, leave, usually, the most abiding influence upon our minds, and we feel a far deeper interest in the welfare, and more poignant sorrow at the ruin, of the friends of our childhood, than of those into whose society we are thrown in the succeeding portions of our earthly pilgrimage. Such were the feelings entertained by the writer, at the sad career of Henry G. Possessed of a high order of intellect, rare personal beauty, and an ardent and affectionate disposition; universally beloved and surrounded with all the advantages which wealth and fashion could bestow, he seemed more likely to spend life pleasantly than he. But it is well Divine Providence has cast a veil over the future, and hidden from mortal man his destiny. Were it otherwise, how many should we see whose golden dreams of gladness as summer's morn, to whose future career is reserved the thick and murky storm, the fierce tempest and the wasting tornado; who, as the sun sets ere it reaches its meridian and no ray of light pierces the thick veil of darkness which hides it from mortal vision! How many on the other hand, whose cradle have been rocked by the winds, and on whose infant head the howling tempest has wreaked its fury, and the morning of life calm and serene, and its last hours lit up by a resplendency so holy and pure that it seems like a reflection of the glories of the second Eden?

But to return to our narrative. Henry, as he approached the age of manhood, evinced a decided predilection for a nautical life, and his father, who had himself followed the sea in early life, offering no opposition to his wishes, he shipped on board of one of the first class London Packets, as a common seamen; and such was his activity, intelligence and amiable demeanor, that he was rapidly promoted, and at the age of twenty found himself first mate of a packet ship of 800 tons burthen. Soon after his promotion, Henry's father died and by his will, left him ten thousand dollars in money, besides a large amount of real estate. Possessed of so considerable a fortune, he resolved to abandon nautical life and live upon his income. Hitherto he had maintained, under all circumstances, a strictly moral deportment, and was regarded as a young man of unblemished character. But there was one weak point in his disposition. He could not refuse the solicitations of his companions, even when his better judgment decided that they were in the wrong. He yielded, although he protested against this course. This proved his ruin.

Having in this new position, much leisure, time began to hang heavy on his hands, and he soon formed the pernicious habit of taking a social glass with his companions, to while away the time. Gradually his potations became more frequent and copious, and in two years it was whispered that Henry G. was becoming very irregular in his habits.

(To be Continued.)

Brevity.—Philip of Macedon being on the Spartan frontier, wrote to the citizens to know if he should come as a friend or an enemy? The laconic answer was neither.

NEW GOODS!

The least that I can say is, that my stock is large in the total, being very near half the Bark Montgomery's tonnage. But small in the various varieties. It is therefore, useless to attempt to articulate the assortments of staple and fancy Dry goods, the new fashions of both Europe and America, Groceries, Hardware, provisions, drugs, medicines, and Liquors. And that minutia of things which pertain to ladies tastes. Let all imagine that they can get almost any thing at Roy's new store, on the fairest terms. Any and every thing will be sold for cash down, or the produce which will bear exportation. Store in Rev. B. K. Wilson's stone store house on Broad St.

EDWARD J. ROYE

Oct. 23d. 1847.
Monrovia.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Mercantile business, under the firm of Samuel F. McGill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MCGILL,
R. S. MCGILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	3	10
Bread, pound	"	15	20
Beef, cargo No. 1.	Bb	19 00	19 00
Blue Baffs,	Ps.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	30	35
Boards,	1000ft	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	50	50
Coffee,	"	none
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Ps	12	14
Cotton Unbleached,	Bale	3	12 13
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Ps	8
Camwood,	Ton	60 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	70 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	46	50
Mackerel	Bbl	9 00	10 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	9 00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1-3	35
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Powder	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Rum	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Pallets	Dozen	none
Porter,	"	none
Ox tongues gumbo	Box	none
Tobacco, various	Yard,	12 1-2
Rope manilla	Ps.	1 00	2 25
Salt	Ton	none
Sugar loaf	Lb.	18
Sugar brown	"	12
Soap,	Box	none
Suppers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Pa.	3 00
Tobacco	1000lbs.	none
Tea Hyson and Bowla	Dozen	2 00	10 00
Tea Gunpowder	"	4 00
Tea Imperial	"	8 00	16 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	20 00

MARINE LIST.

PORT OF MONROVIA.

ARRIVALS.

Nov. 23. Am. Barque Liberia Packet, Goodman son master, from Baltimore; passengers and immigrants refered to in the editorial.

" " U. States Frigate Jamestown. Mercer Esq. commander, from windward.

" 25. Hamburg brig Adolph, J. Seidel Supercargo, from Sierra Leone.

DEPARTURES.

Dec. 1. Am. barque Liberia Packet, Goodman son master, for Cape Palmas, via Grand Bassa passengers to G. Bassa, Mrs. Benson and Johnson. to Cape Palmas David Moore.

" U. States Frigate Jamestown, Mercer Esq. commander for the leeward.

POETRY.

For the Liberia Herald.

Lines written on seeing Cape Mount.

I see, I see, O beauteous far parent land,
Thy cheerful, but sea-girt mountian band;
Could I but invoke the muses, my pen to inspire:
Oh! that I could write a song, that would awake thee with martial fire.

But why should I vainly regret, 'its not my solace,
If slavely and oppression is not a disgrace:
When modesty refined; manstealers do equally honour:
Humanity designed, consanguinity defined, would it dishonour.

Africa! thou art yet destined to stand of nations
the first,
For thou art not the offspring of grasping ambitious thirst;
In arts, sciences, literature, commerce combined,
thou yet will rank,
By History, we learn that luxury and idleness
the sank.

Then, by what we have learned, let us an example take,
With the blessings of God, we must Afric make:
Have you not read of Old England, who by enemies was near down;
Oh! then, with the blessings of commerce and freedom around

Our children with light hearts and happiness will flourish,
While they the blessings of liberty and virtue
do cherish;
Then this hereditary right, to our children
transmit,
Never to be slaves, but bravely to die, rather than submit.

For the blessings of freedom, and the smiles of the fair are not denied
To the young hero, enshrouded in his country's flag, bravely to die;
And who'll not hail the happy and gladsome day,
That will give truth and justice to this humble lay!

H. L. WALL.

December, 3rd, 1847.

MISCELLANEOUS

COURT GOSSIP.

A certain Monsieur de V——was the most expert 'maitre de danse' in the Russian Capital. In dress and demeanor he was the most exquisite of beings. His coat was more 'recherche,' his linen whiter, his trousers 'nattier,' his cravat glossier, and his French leather boots more brilliantly bright than the coat, cravat, boots or breeches of any man in St. Petersburg.—In full-dress, he was a mortal miracle.—Now, it happens, that passengers on the streets of the Capital are not only obliged to remain in them, as is related in the anecdote published in the last number of THE HOME JOURNAL, but, if they are riding or driving, they must descend from their horses or vehicles, and remain standing, uncovered on the pavement, until the Imperial 'cortege' has passed.

One day Monsieur de V——was driving along in his carriage, in full costume, when the coach of the Sovereign nove in sight in the distance. The day was wet, drizzly, dirty, and the streets were covered with mud. This was, indeed, a disagreeable position for our dancing master; but there was no escape. The law was imperative and his coachman stopped. In due time the royal vehicle approached, and, (thinking that it would be a permitted compromise,) de V——descended to the lowest step of his coach, where he stood, hat in hand, and saving his soles from the contamination of the pavement. "Sed vana spes! As the Emperor's carriage came near him, it moved slower; and slower; and when it arrived directly opposite, it stopped entirely!

The Frenchmen's heart palpitated anxiously, and indeed fluttered not a little when he perceived the Emperor's head thrust out of the window, conversing with an aid-de-camp who had spurred up to the coach when it halted. Presently the eyes of the talkers were turned to the miserable dandy; and, at last, the aid-de-camp wheeled his horse directly towards him.

"I believe I have the pleasure to address Monsieur de V——?" said the officer very courteously—"and, if I am not deceived in my surmise as to your name—his Highness the Emperor desires the favor of a moment's conversatian with you!"

The request of a Sovereign is always an order; and good manners, as well as good law, permitted no resistance; so, with a shudder and a sigh, the polished pump of the luckless dancer sank into the oozing mud of St. Petersburg! Picking his way like a spider over a hot gridiron, de V—— soon stood at the window of the carriage, and bowed, in silence, to the autocrat.

"Aha! aha! Monsieur de V——," exclaimed Nicholas. "'Je suis charme de vous voir!" I am delighted to see you. I have longed to meet you! Let me repeat it, sir, I am enchanted to behold you, and the more so because I am told you are the most accomplished professor of your beautiful art that has ever visited my capital! Oh! don't bow, sir, and deny it: I'm sure that report hasn't done you half the justice you deserve. 'Pableu!" when I saw you just now the oddest fancy in the world, do you know, seized me. I'm dying to see you dance! 'Cest vrai, cest vrai,' and so eager, too, am I, 'mon cher de V——,' that I can't lose an instant. The day is bad, it is true, and the street is not over clean; yet, what are such obstacles to a man of your muscle? De V——I must have an extemporaneous 'polka' before I budge from this spot!"

You may imagine the dismay of the dancing master when he heard the irresistable request, and met the cold, mocking eye of the Emperor. "Your Imperial Highness will pardon me—but I would suggest that the exhibition would be more gratifying in the palace, where I will"—

"Oh, no matter, sir, for the palace;" interrupted Nicholas—"the more dirt the more difficulty, and the more difficulty the more skill!"

"But I have no music sire!"

"Come sir, en avant, or I shall call a gens d'armes for a fiddler!"

"It is quite needless," groaned the dancing master, as he put himself in a position and squared away for the dance.

Mighty, that day, mighty was the astonishment of the mud of St. Petersburg, if the mud ever gets astonished, as it is said by L. E. L. to get into "high spirits when it becomes dust on a windy day." Hopping, skipping; bounding, jumping, leaping like that of the unfortunate de V——, never was perpetrated before or since on any highway of Europe or America. The Emperor looked on with decorous gravity, applauding each excelling 'pas,' and becoming rapturous over the grace and agility of the unwilling exhibitor. At last, the strength of the master failed; but not until he was thoroughly bespattered.

"Do not fatigue yourself 'mon cher,' to gratify me any more," said the Emperor when 'de V.' stopped. "Let me thank you a thousand, thousand times for your kindness, and permit me to hope you have not soiled your pumps!"—The Charleston Evening News

AN OFFICIAL SMUGGLER.

Beaulte's is beyond contradiction the most fashionable jeweller's shop in Geneva. It is difficult to imagine a collection more rich in those thousand wonders which tempt a female heart; it is enough to drive a Parisian lady mad, or to make Cleopatra palpitate with longing in her grave. This jewelry is liable to a duty on entering France; but for a premium of five per cent. M. Beautte undertakes to smuggle it. The bargain between the buyer and seller is publickly made on this condition, as if there were no custom house officers in the world. It is true that M. Beautte possesses wonderful address in setting them at fault; one anecdote out of a thousand will show the truth of the compliment we pay him. When Count de Saint Cricq was director general of the customs; he heard this skill by which the vigilance of his officers was deceived, so frequently mentioned, that he resolved to assure himself whether all was true that was said of it. He consequently went to Geneva, presented himself at M. Beautte's shop, and purchased 30 000 francs, worth of jewelry on condition that it should be delivered without paying the import duty at his residence in Paris. M. Beautte agreed to the condition like a man accustomed to bargains of that kind, and merely presented to the purchaser a kind of promissory note by which he undertook to pay the usual five per cent, besides the 30,000 francs purchase money. The latter smiled, took up a pen, signed "De Saint Cricq, Director General of the French Customs," and handed back the paper to Beautte, who looked at the signature, and then contented himself with answering, with a bend of the head, M. le Director, the articles which you have done me the honor of buying, will arrive at Paris as soon as yourself."

M. de Saint Cricq, whose interest was excited, scarcely gave himself time to dine, sent to the post for horses, and sent out in an hour after the bargain had been concluded. M. de Saint Cricq made himself known to officers who came to examine his carriage, told the principal one what had happened to him, enjoined the most active surveillance on the whole line, and promised a reward of fifty louis to the officer who should succeed in seizing the prohibited jewelry. Not a custom house officer slept during three days. During this time M. Saint Cricq arrived at Paris, alighted at his residence, kissed his wife and children, and went to his room to take off his travelling dress. The first thing he perceived on the chimney piece was an elegant box, with the shape of which he was unacquainted.—He approached it and read on the silver plate which ornamented it, "The Count de Saint Cricq, director general of the customs." He opened it and found the jewelry which he had purchased at Geneva.—Beautte had made an arrangement with one of the waiters at the inn, who while assisting M. de Saint Cricq's servants to pack their master's luggage, had slipped the prohibited box among it. On his arriving at Paris, his valet, noticing the elegance of the case, and the inscription engraved upon it, had hastened to place it upon his master's chimney piece. Thus the director general of the customs was the first smuggler in the kingdom.—Ibid.

THE TALMUD, OR ORAL LAW OF THE JEWS.

If we ask a common Jew why he puts on the tephilin at daily morning prayer, he will answer without hesitation, "This custom is strictly observed by all Jews, as a sacred and religious ceremony, and was expressly enjoined on me as such by my parents when I was thirteen years old; and I obey without asking any farther question."

But let us put this question more pointedly to a Jew versed in the Talmud, and ask also to be informed by him the reason why the four parashuth of the tephilin bound round the head, are written upon four pieces of parchment, and placed in just as many divisions; whilst the four parashuth of the tephilin bound round the hand are only written on one piece of parchment and placed in one division?"

He answers in his simplicity, The Jews have a twofold law; the one written, the other oral. The first is contained in the five books of Moses, as he wrote it in thirteen copies, before entering into bliss. But since the right understanding of these books, revealed by God, exceeded the limits of human reason, the Eternal gave to the prophets, together with the written law, an oral law also, in which all the commandments and prohibitions of the written law were explained and more accurately fixed. This oral law Moses durst not write, in consequence of a command given by God concerning it; but he communicated it by word of mouth to his successor, Joshua. He delivered it in like manner to the elders, from whom it came to the prophets and members of the great Synagogue. Neither these nor the later teachers dared to hand down to posterity, in writing, that which had been delivered to them orally. But when, after the destruction of the second temple, the Jews were dispersed and severely oppressed by those nations under whose dominion they lived, Rabbi Judah surnamed the Saint, feared lest the doctrine handed down from their forefathers should fall into oblivion. Under such circumstances, therefore he felt himself compelled to depart from the custom hitherto observed, and, collecting carefully everything that the scribes taught orally, he reduced it (seventy years after the above-mentioned dispersion) into a work called the Mishna. The latter rabbis observed much indistinctness and obscurity in the collection of Rabbi Judah, which was, by means of disputations, variously made clear and explained. This discussion, and all other discussions that had taken place besides, Rabbi Jochanan collected, 300 years after the composition of the Mishna. This collection forms the Jerusalem Talmud. About a century after, Rabbi Asche made a similar collection in Babylon, which bears the name of the Babylonian Talmud. This Talmud is the rule by which we decide all religious matters. Both the decisions contained in it concerning questions of religion, and those which learned men have deduced from it, are as binding upon us Israelites as the Mosaic law. The placing of the tephilin also, as well as other customs of which no direct mention is made in the Scriptures, is founded upon the Talmud."

Thus does every Jew answer the question concerning the source of religious observances of which no trace is to be found in Scripture. The belief of the Jews in the oral doctrine is so strong, that they who look upon those (according to their view) well-grounded precepts as possessing the same authority as the law of Moses, never consider the grounds of their faith, and have scarcely ever inquired whether the Talmud, like the blessed doctrines of Holy Scripture, really flows from a pure fountain, or whether it is not rather derived from empty cisterns.—The Cronicle.

VALUE OF RAZORS.—It appears from the testimony of a dealer in razors' that these articles have no specific value. In a suit last week, to recover the price of one, the witness was asked what would be a fair price for such a razor. 'Ah, sare," he said, shrugging up his shoulders, dat is one vaar had question. Ze razor is fancy artikel. Ven a shentleman take notion to vant such a razor, den I no vant vaar much to sell him; I charge for him von, two, three dollar. But I suppose ze shentleman take notion to have him, and he vill have him; I can no say you shall not have him. Oder time ven I vant to sell ze razor, and no shentlemen vant to buy him, den I sell him for twenty-five cent three levy, fifty cent, vat I can get for him. Ze razor is fancy artikel. Ven shentlemen take notion for him, he has no price; he is verth vat you dink he is vorth; he is verth vat you can get for him."—Evening Post.

WITTY REBUKE.—A clergyman having preached during Lent, in a small town in which he had not once been invited to dinner, said, in a sermon exhorting his parishoners against being seduced by the prevailing vices of the age. "I have preached against every vice but luxurious living, having no opportunity of observing to what extent it is carried in this town.—Ibid.

VERY SENSIBLE.—"Prisoner, stand up! are you guilty or not guilty?"

"Faith, and do you think I shall do the work of the jury for you when they are paid for that same? Let 'em find it out.—Ibid.

THE USE OF THE FORK.—An English writer remarks that "it is curious enough that nations should be distinguished by so trifling a circumstance as the mode of using the fork at the table. An Englishman is remarkable for placing his fork at the left side of his plate; the Frenchman is recognized at the table for using the fork alone, without the knife; a German by planting it perpendicularly in his plate; and the Russian by using it as a pitchfork."—Ibid.

WILL YOU BE IDLE.

Stop where you are. Reflect a moment. Nature all about you is busy. Action is written on every thing. Shall you alone be idle?" No matter if you have wealth at your command you should not lead an idle listless life. Work for God and humanity. There are thousands of hearts upon which you might operate, and lead to virtue and happiness. If you have been so fortunate, —or unfortunate, as we should call it—to be the possessor of wealth, you have greater opportunities, if you are so disposed, of doing good. Money may be a talent for you to work with; the only talent you possess. Shall it be improved? Will you be the only idle object in the universe? Reflect a moment and if you are not convinced of your duty and happiness, we will not say another word.—Portland Tribune.

THE BOW UNBENT.—Who could imagine that Locke was fond of romances; that Newton once studied astrology; that Dr. Clare valued himself for agility, and frequently amused himself in a private room of his house, in leaping over the tables and chairs.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR, (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL. XVI MONROVIA, LIBERIA (WEST-AFRICA) DECEMBER 17 1847. NO. 3

THE LIBERIA HERALD.

Will be published in Monrovia, [illegible] monthly—on the first and third Friday of each month.

LEVI D. JAMES—PRINTER.

TERMS—Two Dollars [illegible] in advance.—If not paid within six [illegible] Two Dollars and fifty cents—if at the end of the year Three Dollars.

Persons unknown [illegible] these establishes Subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly, unless they shall have given notice that they wish the paper discontinued.

It will be at the option of the Editors to [illegible] the paper of any subscriber until all arrearages are paid.

Advertisements, not [illegible] first insertion One Dollar a square, for each succeeding insertion of the same number, Fifty Cents.

AGENTS FOR THE LIBERIA HERALD.

IN AFRICA.

Gen. Agt. Monrovia,	JOHN N. LEWIS.
Bassa Cove,	Rev. A. P. DAVIS,
Edina,	Rev. JAMES MOORE
Junk,	Mr. R. MURRAY.
Cape Palmas	Dr. S. F. McGILL.
Sierra Leone,	JNO. THORPE Esq.

UNITED STATES.

Gen. Agt. Philadelphia,	Rev. JOHN P. PINNEY,
Richmond Virginia.	Rev. W. MAINE,
Norfolk " "	W. D. LACY Esq.
Baltimore Md.	Wm. CRANE, "
Philad'elphia,	Rev. J. W. ADGER,
New York,	Rev. S. H. COX,
Boston,	Rev. JOSEPH TRACY,
Philadelphia.	Mr. WM. W. COPPINGER

From the Kentuckey Intelligencer.

A BROKEN PLEDGE.

A Tale of Truth.

(Concluded.)

Previous to relinquishing a seafaring life he had formed an attachment for Julia M., the eldest daughter of a distinguished member of Congress, residing at F., Henry's birth place. This attachment, which had commenced at an early age, was mutual, and had grown with their growth and strengthened with their strength. It was with the utmost pain, therefore, that Julia observed in his more recent visits Henry's face was flushed, his steps unsteady, and his manner constrained. She was convinced of his intemperance, but vainly hoped that others had not discovered it. Soon, however, the evidences of his intemperate habits became too palpable to be mistaken. He was seen on the public streets in a state of intoxication; and, finally after reeling about for some time, fell into the gutter, where he lay helplessly drunk. Soon after, while inebriated, he called at the house of Hon. Judge M., the father of Julia. The circumstances so much incensed Judge M. that he forbade his daughter to receive any further attentions from Henry. Heart-broken at the stern command (for she loved as only woman can love, with an affection which no earthly power could destroy or diminish) yet not daring to disobey her father's mandate, Julia determined to attempt the reformation of her lover, hoping that his irregular habits having been abandoned, father might consent to the renewal of his visits.

It was the era of the Washingtonian reform, and the hearts of the philanthropic beat high with hope, as they saw the degraded and besotted drunkard throwing off his fetters, and breaking his allegiance to the destroyer, and with his own hand signing that second declaration of Independence, the Washingtonian Pledge. It seemed that the Millennium was about to dawn on our benighted and sin ruined world, and the songs of the redeemed take the place of the Bacchanalian shout, and the notes of thanksgiving from hearts before bowed down with sorrow, be substituted for the voice of revelry. No change seemed too great, no reformation too wonderful; and there were not wanting those who prophesied that ere long Alcohol would be banished from our shores, and we be freed from the curse, the wretchedness and the misery of intemperance. But experience has proved that these were too sanguine; and that the car of reform, though destined to eventual triumph, must move slowly yet surely.

But to return. Julia at [illegible] time and again to bring her lover under the influence of the Washingtonian, but in vain. He would not listen to their arguments, nor be prevailed upon by their entreaties. "He could govern himself," he said, "he knew when he had taken enough; he did not drink for the love of the liquor, but merely for the sake of being social."

Undismayed by defeat in this attempt, Julia resolved to change her mode of attack; and accordingly, having drawn up a pledge of total abstinence from all that can intoxicate, differing somewhat in its form that used by the Washingtonians, she solicited the aid of her younger sister, in attempting to persuade him to sign it. Ellen M., one of the most beautiful and gifted girls I ever knew, possessed that rare combination of energy, decision and prudence, which admirably fitted her for this duty, and she entered upon it with zeal. Seeking him at those seasons when he was lost under the influence of alcohol, she portrayed, in language of the most artless eloquence, and touching pathos, the consequences of the course he was pursuing, the wretchedness he was bringing upon himself and his friends, and her sister's anxiety in his behalf. Anon she would change the subject, and paint, in vivid colours, the happiness of the reformed, the ease of reformation, and the bright hopes of the future which awaited him. Poor Henry at first refused to sign the pledge, but as she continued to urge upon him its claims, his stubborn heart relented, and brushing a tear-drop hastily from his eye, he affixed his signature to the instrument with a trembling hand.

Words cannot express the joy of Ellen M., at her success. She flew with eager haste to her sister, and exhibited the precious document, exclaimed—"'Tis done! 'tis done. Henry is free!"

Julia could hardly trust the evidence of her eyes, as to the fact of the signature; but having obtained from her sister even the minutest details of her successful efforts, she seemed at length to comprehend its truth, but the emotion was too much for her feeble frame; she fainted from excess of joy, and it was with difficulty that animation was restored.

For eight weeks Henry kept the pledge most solemnly. He remained at home, frequenting no longer the house of dissipation, but devoting his attention to the restoring and improving of his estate, which had suffered from his neglect.—But he was not thus to escape from the snare of the fowler. The fiend in human shape, from whom he had formerly purchased the poison, had missed him from his accustomed haunts, and indignant at losing so valuable a customer, had resolved to inveigle him back to his old habits. For this purpose he repaired to his house one morning early, and proposed a fishing excursion. Henry consented, and the two sauntered along the banks of a beautiful stream, near the village where they angled for an hour or more with indifferent success, when the tumseller pulling from his pocket a flask of brandy, offered it to Henry, observing that he must be thirsty. Henry declined, however, despite his repeated solicitations, and his own desire for the liquor, and quenched his thirst from the brook.

Defeated but not disheartened, T—— resolved to lay an other stratagem. Accordingly, he directed his daughter to issue invitations for a large party, and to invite Henry G. among the guests. He furnished some choice wines for the party, and instructed his daughter to persuade Henry to drink with her. Actuated by the same devilish spirit with her father, she performed her part to perfection. She requested Henry to take a glass of wine with her, and when he respectfully declined, she urged it strongly, and rallied him so much on his want of gallantry, that he; who never could bear ridicule, at last drained his glass. That glass was his ruin! It roused his dormant thirst for alcohol, and ere he left the house that evening, he was intoxicated. The next morning early he was found at T——'s store, calling for a morning dram, and the heartless wretch smiled fiendishly at the success of his stratagem.

Numerous attempts were made to induce Henry again to abandon his cup, but in vain. He plunged deeper and deeper into dissipation, and at length, some two years after, during a carousal of more than ordinary duration, he was seized with delirium tremens, and in a paroxysm of the disease put an end to his own life.

* * * * * * *

In one corner of the grave yard at F——, may be seen two graves; the one that of Henry G. the other Julia M. When all hope of Henry's reformation had ceased, she began to droop and wither like the flower smitten by the breath of the tempest. Her disease had already made fearful progress, when Henry's death occurred, and in six short weeks after that event, she, by her own request, was laid by his side, the victim of consumption!

O ye, who by your magic smiles and frowns rule the world, be warned by this simple but true narrative, to wield your influence on the side of temperance, and not like the fabled siren, to lure, by your enchantments, the unwary to destruction!

RECREATION IN NATURAL HISTORY.

The following anecdotes have been collected together, from the belief that they are too wonderful to be lost. They illustrate principally the instinct of animals. There can be no doubt of their authenticity, for we assure our readers that they have appeared previously with a few exceptions, in the county newspapers.

The turtle is naturally of a sluggish temperament, but when roused it has been known to do dreadful things. Gunter, the great Swiss naturalist, tells an anecdote of one that is quite dramatic in its pathos. He had presented a very fine specimen of a turtle to the lord-mayor; who sent it to the London tavern to be taken care of. Tuesday before the 9th of November, this turtle was allowed to walk up and down the pavement in front of the tavern; but to prevent people running over it, a label was hung round its neck, on which was written, "WILL BE KILLED TO-MORROW." This seemed to pray heavily upon the turtle's mind, for it waddled to and fro, evidently in a very agitated state, and a tear was seen distinctly to course down its left cheek, and bedewed the surrounding flag-stones. The poor creature rolled about with increasing uneasiness every minute; till the lord-mayor's state carriage happening to pass, it slipped off the pavement, and fell deliberately under the fore-wheels of the cumbrous vehicle. It was picked up a shapeless mass of horn, callipash, and mutilated callippee. "There is no doubt," says Gunter, "but this was a premeditated act of suicide, for it was proved afterward that nothing but the immense weight of the lord-mayor's carriage could have crushed the shell. Grief at its impending fate evidently impelled the distracted turtle to the rash act."

Horses have been known to predict a frost by going to the blacksmith's the day before to be rough-shod. Franconi tells a story of a mare who would never perform on the stage unless she was on the side of the French. Her spirit of nationality was such, that if she was carrying an Englishman or an Austrian, she would invariably throw him and then run over to the side of the emperor. In this way she has often thrown Blucher and the Duke of Wellington. Napoleon hearing of this extraordinary trait of patriotism in a horse, went expressly to the Cirque, and having witnessed the fact with his own imperial eyes, offered Franconi a whole regiment of cavalry in exchange for the mare; but the French Diocrow[illegible] to his credit let it be said, would not part with her. Napoleon was piqued, but afterward decorated the mare with the grand cross of the legion of honor.

Pigs have been taught to spell. A singular anecdote is told of one, that indubitably proves the force of early habit in animals generally, but in pigs especially. A learned sow that was called "Bacon," would always spell Vauxhall with a W. This was always a matter of wonderment, till it was ascertained that she had been born on a market day in Smithfield market. The inveterate misuse of the W at once confirmed her cockney origin.

Le Vaillant, the African traveller, tells some wonderful stories about the instinct of the baboon. He travelled with one for a long time as a guide. His name was Snees. He knew the shops where the best sherbet was to be got. Being short of butter once, Snees brought him a number of cocoa-nuts, which he had thrown about till the milk inside had become churned. He watched by his master's side every night, killing the musquitoes and fleas which swarm about the banks of the Nile. He often helped Le Vaillant in unrolling the mummies, and packing up his trunks. Le Vaillant brought this baboon to Europe, and Snees showed his gratitude by saving his master's life. Thieves were plundering the house, when Snees ran to the alarm bell, and never ceased pulling it till the inmates were alarmed; the thieves were apprehended just in time, for Le Vaillant says, when he awoke there were two gentlemen at his bedside, the one with a pistol, the other with a carving knife. The day Le Vaillant died, this sagacious baboon broke a blacking bottle—whether accidentally or not, is not proven—which blacked him from head to foot; but many persons who knew Snees well, declare this was done purposely, from a desire of the faithful animal to show respect to the memory of his kind master, by going into mourning for him.

The instinct of bears is equally wo[illegible]. There was one at the Zoological gardens, who would never mount the pole on a Sunday, because on that day no cakes are allowed to be sold.

A lady of title informed Buffon that she knew a blackbird who [illegible] every morning, and would not grant it [illegible] wet. An anecdote told by a gentleman [illegible] of a beaver, is no less wonderful than [illegible] over: he declares he saw a beaver w[illegible] the crown of an old hat. Soon another [illegible] approached it, and [illegible] the first; then a number of young beavers attracted by their sobs, came running up, and they all cried too. He accounts for this by saying, that the hat being made of beaver, the animals had evidently recognised in it the skin of one of their own kindred. "Who can say," he asks, "whether this very hat was not to them the sad remains of an affectionate son—the only remembrance of a favorite brother?"

Captain Parry tells a story of a polar bear, which puts the instinct of this animal beyond all doubt; he had given it to one of his sailors, who with this small capital, started showman, and having taught the bear to dance, used to take it about the streets. The sailor afterward assured Captain Parry that he never could get the bear to pass a barber's shop; he accounted for this by saying, that as Bear's grease was sold only at those places, the animal was in a constant state of fear, lest its own bear's grease was sold in sixpenny pots."

The social grosbeak, a bird which is found about the upper Gambia River, [illegible] greatly in building [illegible] nests, which are so strongly [illegible] as to keep out the Monkeys. A Guinea-fowl [illegible] finds the best of finding a whole row of their nests, covered over at the roof with bits of an old mackerel, which they had evidently picked up from one of the frequent wrecks off the coast. What but instinct could have told these social grosbeaks that mackerel bones were warlike proof?

Many singular anecdotes are told of the instinct of the fox. The most probable of those we have read is, that one of the foxes plundering a hen every morning of its eggs, and leaving a piece of chalk, of the same size as an egg, for every one he stole.

The following is amusing, for it proves that the parrot is not so stupid as he is generally represented. Jack Sheppard, when he had escaped from Newgate, heard called out in a shrill voice, "Does your mother know you're out?" Jack was frightened at first, but recovered his usual courage, when he found it was only a parrot that was hanging over a greengrocer's door.

The instinct of the dog, and the cat, and the rat is so well-known, that one anecdote we think will suffice to illustrate the three. A terrier and a tom cat were pursuing a large rat down the street. The rat was a most cunning, when it dodged suddenly and ran into a sausage shop. The cat and dog stopped [illegible] at the door, and looking up at the yards of sausages, hung down their heads and slunk away quite terrified. This anecdote indubitably shows that self-preservation is the first law of nature, besides proving that the feeling of veneration for the dead is much stronger in animals than in men.

The following anecdote is so astonishing that we cannot help repeating it. We should really doubt the truth of it, unless it was supported by the testimony of the celebrated Walker. Mr. Tiedmann, the famous Saxon dentist, had a valuable tortoise-shell cat that for days had done nothing but moan. Guessing the cause, he looked into its mouth, and seeing a decayed tooth, soon relieved it of its pain. The following morning there were at least ten cats outside his door—the day after that twenty; and they went on increasing at such a rate, that he was obliged to keep a [illegible] dog to drive them away. But nothing would help him. A cat who had the tooth-ache, would come any number of miles to submit his jaw to him. It would come down the chimney even, and not leave the room till he had taken its tooth out. It grew much a nuisance at last, that he never was free from one of these feline patients. However, being one morning very nervous, he broke accidentally the jaw of an old tabby. The news of this spread like wildfire. Not a single cat ever came to him afterward. It is extraordinary how the cats, in the above instance, acted like human beings!

THE IRON AGE.

WE live in the iron age, as poets, from time immemorial, sung of the days in which they lived. Who has not heard that the age of chivalry is gone—that the spirit of poetry has left this world—that the sordid vices of Mammon, restless and vigilant, have extinguished in our time the true constituents of happiness—faith, hope, and love.

There was much of poetical and moral beauty, and of philosophical truth, though darkly obscured, in many opinions and superstitions which, literally understood, were erroneous or idolatrous. In the degrading system of polytheism itself, the devoted dimly recognised the power and presence of the only and universal God, who by day and night, through the varied phenomena of nature, ever speaks with a still voice to the soul of the intelligent and pious worshipper. And thus in many an error and superstition of bygone ages there was originally a moral and a meaning which we have not always advantageously exchanged for the proud intelligence of our own. But those who deem that poetry and romance have left us, proclaim only their own dulness. Nature is yet fresh in her beauty as she was centuries ago—the skies, rivers, forests, lakes, the blue ocean, the everlasting mountains, and the varying seasons are all to him "who has a soul attuned aright," as glorious as ever. The hopes and buoyancy of youth—ever extinguished by advancing years and reproduced in the child—the calmer and more resolute passions of maturer age—"whatever stirs this mortal frame," shall furnish the materials of romance and poetry so long as the world and the divine portions of our nature continue to exist.

We live in the iron age, but iron has accomplished for us results of which the poet or alchymist never dreamed. The native of our woods could only by a most wearisome process fell the tree which the iron axe so quickly prostrates—the instrument through which the ground, so recently covered with forests and tenanted by wild animal, has become dotted by the flocks and cities of a civilized nation, whose rapid peopling of an entire continent, familiar and common-place to us, shall be the theme of poetry and wonder to many a future age. Our weapons, more terrible than lightning, teach us the folly of war. One instrument of science shows us myriads of animated beings, susceptible of pleasure and pain in the drop of stagnant water, and covering in similar proportions nearly all matter, while another displays to our vision the mountains and oceans of heavenly orbs, and teaches us that far in the regions of infinite space are innumerable worlds, each it may be equalling our own, and like it, teeming in its atoms with life incalculable. Machinery which to the Roman or Greeks would have appeared impossible, propels the huge train of carriages on the iron road, and urges the iron boat against the power of wind and water, through the storms of mid-ocean, or the crashing and solemn icebergs, where the ordinary ship must inevitably perish.

A recent publication of high authority assures us that "writing paper has been manufactured from iron, and that books with both leaves and binding have been made from the same material."

Manufacturing machinery performs the work of millions of men; and chymistry in a thousand methods produces changes more beneficial than the avaricious alchymist vainly toiled to discover. When the Macedonian conqueror Alexander wished to prove the truth of the Delphian oracle, knowing no better test, he asked to be told what his father then at a distance was doing. Our magnetic telegraph, claiming no supernatural agency, might accurately have answered—and by the same mysterious and subjugated power, the recent corpse itself, starting rudely as if indignant at the interruption of its last repose, may be roused into energy wild and life-like, but transient. The discoveries of science, and varied information of the arts and thoughts of other men and nations, are diffused through the medium of the iron press. We in our iron age have realized things more wonderful, than nursed amid the romance of wild Arabia,

> "The wanderful tribes require,
> Stretched in the desert round the evening fire."

It is true that the fairy tales and strange legends which our forefathers ceased to believe have now become almost extinct. The chivalry and glory, pomp and savage sports of feudalism have departed, but like a gaudy and imperfect picture, or the illuminated transparency of a theatre, the fascinations of feelings which we experience when regarding them through distance or darkness, changes upon a closer view in the light of day to indignant dissatisfaction. Rather than admire the spirit of those times, which colored and gilt by time and imagination may sometimes appear poetically beautiful, as clouds of noxious vapor receive from the sun a brilliancy which is not their own, we should regret that in dark places of the earth are legends and stories as unreasonable as ever, and that ancient feudalism, tyrannical as it was, is surpassed by modern slavery.

A few only of the sublime and wonderful discoveries of our age have been mentioned. Volumes would not suffice to tell all. The riches of the past, most of its histories, experience, literature, and inventions—itself no poorer for the legacy—the vast discoveries and powers of the present day—and the bright hope for the future, which, reasoning from that which has already occurred, we dare not limit—are all for us; but in serious humility we ask ourselves if the increase of happiness and virtue is proportionate to the increase of knowledge—whether as children of the nineteenth century, heirs to its wealth and power, we use our inheritance to the best advantage.

POWER OF THE VOICE OVER CHLDREN.

IT is usual to attempt the management of children either by corporeal punishment, or by rewards addressed to the senses, or by words alone. There is one other means of government the power and importance of which are seldom regarded—I refer to the human voice. A blow may be inflicted on a child, accompanied by words so uttered as to counteract entirely its intended effect; or the parent may use language in the correction of the child, not objectionable in itself, yet spoken in a tone which more than defeats its influence. Let any one endeavor to recall the image of a fond mother long since at rest in heaven. Her sweet smile and ever clear countenance are brought vividly to recollection; and so also is her voice, and blessed is that parent who is endowed with a pleasing utterance. What is it which lulls the infant to repose? It is no array of mere words. There is no charm to the untaught one in letters, syllables, and sentences. It is the sound which strikes its little ear that soothes and composes it to sleep. A few notes, however unskilfully arranged, if uttered in a soft tone, are found to possess a magic influence. Think we, that this influence is confined to the cradle? No; it is diffused over every age, and ceases not while the child is under the parental roof. In the pressure of duty, we are tempted to utter ourselves hastily to our children. Perhaps a threat is expressed in a loud and irritating tone; instead of allaying the passions of the child, it serves directly to increase them. Every fretful expression awakens in him the same spirit which produced it. So does a pleasant voice call up agreeable feeling. Whatever disposition, therefore, we would encourage in a child, the same we should manifest in the tone in which we addres them.

A WONDERFUL MEMORY.

The Morning Herald of Sydney reports a rather amusing scene which occured in the supreme court at that place during a trial for robbery. For the prisoner an alibi was pleaded; at the time of the robbery, he was in his own hut, listening to the recital of Horace Walpole's "Old English Baron," which a man named Lane had, with other novels, committed to memory; Lane was two hours and a half repeating the tale. This statement seemed so incredible, that the attorneygeneral for the prosecution, asked Lane if he really meant to assert that he could occupy two hours and a half with his recitation. "I could," replied the witness; "and I will, if you please." "We'll have a page or two," said the attorneygeneral; and to the great surprise not less of the learned gentleman than of the court and auditory, the witness, after a preparatory hem! commenced—"In the time of King Henry, when the good Duke Humphry returned from the wars in the Holy Land, where he had been sojourning for a number of years, there lived—" and so he went on for several minutes, in a tone and manner which showed that he knew every word in the book; until he was stopped by the attorneygeneral, who confessed he was satisfied. But the counsel for the defence was not; doubt had been cast upon Lane's veracity, and should be allowed to prove it, with the time occupied in the recitation, by speaking the whole novel! The chief justice was in great consternation at this, and exclaimed, "But you do not expect me to take it down!" At last the matter was compromised, the man of memory giving the concluding portions of the story. As a consequence; the prisoner was acquitted.

We have a friend who can almost, if not quite, equal this Mr. Lane. The extent of his retentive power being questioned, he offered to repeat either "Marmion" or "The Lady of the Lake," and did give whole pages of the last before he would listen to the cry of "hold enough."—Saturday Sun.

Beautiful Extracts.

"Look into life and watch the growth of the soul. Men are not what they seem to the outward eye: mere machines moving about in customary occupations—productive laborers of food and wearing apparel—slaves from morn to night, task-work set them by the wealth of nations—They are the children of God. The soul never sleeps: not even when its wearied body lies in seeming forgetfulness. All the soul's now in this world are forever awake; and this life, believe us, though in moral sadness it has often been called so, is no dream. In a dream we have no will of our own, no power over ourselves; our familiar friends seem strangers from some far off country, the dead are alive; yet we wonder not; the laws of the physical world are suspended, or changed, or confessed by our fantasy; intellect, imagination, the moral sense, affection, passion, are not possessed by us in the same way we possess them out of that mystery; were life a dream, or like a dream, it would never lead to heaven."

Chistopher North describing the impressive calm of a forest, says: "What a confusion of huge stones, rocks, knells, all tumbled together into a chaos—not without its stern and sterile beauty! Still are there above blue glimpses of the sky—deep through the umbrage be, and wide flung the arms of the oaks, and of pines in their native wilderness gigantic as oaks and extending as broad a shadow. Now the firmament has vanished and all is twilight. Immense stems —'in number without numbers numberless,' —bewilduring eye and soul—all still—silent steadfast.—And so would they be in a storm; for what storm, let it rage oft as it might—till the surface of the forest toss and rear like the sea—could force its path through these many million trunks? The thunder stone might split that giant there —how vast! how magnificent!—but the brother by his side would not tremble; and the sound—in the awful width of the silence —what more would it be than that of the woodpecker alarming the insects of one particular tree?"

"The flowers are the periodicals of the earth—the stars are those of heaven. With what unfailing regularity do not numbers issue forth! Hesperus and Lucifer!—ye are one concern! The polar star is studied by all nations. How beautiful the poetry of the moon! On what subject does not the sun throw light? No fear of hurting your eyes by reading that fine, clear type, on that softened page! Lo! as you turn over—one blue, another yellow, and another green—all, all alike, delightful to the pupil, and dear to him as the very apple of his eye! Yes the great periodical press of heaven is unceasingly at work, night and day; and, though even it has been taxed, and its emanations confined, still their circulation is incalculable. It is yet free—the only free power all over the world."

"A life of duty is the only cheerful life; for all joy springs from the affections; and 'tis the great law of nature, that without good deeds all good affection dies, and the heart becomes utterly desolate. The external world, too then loses all its beauty poetry fade away from the earth; for what is poetry but the reflection of all pure and sweet, all high and lofty thoughts? But where duty is—

> "Flowers laugh beneath her in their beds,
> And fragrance in her footing treads;
> She doth preserve the stars from wrong,
> And the eternal heavens, through her, are fresh and strong."—New-York Daily Atlas.

MUSIC.

We have had it at our pen's point several times to write an essay beseeching all and singular to learn to sing. Music is such a delightful bond of family union, and conducer to domestic happiness, that he who neglects to favor its introduction, defrauds his own comfort. But all we would say is better expressed in the following extract than we could do it.

"Let all learn to sing, and, if possible to play on instruments. If time is scarce, take time, and rely upon it, you will gain that time both, in increased mental and physical efficiency through life, as well as to make up this time, and especially in prolonging life itself. Let children and youth more especially be encouraged to sing. The growing custom of relieving the tedium of the school room by interspersing music, is admirable. It should be practised often through the day, through all the schools in Christendom. It will greatly promote study, as well as cultivate this delightful and moralizing faculty and also render the school room attractive, instead of repulsive. It will keep alive this strong native passion, now allowed to slumber and finally die by disuse. As all children have this faculty by nature, all can or could have become good singers and players, if it had been early and duly cultivated. Let mothers sing much to their children as well as strike up cheerful lays when about the house and garden so as to inspire this divine sentiment in all about them, as well as thereby give unrestrained expression to those lively, buoyant, elevated, happy feelings, which are by nature in their souls. Song is what is inexpressibly beautiful. She is prerogatived to pour forth her whole soul in strains of thrilling pathos. She is a better natural minister than man; and hence can diffuse in society those soft feelings and holy aspirations inspired by music, especially female singing. She can therefore win her wayward children, and supplant the angry by the enchanting and subduing. When neighbors become fretful or alienated, she can bring them out of temper into sweetness, more easily and effectually than by scolding or chastisement. One sweet tune, when they are wrangling, will quell wrath and promote love, a hundred fold more than whips. The former is irresistible and tames down their rougher passions at once; the latter only re-inflames. Sweet music will hush an angry crying child, and dispel anger as effectually as the sun fog. If mothers would sing their children out of badness into goodness—would know how to make and keep them good, and because they were good—how sweet and heavenly-minded would they render their children!"—Saturday Sun.

FORWARD.

The annexed clipping from an exchange embodies a thought which is well worth attention:

> There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
> Rough-hew them as we will,

says Shakespeare; a fine moral truth which cannot be too often and too urgently inculcated. Even our bad ends under the influence of this guidance, and in spite of our own perverse acts and aims may only tend to illustrate the axiom that all partial evil is universal good, thus accounting for the existence of pain and wrong, that dispensation so difficult to reconcile with the divine attributes; and justifying, if any such vindication can be deemed necessary, the ways of God to man. Astronomers have discovered that while the planets and stars are fulfilling their separate motions, while comets startle us by their eccentric courses, while the nebulæ are floating hither and hither, and the milky way is undergoing frequent changes, the sun itself and all its circumvolving or apparently fixed spheres by a gigantic progression hitherto unsuscepible of measurement, are advancing through the stupendous vicissitudes of space, as if seeking some heavenly goal, as yet invisible where perchance, the whole system is to receive its final and blissful consummation, by returning to the Deity from whom it emanated.

If there be and analogy between the material and the moral world, and what is more probable may we not surmise that the human mind, subject to the same law that governs our solar system, however stationary, or erratic, retrograde it may seem in a particular instance, is in the aggregate, making a sure though not calculable progression, until, in the spiritual course prescribed to him man shall again be brought round to the paradise from which he was expelled? However free in its individuality, the human will is subordinate to general control, or to use the words of Pope:—

> Each individual seeks a several goal,
> But Heaven's great view is one—and that the whole.

Most rational, most consolatory, most religious is it to fix our eyes upon this great view, and not to pore upon the petty and exceptional evils possibly the very means by which final and universal good is to be accomplished. In this supposition ther is nothing paradoxical. Shall man's art extract health from poison, life from death, and shall God's spiritual alchemy be less patent, less beneficent? Once admit a divine superintendence over moral agencies, singly free, but collectively controlled and we can easily understand how vice may be made conducive to virtue, folly to wisdom, oppression to freedom, until, as far as our infinite nature will allow, all evil shall be extinguished in all good.—Ibid.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, LIBERIA, DECEMBER 31 1847

It becomes our painful duty to announce the death of our late worthy compositor, Mr. L. D. James. The circumstances of his death are such, that, did duty permit, we would erase their remembrance at once from our mind.

On the evening of last Thursday, the 23d, instant, Mr. James, in his usual good health attended divine service, in his wonted place at the Baptist Meeting House. From church he walked with his mother, and other members of his family to their residence. When he parted from them, he said he intended to watch before day for some deer, which visited his garden. He rose about half past three in the morning, and after having prayers, told his wife he was going to set for a deer. He took his gun and going out requested her to shut the door. He had gone but a few minutes when the report of a gun and a cry, "O Lord! O Lord!" alarmed his wife. She threw open the window, called out to the neighbors to help, and seizing her child flew to the spot, where on such occasions he usually sat; but horrible to relate, when she reached the place, though not more than two hundred yards from the house, she saw her husband lying on his face, already a corpse, weltering in his gore!! The little boy who usually accompanied him stood there mute with fright and surprise, but could only say, Congo man shoot daddy. The whole contents of a heavily charged musket was poured into his side, and one slug passed directly through his heart!!

The Congo is in jail awaiting his trial. He confesses the deed, and pledges that he mistook James for a deer. We would say nothing to awaken or increase prejudice, so as to deprive him of a fair and impartial trial. But when it is known that the moon shone at that hour, with unusual splendor—that he was within less than ten feet of his victim when he shot him—that he knew James was accustomed to sit there for a like purpose—that the position was elevated so as to command a view of the whole field—when, we say these and other circumstances are known, we are staggered at such an accident.

James was a peaceable and industrious young man, and one who gave promise of become a valuable member of society. He has been for years a consistent member of the Baptist Church in this place, enjoyed the esteem and confidence of his brethren, and united in full communion.

He has left a widowed mother, a wife and one child to mourn his loss.

Up to the present writing we are refreshed with heavy showers of rain, with an occasional accompaniment of severe thunder and lightning. Quite unusual.

Bexley.

We were much pleased with what we saw of Bexley—although our engagements in the association did not permit to us a long nor extensive look around. It has all the qualities for a fine agricultural settlement. The soil is fertile and excellently adapted to the production of articles called for as staples of commerce. Coffee looks well, especially that on the premises of the Am. Bap. B. F. M. under the superintendence of brother Clarke. This is a pretty place—just such as we could like to own, were we easy in our circumstances, and possessed of a well stocked library. Ginger is at home in bexley soil—and arrow root and pepper only asks permission to get in the ground. The Bexleyans are industrious and hospitable, and with the generous and high minded John Day, as their head, remind us more of the hardy & industrious and plain country people of Virginia, than any we have seen. But they are Liberians, and to be convinced of it, you have only to converse with them a moment about their farms.—The plan or articles just entered upon is the righ one—all others were wrong—because—it did not succeed. Success to them.

Factory Island.

On our way up to Bexley, we called at Factory Island. The house is a desolation rapidly melting away under the combined ravages of the bug-a-bug and the weather. It is already an unsafe habitation, and the ground a waste of rank grass and noxious weeds. Wretched misapplication of means. Perhaps the good Americans will yet learn that colonists resident of years on the coast, can, in some cases advise at least, as sagely as the temporary visitor of a month.

Providence Baptist Association.

The convention of the associated Baptist Churches, took place at Bexley, Grand Bassa County, on the second Friday in this month.

The delegation was more full than we had ever seen at any previous meeting; nor do we recollect one so marked with harmony of feeling and unity of design, as this. It was an interview which we shall long remember, and remember with the most pleasing emotions. Many very important subjects came up for discussion, and from the nature of these subjects, as well as from the manner of their discussion, we cherish the belief that our people are waking up to a sense of their duty and their privilege, and their capability. We need not say therefore that our hope is raised. As the minutes will be printed and circulated, we will not deprive them of interest by anticipation, and will only add that there has been a considerable increase during the year, and that the number now in full communion is 482, exclusive of those at Sinoe, from whom no letter was received. There are also 18 or 20 candidates for baptism in this county. About three fourths of all the Baptist in the colony are in this county, and more than one half of the whole in the two churches in this place and New Georgia.

We cannot close without tendering our sincere acknowledgements to the Brethren of Bassa, for their kind attentions and hospitality to us from this county. Nor would we leave room for the charge of lugaty, or want of catholic liberality by omitting to mention that the hearts and houses of our Methodist equally with our Baptist brethren, were open to receive us. May they meet their reward at the resurrection of the just.

On Sabbath the 19th, inst. Our Methodist brethren immersed 23 believers in the River St. Paul. The work is onward. "The Lord make his people a hundred times so many more as they be." Rev. J. W. Roberts officiated.

At the suggestion of subscribers, the proprietors of the Herald, have concluded to issue the paper monthly, instead of semi-monthly. A corresponding deduction will be made in the price, and subscribers credited accordingly

The Liberia Packet returned this morning from Cape Palmas. She called at Sinoe and Bassa on her way up, and has brought a large number of passengers.

All the members of the Legislature are now here. The session will commence on Monday. The whole people look with intense anxiety to the meeting of their Representatives, and well they may. Never was wisdom and harmony more required than at present, and the writer trembles at the view of the responsibility which by his acceptance of office he has assumed.

Hilary Teage Esquire, is elected to fill the vacancy in the Senate, occasioned by the death of John B. Gripon, Esquire.

SELECTED EXTRACTS.

A BEAUTIFUL FIGURE.

Life is beautifully compared to a fountain fed by a thousand streams, that perish if one be dried. It is a silver cord, twisted with a thousand strings, that break asunder if one be broken. Frail and thoughtless mortals are surrounded by innumerable dangers, which make it much more strange that they escape so long, than that they almost all perish suddenly at last. We are encompassed by accidents every day to crush the mouldering tenements that we inhabit—The seeds of disease are planted in our constitutions by nature. The earth, and the atmosphere whence we draw the breath of life, is impregnated with death—health is made to operate its own destruction! The food that nourishes contains the elements of decay; the soul that animates it by a vivifying fire, tends to wear it out by its own action; death lurks in ambush along our paths. Notwithstanding this is the truth, so palpably confirmed by the daily examples before our eyes, how little do we lay it to heart! We see our friends and neighbors perishing among us, how seldom does it occur to our thought sthat our knell shall, perhaps, give the next fruitless warning to the world!

A WIFE.

When a man of sonse comes to mary, it is a companion whom he wants, and not an artis. It is not merely a creature who can paint, and play, and sing and dance. It is a being who can comfort and counsel him; one who can reason and reflect, and feel and judge, and discriminate; one who can assist him in his affairs, lighten his sorrows, purify his joys, strengthen his principles, and enducate his children. Such is the woman who is fit for a mother and the mistress of a family. A woman who of the fomer description may occasionally figure in a drawing-room, and excite the admiration of the company; but is entirely unfit for a helpmate to man and to train up a child in the way he should go.

TOO MUCH ANXIETY—Of the causes of disease, anxiety of mind is one of the most frequent and important When we walk the streets of large commercial towns, we can scarcely fail to remark the hurried gait and careworn features of the well-dressed passengers. Some young men, indeed, we may see with countenances possessing natural cheerfulness and color; but these appearances rarely survive the age of early manhood. Cuvier closes an eloquent description of animal existence and change with the conclusion that "life is a state of force." What he would urge in a physical view, we may more strongly urge in a moral.—Civilization has changed our character of mind as well as of body. We live in a state of unnatural excitement; because it is partial, irregular, and excessive Our muscles waste for want of action; our nervous system is worn out by excess of action. Vital energy is drawn from the operations for which nature designed it, and devoted to operations which it never contemplated.—Thackeray.

CHRISTIANITY.

In Christianity we behold philosophy not carelessly slumbering over plans of improvement—not coldly suggesting ideas of reformation—not bewildering herself in the perad-ventures of doubtful disputation; but philosophy awake, alive, in action, doing good, diffusing happiness; the divine philosophy which draws God down to earth, and raises men to heaven. In its great Author we behold not the sullen, supercilious recluse, looking down with affected contempt on mankind, talking sagely and effecting nothing; but the beneficent Friend of men, mixing with society, smiling with complacency on harmless enjoyment, stretching forth the hand to relieve distress, outrunning the expectations and even the desires of the humble; and overcoming evil with good. The statue of morals, which had for ages been lying concealed in the block, and which art and industry had, in the process of time, elicited and disclosed, in every fair and comely proportion animated by the Spirit of Christ now breathes, looks, speaks, moves; no more a dead letter, but a living soul Observe the difference. I remember that man well: he was once the figure of a Christian, he declaimed most learnedly on mercy, benevolence, and charity—and could say, "Be thou warmed; be thou filled; "but he shunned the haunts of wretchedness, his ear against the side of the window—and when the wounded traveller lay half dead in his way, he passed by on the other side. But lo! there he is now destitute; while the tear of sympathy falls from his eye the hungry soul is satisfied with his bread, the fainting revives with the cordial he administered, and the shivering limbs bless the hand which clothed them—Dr. H. Hunter.

The more quietly and peaceably we all get on in the world the better for our neighbor. In nine cases out of ten, the wisest course is, if a man chents you, to quit dealing with him; if he is abusive, quit his company; if he slander you, take care to live so that no man will believe him. No matter who he is, or how he misuses you, the wisest way is just to let him alone; for there is nothing better than this cool, calm, quiet way of dealing with the wrongs we meet with.

A Lie—The Chinese proverb says a lie has no legs, and consequently cannot stand: but it has wings, and can fly far and wide.

A QUESTION IN LAW.—A man has been indicted in New Orleans for stealing an umbrella. His counsel contends that it is no offence—that umbrellas are public property. A great interest is excited for the result, as in case of conviction, it is feared thousands of otherwise good citizens will be suddenly obliged to fly, to escape the wrath of the law. It is stated in some books on insanity that it once manifested itself in a patient by inducing him to return a borrowed umbrella. The doctors gave a unanimous opinion, according to the authority referred to, that the symptoms were decidedly lunatic, showing a want of prudence in not preparing for a 'rainy day,' and the man was consigned to the mad-house, as the only proper place for him. It is not known whether he ever got out.

DROPSY IN THE CHEST.—The Flushing Journal says that a lady in that town cured herself of a dropsy in the chest by using the root of the garden parsley. A few cleaned roots were boiled in a quart of water until it was diminished to a pint. Repeatedly during the day a small quantity was taken mixed with a portion of gin, and every symptom disappeared. After a few doses the gin was omitted and the decoction only used. The Journal vouches for the truth of this case.—If this be true, it is a fact worthy no little attention.

Youth and Years.

Good heaven! what a thing it is to be young, and in high health, and in high spirits; how insignificant are its cares to its enjoyments; every hour its becoming enjoyment, if we choose to seek it; every flower, be it bitter or be it sweet, be it inodorous or be it perfumed, has its nectarial fall of honeyed drops ripe for the lip that will vouchsafe to press it. But years they bring on the autumn of the heart when the bright and blooming petals have passed away, when the dreams have vanished with the light slumbers of early years, and every thing is in the seed for generations to come; we feel ourselves the husks of the earth and find that it is time to fall away, and give place to the bloom and blossom of another epoch.—James.

DUELLING.

What follows is not so bad, considering. The Marquis of Maleville is a sensible parsonage, for a nobleman, and has a proper pride in the integrity of his throat:

Dumas, the author, wrote to the Marquis de Maleville, stating that he had insulted him, and referring him to his friend M. Viennet to agree upon the time and place "where he could meet him to cut his throat." The Marquis replied as follows:—

"Sir—I thank you for having afforded me the opportunity of seeing the agreeable and excellent M. Viennet. As to the proposal to which you are good enough to make to cut my throat, I am chagrined beyond measure at not being able to accept it. I have not the honor to be a gentleman.

Marquis de MALEVILLE."

Augustus, hearing that a Roman knight, who had lived extravagantly, had died overwhelmed in debt, and that his goods were to be sold at auction, gave orders to purchase his bedstead. Some of the courtiers expressing their surprise, "I should like," said he, "to know the bed used on which he could sleep who owed so much."

If you would be respected in age, have respect for age through life.

NEW GOODS!

The least that I can say is, that my stock is large in the total, being very near half the Clerk Montgomery's tonnage. But small in the various varieties. It is therefore, useless to attempt to articulate the assortments of staple and fancy Dry goods, the new fashions of both Europe and America, Groceries, Hardware, provisions, drugs, medicines, and dye stuffs. And that minutia of things which pertain to ladies tastes. Let all imagine that they can get almost any thing at Roy's new store, on the fairest terms. Any and every thing will be sold for cash down, or the products which will bear exportation. Store in Rev. B. R. Wilson's stone store house on Broad St.

EDWARD J. ROYE

Oct. 23rd. 1847.
Monrovia.

COPARTNERSHIP NOTICE.

The undersigned have formed a connexion in Merchantile business under the firm of Samuel F. Mc Gill & Brother.

SAMUEL F. MC GILL,
R. S. MC GILL.

Cape Palmas January 9th 1847.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT.

ARTICLES,	PER	FROM	TO
Bacon,	Lb.	5	10
Beads, pound,	"	16	20
Beef, cargo No. 1,	Bl	12 00	12 00
Blue Baffs,	Pa.	2 50	3 00
Bricks,	1000	10 00	12 00
Butter,	Firkin	30	35
Boards,	1000ft	30 00	40 00
Candles Sperm,	Lb.	45	50
Cheese,	"	none
Corn meal,	Bbl	5 00	6 00
Checks domestic,	Pa	12	14
Cotton unbleached,	Bale	8	12 12
Cotton bleached,	"	10 00	15 00
Calicoes, assorted,	Pa	8
Camwood,	Ton	80 00
Flour superfine	Bbl	10 00	12 00
Flints Gun,	100	1 00	1 50
Guns,	Box	75 00	75 00
Iron, bars,	Cwt	40 00	50 00
Lead, pig,	"	none
Lard,	Keg,	15	16
Lime,	Bushel,	50
Molasses	Gallon	45	50
Mackerel	Bbl	9 00	10 00
Nails	Keg	8 00	9 00
Oil paint	Gallon	none
Oil palm	"	33 1 3	35
Pork	Bbl	15 00	18 00
Pots iron	Cwt.	8 00	10 00
Powder	Bbl.	15 00	16 00
Padlocks	Dozen	none
Porter	"	none
Pipes gumbo	Box	none
Prints various	Yard,	12 1 2
Romanils	Pa.	1 00	1 25
Salt	Ton	none
Sugar loaf	Lb.	12
Sugar brown	"	12
Shoes	Box	none
Slippers	"	none
Soap	"	8
Shad	"	none
Satin stripe	Pa.	3 00
Tobacco	1000lbs	none
Waxhand bowls	Dozen	2 00	10 00
Wine claret,	"	4 00
Wine hock	"	8 00	10 00
Wine champaign	"	15 00	20 00

POETRY.

THE TILLER OF THE SOIL.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST,
BY DAVID L. ROATH.

A hardy, sun-burnt man is he,
A hardy sun-burnt man;
No sturdier form you'll ever see,
Though all the world you scan.
In summer's heat in winter's cold,
You'll find him at his toil--
Oh, fair to see the knights of old,
Is the Tiller of the Soil!

No weighty bars secure his door,
No ditch is dug around;
His walls no cannon bristle o'er,
No dread lie on its sound.
A peaceful laborer he,
Unknown in Earth's turmoil—
From many crushing sorrows free,
Is the Tiller of the Soil.

His stacks are seen on every side,
His barns are filled with grain;
Though others hail not Fortune's tide,
He labors not in vain.
The land gives up its rich increase,
The sweet reward of toil;
And blest with happiness and peace,
Is the Tiller of the Soil.

He trudges out at break of day,
And takes his way along;
And as he turns the yielding clay,
He sings a joyful song.
He is no dull, unhappy wight,
Bound in misfortune's coil;
The smile is bright, the heart is light,
Of the Tiller of the Soil!

And when the orb of day has crown'd
With gold the Western sky,
Before his dwelling he is found,
With cheerful faces by--
With little, laughing duplicates,
Cares can't cannot spoil--
Oh, joy at every step awaits,
The Tiller of the Soil!

A hardy, sun-burnt man is he,
A hardy sun-burnt man;
But who can boast a head so free,
As he, the Tiller, can!
Nor summer's heat, nor winter's cold,
The power has him to foil--
Oh, far above the kings of old,
Is the Tiller of the Soil!

Augusta, Geo.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ADVENTURE IN HUNGARY.

FROM THE GERMAN.

On the third day after their departure for Vienna, a horse-dealer stopped at an inn situated at the entrance of a little town, which, to all appearance, was respectable and quiet. He rode into the yard, led his horse to the care of the landlord, seated himself at the fire, and as soon as supper was ready sat down to table with the host and his family, who appeared to be decent people.

During supper, the traveller was asked where he came from, and on his answering from Vienna; they were all anxious to hear some news of the capital. The horse-dealer told them all he knew. The landlord then asked him what business had taken him to Vienna, to which the latter replied that he had been there to sell some of the very finest horses that had ever appeared in the market there. At these words the landlord looked very significantly at a young man who sat opposite to him, and who appeared to be his son. His expressive glance did not escape the observation of the traveller, who, however, took no notice of it; yet he very soon afterwards had cause to regret his want of caution. Being in want of repose, he begged the landlord, as soon as the supper was finished, to show him to his room. The landlord took a lamp, and conducted the traveller across a yard into a detached building, which contained two tolerably neat rooms. A bed was prepared at the farther end of the second.

As soon as the landlord had retired, the traveller undressed himself, unbuckled a money-belt containing a considerable sum in gold and took out his pocket-book, which was full of Austrian bank notes. Having convinced himself that his money was right, he placed both under his pillow, extinguished the light, and soon fell asleep, thanking God and all the saints for the success of his journey. He had slept about an hour or two, when he was suddenly awaked by the opening of the window, and immediately felt the night air blow in upon him.

Startled at this unforeseen circumstance, the traveller raised himself up in bed, and perceived the head and shoulders of a man who was struggling to get into the room; at the same time he heard the voices of several persons, who were standing under the window. A dreadful terror seized our traveller, who gave himself up for lost; and scarcely knowing what he did, crept under the bed as quickly as possible. A moment afterwards, a man sprang heavily into the room, and staggered up to the bed, supporting himself against the wall. Confounded as the horse-dealer was, he nevertheless perceived that the intruder was, inebriated: this circumstance, however, gave him little hope for he hastily groped around in order to summon up courage for the contemplated crime; besides this, the traveller had heard the voices of persons outside, so that the murderer, in case of resistance, could count upon the assistance of his comrades. But how great was his astonishment when he saw the unknown person throw his coat upon the floor, and stretch himself upon the bed which he had just quitted! A few moments afterwards he heard the intruder snore, and his terror began gradually to give way to reflection, although the whole affair was quite incomprehensible to him. He was just preparing to quit his lodging-place, in order to awake the inmates of the house, and ask for another bed in place of that from which he had been so unceremoniously expelled, when a new incident occured.

He heard the outer door carefully opened, and on listening, his second cautious footsteps reached him. In a few minutes his door was opened, and two figures, those of the landlord and his son, stood on the threshold. "Keep the lamp back," whispered the father in a suppressed voice. "What have we to fear?" said the young man; "he is a stranger, besides, he has drunk a good deal, and is sleeping soundly as a dormouse." "Are you mad?" said the father, angrily: "do you wish to awake him? would you have his cries alarm the whole neighborhood?" The horse-dealer was horrified at the spectacle. He remained motionless under the bed, scarcely daring to breathe. The son shut the door after him, and the two wretches approached the bed on tiptoe. An instant afterwards the bed was shook by a convulsive motion, and a stifled cry of pain confirmed the foreboding that the unhappy man in the bed had had his throat cut. After a short pause of awful silence, the landlord said "It is over now: look for the money." "I have found it under the pillow" said the son; "it is in a leathern belt and a pocket-book." The murderers disappeared. Everything being now quiet, the traveller crept from under the bed, jumped out of the window, and hastened to the adjoining town to inform the authorities of what had happened.

The mayor immediately assembled the military, and in less than three-quarters of an hour the inn was surrounded by soldiers who had been summoned to arrest the murderers. The whole house seemed buried in profound silence, but on approaching the stables they heard a noise. The door was immediately broken in, and the landlord and his son were seen busily digging a pit. As soon as the murderers saw the horse-dealer, they uttered a cry of horror, covered their faces with their hands, and fell to the ground. This was neither from repentance nor the fear of punishment, but they thought they saw before them the ghost of the murdered man, notwithstanding they heard him speak. There was some trouble in convincing them to the contrary. They were then bound, and led into the outhouse where the horrible deed had been committed, anxious to see how the enigma would be solved. The prisoners appeared tolerably collected, or at least calm and sullen; but when on entering the room, they perceived the body which lay on the bed, the son fell senseless to the earth, and the father threw himself upon it with loud lamentations, clasped the bloody corpse and exclaimed despairingly, "My son! oh my son! I, thy father, am thy murderer!"

The murdered man was, in fact, the youngest son of the host. Drunkenness was the only fault this young man had; and this night, instead of being, as his father and brother supposed, in his bed, he had gone out secretly, and been carousing with some of his companions at the ale-house. Soon becoming sufficiently inebriated, and fearing his father's anger if he appeared before him in that state, he intended to pass the night in the detached out-house, as he had often done before. His companions had accompanied him thither, and helped him to climb up to the window. The rest requires no further explanation. Nor do we need to add that the murderers expiated their crime with their lives; and that the horse-dealer, although saved, and again in possession of his plundered property, still could not at the recollection of that dreadful night.—Evening Post

DISCOVERY OF A SINGULAR RACE OF PEOPLE.

The Christian Observer of Calcutta gives a notice of a singular race of people called the Cathies, who inhabit a part of Guzerat. They are worshippers of the sun as are also the Parsees:

"These people are supposed by some to be the ancient Cathæi, who, in the time of Alexander's invasion, occupied a portion of the Punjaub, near the confluence of the five rivers. Among the Cathies there is no distinction of caste. Besides priests they have an inferior class of persons called bards, who possess authority almost equal to that of the Priests. They become security for the payment of debts, the conduct of individuals who have misbehaved, and the appearance of persons in pending actions, either civil or criminal. On the same terms they conduct travellers and caravans through districts infested with robbers, or in a state of war.

If a troop of predatory horse appear, the bard commands them to retire, and by giving his life, suffers himself to be cut to pieces, and by his blood obtains the privilege of being buried under the place where he fell. Instead of a sword, he is armed with a pen, and by his blood he seals the bond of safety he gives. Sacred is the veneration in which such a person is held, as a person of celestial origin, and such is the horror at being the cause of his death, that the Cathies in almost every instance, suffer themselves to be plundered, rather than resist the meditated attack, and the party is allowed to pass on unmolested. The religion of these people consists of little else than an adoration of the sun. They invoke this object of their worship before commencing any great undertaking, and if a plundering expedition be successful, a portion of the money stolen is consecrated to the service of religion. The only functions of the priests are to celebrate marriages and funeral solemnities. They have but one sacred building—a temple—situated near Tinum, dedicated to the Sun—and containing an image of that luminary. The size of the Cathies is above the average, often exceeding six feet. The women are tall, and often handsome; generally speaking, modest and faithful to their lords. The Cathies have no restrictions of any sort regarding food or drink.—Evening Post.

WATCH YOURSELF.

A thoroughly well-balanced mind is one of the rarest of jewels, and demands our admiration and respect wherever it may be met with. A handsome face and a graceful person are advantages not to be despised, if they do not chance to intoxicate the possessor, and to lead to mischiefs. It is not wise, therefore, either to pride ourselves on such gifts, or to be particularly sorry for it if we do not happen to be endowed with them. Grecian noses and hyacinthine curls are in themselves neither wisdom nor happiness, and if they divert the mind from its true course, engendering vanity, extravagance, a love of display and other congenital tendencies, why it would have been much better to be born "plain," if lovingly. Do not sorrow over it then, if our features are not calculated to strike and to dazzle. It is enough if they are not positively disagreeable. Then as to fortune. Money is one of the essentials in this modern civilization. Money must be had by some means or other; and consequently if we know how to use money as it should be used, we are none the worse for its abundance, for otherwise, there are many dangers even here. But to our thinking, a well balanced mind is the treasure above all and we should prefer it as an endowment to every other human blessing. Its balance consists mainly in its calmness and composure under whatever circumstance may arise. Our errors of judgment are born either of excitements or depressions. In the one we hope too much for—take too much for granted—rush on wildly and blindly, and perhaps perish from excess of confidence. In the other, we sink down weakly and "let go all," as the sailors have it just at the moment when our energies strength, and watchfulness are most immediately required. Learn ye, therefore to distrust either state of mind. Prompt decision is a brilliant quality; but if it exists where the balance is unequal, it is too often a fire in the magazine and scatters widespread destruction. Take time to deliberate. If excited, become quite cold—if depressed, wait till your warmth is renewed; and if the question be of the least importance, avoid precipitancy. In these changes of mood, the advantage gained of seeing objects in all the variety of light that your mind can throw upon them. Think in the morning, in the afternoon, and in the evening, and then, perchance it will be evident what are likely to rank in the end. Take care that momentary impulses do not lead you astray; and if your mind even has erred in this way, distrust its sudden and vehement importunities.—Evening Bulletin.

Ephesus in Ruins.

A RECENT traveller in Asia says:

"A more thorough change can scarcely be conceived, than that which has actually occurred at Ephesus. Of the seat of active commerce the very site has shrunk from its solitary and desolate streets, once populous with the devotees of Diana, are only roughly covered by the Christian serf, or trodden by the sheep of the peasant. It was early the stronghold of Christianity, and stood at the head of the apostolic churches of Asia. It was there, that St. Paul saw the word of God grew mightily and prevailed. Not a single Christian now dwells within it. Its mouldering arches, and dilapidated walls, merely whisper the tale of its glory; and it requires the acumen of the geographer, and the active scrutiny of the exploring traveller, to form a probable conjecture as to the very site of the first wonder of the world."—Philada. Christ. Observer

Thy Brother.

Though poor, ragged and degraded the outcast is thy brother still. Why shun and despise him? In years past, a kind admonition—a pleasant word—might have saved him. Yet you refused to counsel him and passed by him scornfully. Now he is but a wreck of his former self. His ambition is destroyed, his energy is lost, and his heart is steeped in vice. There was a time, it may be when his eye was placed on virtue and his feet was turn from destruction. That moment a look from you decided his fate. That look of scorn was curled—contempt was expressed, and away he urged his step to ruin. Is it pleasant reflection—"I might have saved a soul from vice and infamy, but I refused."

Ye who have been remiss in duty—who have not cared when a brother strayed and perish, awake to new life, and be not slack in the performance of duty. It is not too late; scores may yet be saved by your zealous efforts—your counsels—your tears—your affectionate hearts and open hands. A kiss is better than a blow—a tear more effectual than a kick—an open hand preferable to a clenched first. Kindness is a moral lever, judiciously used, that will move the world and raise it to life light and joy.

LEMON PUDDING.—Beat half a pound of fresh butter to a cream, with half a pound of powdered sugar; then add to it eight eggs well beaten, with the juice and grated peel of a large lemon; stir it well together line a dish with puff paste, fill with the pudding, and bake in a moderate oven.

Since 1817 there have been fifteen revolutions in Portugal. Rather more than one every other year.

LIBERIA HERALD.

NEW SERIES.

HILARY TEAGE EDITOR (FOR OUR COUNTRY.) J. N. LEWIS, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

VOL XVI MONROVIA, LIBERIA, (WEST AFRICA.) MAY 26, 1848 NO 8

THE LIBERIA HERALD

Will be published monthly, in Monrovia, on the last Friday of each month.

TERMS—ONE DOLLAR a year payable in advance—if not paid within six months, ONE DOLLAR AND FIFTY CENTS—if at the end of the year, TWO DOLLARS

Persons once subscribing will be considered subscribers, and the paper forwarded accordingly until they shall have given notice that they wish the paper no longer.

It will be at the option of the Editors to discontinue the paper of any subscriber until all arrearages are paid.

